regime. And it was partly because of the contrast between the Communist armies and all the armies the people had known before. A non-Communist, American-educated university professor said to me: "These people upset all our old notions about the army. They never entered our houses without permission; they refused gifts and would take nothing which they did not pay for; they treated our women with respect, helped our old men across streets, and showed themselves willing to do odd jobs for us, especially those which needed heavy labor. They talked of serving the people, and soon we found they meant what they said. They certainly deserved their title, People's Liberation Army; and they were the best ambassadors of the new regime. We would do anything for them."

Another reason for the government's popularity is the sense of national dignity and pride it has promoted among the people. A good example of its methods is its insistence that the Chinese language be used everywhere; even the soaps and cigarettes manufactured by foreign concerns in China, like the Imperial Tobacco Company and Lever Brothers, now bear Chinese names and trademarks instead of English. Women are finding opportunities for work and self-expression they never had before. Young people are taken more seriously and allowed to play a more important role in national reconstruction than they had ever thought would be open to them.

One thing is absolutely clear to my mind. It is not mere propaganda or skill in psychological approach that has won the new government of China the support of all classes; nor is it solely its high code of personal conduct, or its evocation of national strength and pride. In addition to these factors there is a hard material base for the loyalty of the people. And that is the concrete improvement in their material condition which all classes see is the result of action taken by the government, though less than three years have elapsed since it was established.

This cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the attitude of the largest class in China, the peasantry. The new government has broken the grip of the landlords and thereby secured the support of the vast majority of those who work on the land.

Experiment in Industrial Democracy

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

TODAY Yugoslavia is still a one-party state: at election time the voters receive a single list of candidates. The press represents the view of the government, and there is no freedom of assembly for enemies of the regime. In spite of this, the assumption that the Yugoslav dictatorship is as absolute as that of Russia is contradicted by several recent political and economic developments. The stated goal of present-day Yugoslav policy, in sharp contrast to post-war Soviet tendencies, is to curb the government's powers in various directions. If this change continues, it will have significant consequences far beyond Yugoslavia's borders, for it will be the first instance in modern history of a dictatorial government relinquishing part of its control.

The trend, of course, is comparatively new. The Yugoslavs embarked on their political and social reforms only when they became convinced that the break with the Soviet Union was irrevocable. One of the first changes instituted was in the direction of decentralization—of what in this country would be called "states' rights." Yugoslavia, which is made up of a number of republics representing widely different stages of economic development, had at first sought to govern these republics—whose own powers were nominal—through a kind of bureaucratic centralism. Today the autonomy of the republics is being strengthened, and only the most urgent matters are being regulated by the central government.

A similar process is going on in Yugoslavia's economic life. As late as 1950, in line with its Five-Year Plan, Yugoslavia's economy was strictly controlled by the central authority. In recent months this principle has been partly abandoned. The government still directs over-all planning, but industrial, business, and agricultural enterprises are being given greater freedom.

In practice the system works like this: The government's over-all plan merely lays down the minimum production quota in vital industries; it further establishes minimum wages for skilled and unskilled workers and for technicians. It fixes the approximate quota for new investments and decides at the same time in what industries and plants new investments are to be made. In addition, it controls almost all foreign trade. In this way the government assures the armaments industry the imports it needs and also decides how much certain branches of industry must export in order to pay for essential imports.

Within these limits individual industrial, business, and agricultural enterprises are allowed a fairly wide margin of control. For example, plants are given a free hand to produce more than the minimum government quota, and in the same way once a factory has passed its minimum production quota, both total and individual wages may rise above the government minimums in proportion to the increased output. Similarly the state determines minimum investments; however, beyond this, the workers themselves may decide whether, and how much, they want to invest in their own plant.

This system is no longer abstract theory; it is being turned into practice. I visited a tractor plant near Belgrade. In the previous few months this plant had produced about 50 tractors a month—an annual output of 600 tractors. If it could be better supplied with raw materials, or, to put it differently, if arms production did not swallow up so much iron ore, then the annual output could be raised to nearly 1,000 tractors. Considering that Yugoslavia has altogether some 6,000 agricultural collectives, this tractor plant is obviously vital to the economy. It employs about 1,600 people. By American and Western European standards its equipment is not first-rate, but compared to most Balkan countries it is quite modern. Recently houses for the workers have been built near the plant; half the workers already live there, while the other half live in neighboring communities. They work eight hours a day, forty-eight hours a week; the plant has a good restaurant, which the majority of the workers patronize, and good sanitary facilities.

The plant manager—and he alone—was chosen by the central planning bureau; together with him a workers' council elected by the workers themselves makes all the major decisions. The central over-all plan provides that the minimum output is to be fifty tractors a month; it further provides for the necessary raw materials, sets the minimum wages—which are paid even if the minimum quota is not reached and unemployment or part-time work results for reasons beyond the management's control, for example, in case of difficulties in raw-material deliveries. Apart from these basic regulations, however, the workers' council is given considerable leeway. Whenever production and productivity go up, it can raise the minimum quota and pay higher wages. By examining the wage scales in the various work categories I discovered that wages paid to the workers are considerably higher than the prescribed minimums, often more than one-third higher. This naturally strengthens the bond between the workers and their jobs, enhances their interest in the plant's output, and makes them feel that it belongs to them—actually as well as legally.

The change taking place in this particular tractor plant, like that going on throughout the country, is aimed at broadening social democracy in the labor process itself and also in the relationships between worker and production. It is part of an effort the success of which is by no means assured. But the cumulative effect of everything I saw in Yugoslavia justifies a moderate optimism. And this feeling is increased by the fact that young men are at the helm of the government. With the exception of Tito most of the ministers are between thirty and forty and most of the men who run industry are just as young. They are vigorous and hopeful, and ready to experiment with new ideas.

This attempt to substitute industrial democracy for centralized control, if it does succeed, can have far-reaching consequences. For it comes to grips with a world-wide problem. With an ever-increasing share of the world's industrial output being produced by large plants, a kind of dehumanization of labor has come to pass. Many Socialists have believed that this evil could be eliminated by the nationalization of vital industries.

But post-war experience has shown clearly that this change by itself is not enough.

In Great Britain the Labor government nationalized a number of key industries, but the position of the worker himself, his personal attitude to his work, remained basically the same. It was this experience, among others, which led many British Fabians to visit Yugoslavia during the past year, to gather concrete evidence as to how the problem was being tackled there, where the government has absolute power. Germany has also recognized the importance of this question. The Bonn Parliament has passed a law which gives the workers equal power with management in determining the policy of major industries; so far its effect has hardly been felt. But Germany too is beginning to realize, on the basis of Britain's experience, that a nationalized and planned economy in no way solves the problem of giving the worker a stake in the enterprise, in the growth of production and productivity. Responsible German labor men and Socialists intend to acquaint themselves with the concrete results of Yugoslavia's experiment. They realize, of course, that one country's findings cannot be schematically applied to another. But it would be of great value for the growth of social democracy everywhere if British, Yugoslav, and German experience could be shared.

The Crusade Against Bridges

BY FOWLER HARPER

HARRY BRIDGES, now seeking a reversal of his conviction of perjury in connection with his naturalization as an American, was born in Australia of middle-class stock. As a young man he was exposed to the moderate trade-union, socialist political philosophy which prevailed there during the early years of the century. At nineteen he came to the United States as a legal immigrant and after a few years in various maritime jobs settled down in San Francisco. For ten or twelve years this fellow earned his living, such as it was, in the same wretched way as the thousands of others who toiled, when they could get work, on the San Francisco waterfront. But when the depression and the New Deal got into full swing, Bridges became distinguishable from the other waterfront employees. In 1934 he was elected chairman of the longshoremen's strike committee.

From that time on Harry Bridges has been one of the most effective labor leaders in the United States. He has also been a marked man. In 1936 he became president of the West Coast Longshoremen's Union and has held the post ever since. By shrewd, imaginative, and often militant leadership he has raised the average earnings of its members from a starving wage to more than $5,000 a year, as compared to the $1,700 average of Joe Ryan's boss-ridden East Coast unionists. It may or may not be significant that the government has shown almost complete indifference to Ryan's conduct of his union, which is notoriously a disgrace to the labor movement. Until the 1934 West Coast strike the government showed no interest in Bridges, or in his social, economic, or political views. Since then it has waged a campaign against this Australian immigrant that has no doubt been matched in some countries but hardly here.

Although Bridges has been in the United States since 1922, he was first investigated late in 1934 by the District Director of Immigration and the San Francisco police department. The District Director reported that his investigation failed to show that Bridges was "in any manner connected with the Communist Party or any radical organization." He also reported that the San Francisco police had "likewise been unable to obtain any evidence that the alien [Bridges] has ever been a member of the Communist Party or in any manner directly affiliated therewith or a member of any radical organization."

FOWLER HARPER is professor of law at Yale University.

In 1936, notwithstanding this clean bill of health for Bridges, the Commissioner of Immigration, under pressure from certain West Coast interests, appointed a three-man committee to start a new investigation of Bridges's alleged subversive behavior. The committee reported that "whenever any legal ground for the deportation of Bridges has been brought to the attention of the Department of Labor [which at that time had jurisdiction over the Immigration Service], it has been investigated, but invariably it has been found that he was in the clear, and that his status as an immigrant was entirely regular."

Bridges and his union no doubt thought that the end of the matter—three investigations and three clearances. But they did not reckon accurately the power of those who wanted to crush the union and get rid of its tough leader. These people represented large shipping companies, the American Legion, the Associated Farmers, and even so-called labor leaders like Ryan and Lundberg. The Secretary of Labor finally ordered a fourth investigation by the department's solicitor. He made it and came up with the same answer. Nevertheless, the pressures continued. A resolution was even introduced in Congress to impeach the Secretary of Labor. Whether as a result or not, the Secretary issued a warrant for Bridges's arrest with a view to deportation on the ground that he was a member of the Communist Party, and hearings were held before a specially appointed examiner, James M. Landis, former dean of the Harvard Law School. The government threw everything at Bridges, including 138 exhibits. The accused himself submitted 136. Sixty witnesses were examined. The stenographic transcript ran to 7,700 pages. Dean Landis made an exhaustive analysis of the record and concluded that on the evidence Bridges was neither a member of nor affiliated in any way with the Communist Party. The Secretary of Labor approved the report. Here was the fourth clearance.

The pressure to get Bridges out of the country increased. The House passed a special bill directing the Attorney General to deport him, "notwithstanding any other provision of law." The bill died in the Senate after Robert H. Jackson, then Attorney General, denounced it as unconstitutional. But Congress and the men behind some of its members were not content. The Immigration Act was promptly amended, admittedly to achieve the desired result by making past membership in the Communist Party ground for deportation. Indeed, the author of the bill said: "It is my joy to announce that this bill will do in a perfectly legal constitutional manner what the bill specifically aimed at the deportation of Harry Bridges seeks to accomplish. This bill changes the law so that the Department of Justice should now have little trouble in deporting Harry Bridges and all others of similar ilk."

The Department of Justice got right on the ball. A new warrant was issued for Bridges's arrest and deportation on the charge that he had once been a member of the party. Another hearing was held before Judge Charles B. Sears, who found against Bridges. The Board of Immigration Appeals reversed him. The Attorney General reversed the Board of Appeals and ordered Bridges deported. A writ of habeas corpus was denied in the Federal District Court. The decision was affirmed in the Circuit Court of Appeals by a divided court. The Supreme Court reversed it and found for Bridges in two blistering opinions. Justice Murphy said:

The record in this case will stand forever as a monument to man's intolerance to man. Seldom if ever in the history of this nation has there been such a concentrated and relentless crusade to deport an individual because he dared to exercise the freedom that belongs to him as a human being and that is guaranteed to him by the Constitution. . . . Industrial and farming organizations, veterans' groups, city police departments, and private undercover agents, all joined in an unrelenting effort to deport him. . . . Wire-tapping, searches and seizures without warrant, and other forms of invasion of the right of privacy have been widely employed in this deportation drive.

WHAT manner of man is this who for fifteen years has created a civil-liberties furor heard round the world—unfortunately even behind the Iron Curtain? One has to see Harry Bridges in action to catch his temper—see him in the hiring halls with his men, note their grim devotion to him, see him hard-bargaining with the Waterfront Employers' Association, hear him testifying to his faith in democratic processes and his simple belief in the rights of workers and their trade unions. Justice Douglas quoted a revealing passage from Landis's report:

Bridges's own statement of his political beliefs and disbeliefs is important. It was given not only without reserve but vigorously, as dogmas and faiths of which the man was proud and which represented in his mind the aims of his existence. It was a fighting apologia that refused to temper itself to the winds of caution.

It is obvious that Bridges made a deep impression on Landis as he has on many others. Bridges is contagious. People around him catch fire from his zeal. Ask the determined organizers who faced riot acts and hoodlums' violence to invade Hawaii and organize the sugar workers! But the array of money and power against him is more than any immigrant labor leader can overcome in the atmosphere that pervades the nation today.

Shortly after the Supreme Court decision was handed down, Bridges pressed his pending application for citizenship and thought he was naturalized by decree of a federal court. But in May, 1949, he was indicted for conspiracy to defraud the government—by lying when he testified that he had never been a member of the Communist Party. There is evidence that more than a year earlier the then Attorney General had determined to oust Bridges from the leadership of his union in one way or another. The Attorney General also intimated, on the eve of the prosecution, that his conviction would have a quieting effect on economic disturbances in Hawaii.

Bridges was tried on a charge which in substance was perjury. The Department of Justice assigned a battery of six lawyers to the case. Bridges was convicted on the testimony of a parade of witnesses as dubious as those in the preceding trial, who had been characterized by Dean Landis in a way to leave little doubt that he thought they had all perjured themselves. Indeed, the government's evidence in the earlier trial, in the words of one of the Appeals Court judges, "would be condemned and proscribed without hesitation by any American court."

In July, 1950, while his case was pending on appeal, as it still is, on motion of the government, Bridges's bail was revoked, and he was thrown into jail because he spoke out for a cease-fire in Korea. Now, twenty months and a hundred thousand American casualties later, most people, including Senator Taft, also want a cease-fire. The trial court's revocation of bail was reversed by the Court of Appeals, and the most hated and most respected labor leader in the country is for the time being running his union as usual.

Aside from the question of who is lying about Bridges's relationship to the Communist Party, one of the principal issues in the case is the statute of limitations. This statute has always been considered important in the administration of justice; it is not a mere technicality. It is not fair to prosecute a man for something he is alleged to have done many years before. Witnesses die, their memories fail, records are lost. The general statute of limitations on criminal prosecutions sets a time limit of three years. The present prosecution was initiated more than three years after the alleged perjury. However, a war-time "Suspension Act" lifted the limitation where "fraud" was charged. The legislative history of this act shows that the fraud which Congress had in mind was in connection with contracts and other negotiations involving pecuniary loss to the government. The Supreme Court had held that a similar earlier statute was inapplicable to perjury in connection with an income-tax return. Cheating the government out of money is no part of the crime of perjury. But the trial judge in Bridges's pending case stretched the suspension act to knock out the statute of limitations.

HOW many times does a man have to defend himself against the same charge? What of the constitutional provision that a man may not be tried twice for the same offense? This is the third proceeding in which Bridges has had to face the accusation that at some time after his entry to the United States he joined or somehow became affiliated with the Communist Party. The government was the moving party each time. The two administrative proceedings for deportation may technically not be criminal in nature, although banishment, as Justice Brandeis has said, "may result also in the loss of both property and life or all that makes life worth living." In the present case the charge was criminal in nature and the loss of citizenship incidental — just thrown in for the tax. Nevertheless, Bridges has been put in jeopardy of exile from the United States three times.

Repeatedly Bridges's attorney raised the point, and repeatedly the trial judge ruled against him. The attorney sought to introduce in evidence the decision of the Supreme Court. The trial judge charged the jury specifically that no force or effect whatever could be given to any of the prior decisions. Bridges was defending from scratch. The government, of course, introduced much evidence which had not been presented in the deportation proceedings. Practically all of it, however, was at least questionable as hearsay. There was no documentary evidence to substantiate any part of the charge.

On the main issue—had Bridges ever been a Communist since he came to the United States?—the principal witnesses against him were ten labor organizers, or officials, who were renegades from the party. Bridges had necessarily had considerable traffic with them during his long career on the waterfront. With some of them he had had strong differences in the rough and tumble union activities of the period. It is not easy to prove a negative proposition, and Bridges's witnesses would naturally be less convincing than the government's on this issue. How many persons could anybody get to testify that they knew he had never been a Communist? Under cross-examination it would invariably come down to a matter of belief. There is no escape from the fact that either Bridges himself or most of the government's principal witnesses lied. The record of the trial discloses a good bit of evidence that at least two and probably three of the government's witnesses perjured themselves. Two others look pretty bad, and one admitted ex-comrade had been on the government's pay roll to the tune of several thousand dollars.

In his charge to the jury on the credibility of the witnesses the trial judge appears to have set up a less onerous standard for the trustworthiness of the government's witnesses than for that of the defense witnesses. In any event, now that the trial is over, there is not much doubt where his sympathies were while it was in progress. At the outset of his charge he said, poetically, "I trust you may be able to perceive the truth shimmering like gold in the crucible of this trial, in the searching light of legal principles applicable." After the verdict of guilt he told them triumphantly, "You have finally found the golden truth shimmering in the fiery crucible of this trial."

Yes, after sixteen years and six tries, the government finally found the "golden truth" about Bridges.

The Saga of Goa

BY MARIO ROSSI

AN INTERESTING little document was smuggled out of Portuguese India the other day. Goa, on the west coast of India, with a population of 600,000, is still a Portuguese colony, though it would like to join greater India. The people have offered passive resistance to Portugal's repressive rule and have tried to inform the Western world that they are being denied the right to self-determination, but the Portuguese authorities have managed to keep the matter under cover. Now at last a well-documented memorandum prepared by one of the leaders of the Goa liberation committee, or National Congress, and setting forth the people's grievances has been received in this country.

Civil liberties, the memorandum demonstrates, do not exist in Goa. A strictly enforced censorship extends to every kind of printed matter, including advertisements, calendars, and wedding invitations. The police are all-powerful and are mostly troops imported from Africa. All contacts with India are forbidden to the people under threat of imprisonment or deportation; Goans may not even visit the Indian consulate.

The Congress charges that the colonial administration has no semblance of democracy. The Governor General, appointed by the Minister for Colonies in Lisbon, is the supreme authority. He is assisted by a Council of fourteen members, nine of whom are nominated by the administration and five elected by the forty richest taxpayers.

After referring to the West's lack of interest in Goa's national aspirations, the memorandum says:

Since no practical steps were taken by the Indian government to implement its verbal statements [in favor of Goan independence], the government of Goa still enjoys the privileged position assured to the Portuguese in India by their former protector [Britain]. . . . This is largely due to the attitude of English-trained civil servants toward the Portuguese authorities. They act in direct opposition to the declared policy of Pandit Nehru, and still seem to consider Portugal the "oldest ally."

Challenging the contention that Goa is profiting economically from its ties with Portugal, the memorandum states that according to the latest available statistics imports are six times greater than exports, the deficit being made up by heavy taxation and remittances from Goans who have emigrated to India or Africa. The standard of living of the Goans is purposely kept low. Some 90 per cent of the population is illiterate, and no more than 5 per cent can speak Portuguese.

Those Goans who have been converted, usually under duress, to Catholicism favor union with India as strongly as the others, but the church opposes it. The church considers Goa one of its bastions in the Far East and maintains a patriarchate there. The Patriarch, D. José da Costa Nunes, has said: "In carrying out the church's program of work I can and I must inculcate love for Portugal in the people and condemn the imbecility of the country's incorporation into greater India." Of course, the preeminent position of the church would suffer from union with India, where Catholics are a tiny minority. Salazar has thus found the church a convenient instrument of the dictatorship's colonial policies.

Portugal first gained a foothold in India in the sixteenth century but acquired most of the Goan territory in the eighteenth. The Goan liberation movement began to be formidable in 1946, when campaigns of civil disobedience were instituted. An Indian government official told me that Prime Minister Nehru is in complete sympathy with the aspirations of the Goans and is trying to induce Portugal to hold a plebiscite. Mahatma Gandhi was a great friend of Goan independence and repeatedly condemned Portuguese rule. On August 2, 1946, he wrote to the Governor General of Portuguese India:

What I see and know of conditions in Goa is hardly edifying. That the Indians in Goa have been silent is proof not of the innocence or the beneficence of the Portuguese government but of its rule of terror. You will forgive me for not subscribing to your statement that there is full liberty in Goa and that the agitation is confined to a few malcontents. Every account received by me personally and seen in the papers here in this part of India confirms the contrary view.

MARIO ROSSI was formerly The Nation's correspondent in Rome.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

IN THE March issue of Harper's Magazine, Joyce Cary attacks what he calls our favorite folly, the belief that one of the end-products of modern industrial democratic society is and must be the mass mind. He subscribed to this belief himself, he says, until he went to administer the affairs of a primitive tribe in Africa—and found that "the tribal mind was much more truly a mass mind than anything I had known in Europe." He takes, one by one, the arguments usually invoked to prove that individuality is vanishing from the Western world and shows that they are actually evidences of the opposite tendency.

One of these arguments is the "enormous increase of law and regulation"—it is sometimes referred to as regimentation. In a primitive society no such elaborate structure is necessary, says Mr. Cary, for the reason that no one questions the authority of the tribal chiefs or the sanctity of old customs. Men and their demands are really standardized—and severely limited. "But the modern state, simply because of the independence of its citizens, the complication of their demands, needs a huge machine of law and police. This is not a proof of the mass mind but the exact opposite—of a growing number of people who think and act for themselves and, rightly or wrongly, are ready to defy the old simple rules founded on custom."

To the argument that "mass education" is debasing the standards of thought and producing mob minds—an argument tirelessly repeated in sorrow or in anger by liberals as well as reactionaries—he replies that no kind of education, however narrow, "can produce the mass mind. The reason is that minds are creative, that thoughts wander by themselves and cannot be controlled by the cleverest police. . . . To teach people to think, if only to make them more useful as soldiers and mechanics, is to open all thoughts to them—a whole world of ideas."

IT IS A long-term answer. But in any assessment of the merits of the democratic idea—and that is the real issue in the argument Mr. Cary has joined—only the long view is applicable. Relatively speaking, the democratic idea has been in operation only a very short time. No one will deny that it has released the bodies and the minds and the creative faculties of millions who would otherwise have passed their lives in serfdom or slavery or the tribal uniformity that Mr. Cary describes. To expect that, in so brief a time, it should also have brought these millions to a high level of taste, of judgment and discrimination, not only in the arts but in every other field, is both unfair and, as Mr. Cary points out, profoundly defeatist. He is not dismayed by "the crowds at the cinemas and the bus loads on the sight-seeing tours. . . . They have already left the mass; they are individuals seeking ideas for themselves." At least, as he says, there is a great variety of taste—and while the continuous search for novelty may be a sign of dissatisfaction, dissatisfaction is not characteristic of the mass mind.

As for the quality of public taste, perhaps the wonder, on balance, should be not that it is as low as it is but that it is as high as it is, considering all the hazards. I am thinking of such hazards as the commercial exploitation of bad taste by cynical entrepreneurs who nevertheless feel called upon to exonerate themselves by taking refuge in the hoary claim that they are providing "what the people want"; and of such devices as the Motion Picture Code, which in the name of morality has forced the production of hundreds of "inoffensive" and "non-controversial" films which are so immoral and vulgar in the true sense of these words that your genuine moralist can't sit through them.

I do not mean to exaggerate the quality of the public taste. And I am quite prepared for the possibility that it may get worse before it gets better. But having made these generalizations, I hasten to assert that any generalization about so vast a development as the spread of democratic society is bound to be at best no more than half true. Public taste is made up of millions of private individual tastes and uneven development is of its essence. In some sectors it will assuredly get worse before it gets better. In others it will never again be worse than it is and is getting better.

"If you want to write a best-seller," says Mr. Cary, "your best subject nowadays is probably cosmology." This fact offsets somewhat the fact that the market for good fiction and poetry is very limited. As it happens, fiction in general, the bad and mediocre as well as the good, has shown a large decline in sales these past years—ask any publisher. It could be that the lack of interest in good fiction, together with the growth of interest in cosmology, is not an indication of the increasing vulgarity and mediocrity of the democratic "mass" mind but, instead, a sign that at this stage the desire for knowledge is uppermost. It need not mean, either, that fiction and poetry are "finished"; it is at least possible that the desire for knowledge will be succeeded by a demand for the more rarefied nourishment of fiction and poetry. This is the usual sequence in individual development, and the individual is the unit and the mainspring of the democratic process.

THIS LAST FACT is too often overlooked or forgotten—and to me one of the great ironies of the past thirty years is that it has been so often overlooked and forgotten by the very people who consider themselves the champions of the democratic idea. It is they, for instance, who are most likely to use a term which I have used myself, which I shall never use again, and which I think should be banished from the democratic vocabulary—I mean that condescending, arrogant, and subtly self-glorifying term "the masses." It is a term that corrupts the user, for as soon as one reduces human beings, in one's mind, to a featureless, undifferentiated "mass," one is on the way to being ready to treat them not as human beings but as insentient things, to be categorized, manipulated, even destroyed—and all of course for their own good. The totalitarians have shown us and are still showing us where this sort of dehumanized thinking leads. Another, related irony is that the defense of the individual has become the shibboleth of old-fashioned reactionaries who really regard the majority of people as "a great beast."

IN REPORTING last week on "Flight Into Egypt" I didn't get round to mentioning an element which other reviewers noted and which was very much in evidence. This was the piling up of afflictions—on the characters and on the audience as well—to the point where one had to become insensible or walk out. The situation presented was cruel enough—that of a cripple and his wife and child, almost penniless, waiting from moment to moment for a visa to the United States—though it was somehow alleviated by the information that they had their steamship tickets! But a gruesome and to my mind quite unnecessary twist was added. The cripple had a radio on his wheelchair and we were carefully told that when the pain was upon him he turned on the radio to drown his screams. It seems to me that sadism—in this case directed at the audience—could go no farther; and there are other details almost as harrowing. "Flight Into Egypt" may be intended as a serious play about a subject of pressing interest; it often gives the effect of being an attempt to exploit current emotions about refugees, war cripples, and mean American consuls.

Personal Chronicle

AFTER ALL. The Autobiography of Norman Angell. Farrar, Straus and Young. $4.50.

NOT many elders of our time can have been more badgered than Sir Norman Angell to set about the writing of reminiscences, and there is one curious point in the persistent demand. The men and women who make up his immense circle of acquaintance have for the most part esteemed him only as author and international evangelist. They are unaware that his life has comprised an abundance of adventure; that this man of slight physique spent his early manhood in the fierce labor of a pioneer in the great West, and that until the onset of old age he found his recreation in home-building and stiff sailing. To the large majority, therefore, of those readers who can claim some personal knowledge of the author, "After All" will come as the revelation of an original man of action.

Norman Angell is a native of eastern England, coming from a small Lincolnshire town not many miles from Old Boston. His parents were moderately well-to-do. They would gladly have sent him to Cambridge and backed him for a lucrative profession, but from the start he had other ideas. His schooling was mainly in France, at the lycée of St. Omer. At the age of sixteen he was editing a little paper in Geneva, and a year later, with £50 sterling from his father, he sailed for New York. An emigrant train carried him to southern California when Los Angeles was hardly a town. Being ready for anything he worked as farm hand, cowboy, and hauler. As an intending settler he built his own house. All the physical conditions were rough and enjoyable; it was the human obstacles that proved to be insuperable. A quite grotesque animosity was the lot of this friendly and hardworking young Englishman. Lying testimony in the court did him out of his quarter-section. At the end of seven years he gave up and had a brief spell of reporting in San Francisco.

The next stage made a startling contrast. His knowledge of French was an asset. He went to Paris and was soon writing editorials with energy and a wide range. His gifts were discovered by Harmsworth, the future Lord Northcliffe, then on his first ascent to power and needing an organizer for the Continental Daily Mail. Angell accepted the job and held it with notable success for ten years. No two men could have been farther apart in conviction and aim; yet the personal association was good to the last, and meanwhile the governing purpose of Norman Angell's life was taking shape.

The violent racial hates he had known in California made him reflect upon the roots of international conflict. In France the raging passions aroused by the Dreyfus affair drove home the lesson. The climate between Germany and England was rapidly changing for the worse. This student of affairs at the center recognized all the forces that were making toward a European disaster, and in 1910 "The Great Illusion" was published, after a trial venture with a pamphlet. The famous book was a compact masterpiece of exposition, logic, and prophecy. It proclaimed that the powers were rushing to the abyss. Their fatal course might be stayed, but only if the governments and other makers of policy took heed in time, acknowledged the iron facts, and threw away the superstitions by which the nations were being destroyed. Should war be allowed to come again, the warning rang, victors and vanquished must suffer alike: the European system would be overturned, indemnities could not be collected: the writing on the wall was repudiation. "The Great Illusion" was translated into a score of languages, the sales ran into millions, a debate was opened that spanned the globe.

The author's name—an effective shortening of his patronymic—was soon universally known, but by an ironic perversity for which there is no parallel in the annals of political controversy, it was attached to a mythical soothsayer who was alleged to have announced that great wars had become impossible. During forty years of protest Norman Angell wrote hundreds of letters underlining the truth that what he had written was the precise opposite. All efforts were unavailing; the idiotic blunder is still being repeated, even by would-be serious writers. Hence Norman Angell is now disposed to quote Charles Darwin and say that he must have been a very poor explainer. That, of course, is not so; no man could be more lucid. All we can say is that the libel is unique and inexplicable.

Norman Angell is now within hail of fourscore. He can look back upon a half-century of public work inspired by devotion to a single cause: the salvation of mankind from a third global conflict which would bring the final overthrow of Europe as we know it and the end of Western civilization. His opponents assert that in demanding a policy of realistic cooperation between the "free" powers he has identified himself with a fundamental blunder. That is, he has assumed that peoples and governments are capable of being convinced by reason and experience or by arguments based upon vital interest. He replies that no publicist of the age could have a sharper or more terrifying awareness than he has of the irrational forces now ruling the world and blackening the future. He knows that for himself there was no other course possible than the one to which his mind and energies are dedicated. Upon the essentials of organic peace he has written and spoken untiringly. His coworkers are found in every land. In England after the First War he became a valued counselor of the Labor Party, fought four elections, and endured rather than enjoyed two years in Parliament. He is given to wondering whether, for a complete internationalist, this turn to the left was right. He notes with a touch of good-humored irony that when, for a very simple reason, he accepted a knighthood from Ramsay MacDonald, he received many more congratulations than on the occasion of the Nobel peace award.

In these present hours of crisis, amid conditions more threatening to the world order than ever before, it is plainly impossible for anyone to estimate, in terms of positive result, the life-effort of a creative social and political thinker. Here for us, however, is the personal chronicle of a life and character that shine out in the murk of our distressful day. It is throughout candid and humane, written with sustained animation. And I do not doubt that the sensitive reader will feel that it reflects the thoughts and affections of a happy man, a spirit deeply fulfilled.

Dr. Hayes on Spain

THE UNITED STATES AND SPAIN.

By Carlton J. H. Hayes. Sheed and Ward. $2.75.

THE latest contribution by Dr. Hayes to the Viva Franco school of history is an expanded version of lectures he delivered last year at the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Massachusetts. Despite the fact that it is a slender little book in more ways than one, it contains elements of truth which are sometimes overlooked. Spain, as the author points out, is a poor country and is fated to remain so, not because of the indolence of Spaniards—they are an industrious and sober people—but because of its deficiency in natural resources. Though there are vast treasures in Spanish cathedrals and monasteries, the Catholic church in Spain is also poor. Spain's record as a colonizer is not so bad as it has been painted by such historians as Prescott; in some respects it was better than England's.

Even in dealing with matters of background Dr. Hayes's prejudices are apparent, but if he had confined himself to giving background information his book would have served a useful purpose. Far too many people holding strong convictions about Spain appear to have confined their reading to the period since 1936, or at most go back to the fall of the monarchy in 1931. Dr. Hayes's aim is to convince Americans that the Franco regime is not really fascist, that it helped us during the war, and that now it should be brought into the North Atlantic Pact whether the British and French like it or not. For the moment the Pentagon is more concerned with arming Germany, and until that issue is disposed of, Franco will apparently have to wait.

However, the absence of Franco from an alliance that is intended to save the Atlantic democracies from totalitarianism has not dismayed the Pentagon, and it is rushing its preparations to arm Franco in exchange for bases; if all goes according to Dr. Hayes's wishes the United States should soon be able to welcome Franco into the North Atlantic Pact and the United Nations as well. Thanks to Mr. Acheson's representatives, in fact, the General Assembly has already repealed the resolution that barred the Franco regime from organizations affiliated with the United Nations and asked member nations to withdraw their ambassadors from Madrid.

Most advocates of aid for Franco either profess to be mere generals or admirals, knowing nothing about foreign policy but much about the value of airfields in Castile, or like President Truman keep on saying they don't like Franco while doing what Franco wants. No person who values the good name of the United States will approve of such an attitude, though it is possible to understand it and even to respect those who hold it. Dr. Hayes, however, is a champion of Franco à outrance. To say that he is an apologist would be to understate the case. According to Dr. Hayes, Franco is a fine man, and the Spanish civil war was a struggle, not between communism and fascism, but between Communists and "anti-Communists," and was "a prelude not so much to the Second World War as to the subsequent 'cold war' and the struggle in Korea."

Two examples of Dr. Hayes's use of historical method, which he presumably passed on to his students at Columbia University, must suffice. The first concerns the composition of the forces supporting the Nationalists at the start of the civil war: after a fairly accurate account of the moderate Republicans, Requetes, and so on we come to the last of the list: "In addition, there was a new semi-fascist group, the Falange, headed by José Antonio Primo de Rivera, son of the former general and dictator, and recruited chiefly from youthful ultra-patriots impatient alike with monarchy and with republic." This is the closest Dr. Hayes comes to admitting that there were any fascist elements among Franco's supporters, and he does not refer to Franco's decree of April 14, 1937, making the twenty-six points of the Falange the official program of his regime, still less to the fact that this decree has not been repealed. If Dr. Hayes wants to know whether this was just a "semi-fascist" group, perhaps he will accept evidence from me: on more than a dozen occasions between 1939 and 1941, I, an American newspaper correspondent, was forced by Franco's police to give the fascist salute.

The second example of Dr. Hayes's methods concerns the "sinister propaganda of Moscow and international communism," which "tirelessly repeated the most blatant lies about Spain's fueling of German U-boats. . . ." It so happens that the State Department White Paper on Spain reproduces a report from the Nazi embassy in Spain in which a Nazi official stated that he had been urging the Franco government to permit the refueling of Nazi destroyers, using as his main argument the fact that the Franco government was already permitting the refueling of submarines. What does Dr. Hayes say about that? Well, he does not mention this official report, but he dismisses all the documents in the collection as "a tendentious 'white paper,'" which was "basically dishonest."

Perhaps a special word should be said about the use of quotation marks as part of the technique of innuendo which is constantly employed by Dr. Hayes and his school. It might seem that to call a collection of Nazi documents "tendentious" would be enough. Are the inverted commas intended to mean that it was not a White Paper, or even that it did not exist at all? To take another example, Dr. Hayes quotes from an article by Robert Bendiner and says it appeared in the "liberal" Nation. This means presumably that The Nation, while it professes to be a liberal publication, is not any such thing, and the implication is meant to be sinister.

Indeed, Dr. Hayes's use of innuendo deserves a special article. Space does not permit republication of a remarkable passage which manages to connect Alger Hiss, Mr. Acheson, and the Yalta conference with the adoption at the San Francisco conference of the resolution barring Spain from the United Nations as long as Franco remained in power. One sentence must suffice: "There was also a new, non-career Under Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, who was a close personal friend of Alger Hiss and had the reputation at the time of being especially conciliatory toward Russia and hostile to 'Franco Spain.'"

Dr. Hayes's "Select Bibliography"—the habit is catching—lists under the heading "Anti-Franco Criticism and Propaganda" the excellent book on Spain by Emmet J. Hughes, which is written from a Catholic point of view and which condemns the Franco regime with bell, book, and candle. Mr. Hughes was a protégé of Dr. Hayes and worked under him throughout their stay in Madrid; it is good to be reminded that "liberals" are not the only people who refuse to accept Dr. Hayes's prejudices and innuendoes.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON

More Than One Way

FOUR THOUSAND MILLION MOUTHS. Scientific Humanism and the Shadow of World Hunger. Edited by F. Le Gros Clark and N. W. Pirie. Oxford University Press. $3.

A CALM approach to problems of population and food resources is unusual in the literature turned out on these subjects. Axes have to be ground, points scored, facts forced to fit national or religious prejudices or economic theories. Writers set out to deal objectively with "food and population" only to find themselves emotionally involved in "hunger and sex," and there are always politicians, priests, and defenders of the taxpayer's pocket only too ready to further the confusion. Even the disinterested rarely see that the problem can be tackled from both ends. One school puts all its faith in the synthesis of proteins, the transforming of plankton, the more equitable sharing of the planet's resources, and is sure that population limitation is impossible, foolish, and unnecessary. The other school, alarmed by the fact that the world's population is increasing by about twenty-eight million a year, warns that if we do not arrest it rapidly, even to the extent of withholding penicillin—from races other than our own—we are all headed for extinction by self-strangulation.

Into this murky emotionalism a group of British scientists have dropped a little book so honest and sensible, so full of solutions which mean hard work but are deduced from scientific facts, and so lacking in appeals to fear, greed, and prudery, that it is unlikely to be paid the slightest attention.

In the first chapter they present the problem: "Within the lifetime of some of our children the world's population may be expected to reach 4,000 millions. It stands at present at about 2,300 millions. . . . How shall we work the miracle of feeding the 4,000 millions?" Then follow chapters on soil conservation, the use of manure, genetics and food, improvement of pigs, milk supply and crops, the use of fish, the processing of food, and the circumvention of waste.

Each contributor is distinguished in his own field, and all show a familiarity with what is being done in their fields in the rest of the world. They also have a refreshing ability to write simply, though no amount of good writing can make such subjects easy going for the general reader.

In the last essay it is remarked that "the world's population problem has been largely created by the uneven application of science; the solution depends on whether the farmer and the biochemist can restore that uneasy balance between food and population which the engineer and the doctor have upset." Noting that science has removed the greatest check on population growth—disease—the author concludes that "it falls to the biochemist not only to improve the food supply but also to improve contraceptive technique."

The kind of detachment which makes it possible for one contributor to write that "the development of contraception permits some dissociation of the birth rate from the moral code" will give a vested interest in the neglect of this book to those who would rather we all perished than permit any such dissociation. The rest of us should make efforts to see that it is read and studied.

Epic in Technicolor

SPARTACUS. By Howard Fast. Published by the Author. $3.

MR. FAST'S new novel was presumably rejected by a sufficient number of publishers to convince him that it would be necessary to publish it himself. This raises several interesting questions as to the responsibility of commercial publishers to bring out books by previously successful authors whose political opinions, as expressed beyond the confines of their books, are distasteful to most Americans; for Mr. Fast's latest novel contains no ideas that could not be wholeheartedly accepted by all men of good-will, and it exhibits no diminution of the special talents that have in the past won him substantial audiences and royalties. Apparently, therefore, the publishers who rejected "Spartacus" decided to forgo the substantial profits that might very well have been theirs in order not to have to defend the inclusion on their list of an author closely associated with the Communist Party.

As for the book itself, it tells of the slave revolt against the dying Roman republic led by the remarkable Spartacus, who has already been celebrated from a somewhat different angle by Arthur Koestler in his early novel "The Gladiators." Mr. Fast has chosen to recount the tale in a curious series of parenthetical reminiscences which zigzag backward and forward in time, perhaps because he hoped in this way to raise the curtain from the clouded past as Robert Graves has done, and to show us a fragment of revolutionary history as it was experienced not only by its participants but by those members of the ruling class who were only peripherally affected by it.

The result, however, is that the impact of the story is diffused and scattered, and it is to be doubted that readers will carry away a coherent memory of the sequence of events that led to Spartacus and the slaves becoming masters for a time of all southern Italy. What they will remember with some vividness is Mr. Fast's description of crucified slaves along the Roman highways, of gladiatorial combat, of pitched battles against the Roman legions.

Mr. Fast's conception of history is not really much different from that of Cecil B. DeMille. His technicolor characters are determinedly banal, stubbornly refusing to speak in any other accents than those we have come to expect from the heroes and heroines of the movie epics. He has provided Spartacus with a lovely and loyal wife named Varinia, and as if to make sure that we will not miss the point, he has contrasted their splendid fidelity with the homosexual carryings on of the degenerate members of the master class. The prose style of "Spartacus" is congruous with the delineation of the characters.

There is an epilogue, in which Mr. Fast thanks the anonymous contributors who have made possible the publication of the book. The last sentence reads as follows: "He hopes that for some future edition, at a time when it would not subject them to danger and reprisal, to be able to name these people to extend personal thanks to each in turn."

One can only wonder what will be the reaction of readers in the Soviet Union, where Mr. Fast seems now to be regarded as America's greatest living writer, to the translation of this celebration of a great slave laborers' revolt.

"three days' fight" at Waterloo; a fitting companion piece to Stendhal's famous vignette of the battle in "The Charterhouse of Parma," and of the long and arduous contra-dance up and down the Iberian Peninsula. This is war in all its boredom and ferocity as the common soldier has seen it in every age.

A GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS. By E. E. Schattschneider, Victor Jones, and Stephen K. Bailey. William Sloane Associates. $1.50. Three Wesleyan professors have produced the most useful handbook for the study of politics. Labor unions, League of Women Voters, and citizens anxious to understand the operation of government will find it indispensable. In ten brief chapters, annotated and illustrated by pages reproduced from innumerable references, the authors have provided techniques to enable any citizen to find out the facts about public affairs. With skilfully selected examples the reader is shown "how to" read a newspaper, a budget, a statute, a judicial decision, and how to study a pressure group, a federal government agency or department, the record of a Congressman, or the operation of a city government. Throughout, the authors demonstrate "that the task of knowing about public affairs is infinitely simpler than is generally made out."

THE VICTORIAN TEMPER. By Jerome Hamilton Buckley. Harvard. $4.50. After an interesting beginning, in which some of the conflicting opinions about the period are reviewed and the numerous little-known English poems inspired by Goethe's "Faust" are surveyed, Professor Buckley's discussion of Victorian culture loses its sense of direction. It is full of names, dates, quotations, and allusions, but it suffers fatally from the lack of any apparent principle of organization. In his preface the author offers his work as a study of the "moral aesthetic," but it attempts to be too many other things besides. As a result, it boils down to a series of discussions set end to end for no clear purpose. It is impressive only in its scope. The author's intention seems to have been descriptive rather than definitive, and his production opens to serious question the value of literary "surveys" intended to give their readers a knowledge of literature while sparing them an experience of it. It could not have been Professor Buckley's intention to write a textbook, for he makes no attempt to proportion his discussion adequately. He could hardly have meant to give students a clear picture of Victorian culture by treating W. H. Mallock in greater detail than George Eliot, and devoting as much attention to Bailey as to Browning.

Films

MANNY
FARBER

A LONGSIDE "Boots Malone," a race-park drama executed in a relaxed and mobile fashion, most of the current films appear to be moving on club feet. The story in capsule form shows a track-struck rich kid being adopted by a jaded jockey's agent, put through an intensive training, and turned into an expert bug-boy. The necessary problems are provided along the way by a quiet, matter-of-fact, grim syndicate that muscles the agent, who is for a hero surprisingly timorous; also there is a snobbish mother who probably learned her acting trade at the rodeo—she practically throws her eyebrows off her face. It is fashionable these days to show corruption in the United States; so the story has all but one of the jockeys, trainers, and so on merrily fenagling with horses and mutuel prices. All this corruption is probably exaggerated but treated with remarkable plausibility: the techniques and documentation obviously derive from a thoroughgoing knowledge of the sport of kings and bookies. The only possible moral is that horse-racing is a fascinating sport but don't place too much confidence in your scratch sheet.

There has been so much blowing on what is stale in this movie and what is wonderful—paddock lingo and lore—that I won't swell its volume, except to suggest that kid athletes are not likely to learn their profession via the ABC instruction meted out by the agent to his apprentice rider. I suspect that if basketball coaches told the rookie players to dribble in zigzags, keep their eyes on the basket, or imparted any other kindergarten knowledge, there would be an outbreak of assassinations in American athletics. Ninety-nine per cent of American athletes learn their trade in their own way, and I see no reason why jockeys should depart from the norm. Such instruction ("Cock your knees, grab a handful of mane . . .") is there to please the critics who like educational movies and the chalk-sniffers who want to peep into the bowels of their favorite sport. As for the authentic racing talk ("fourteen-karat slow-bones," or "You don't make a claim on a one-horse owner"), quite a bit of it is sensitive, accurate, and illuminating. I remember with delight a race-track scrounger chortling with glee and using his winning mutuel tickets as blinkers, and the stark sentences: "All horses respect is force. They are mere brutes who have had all the intelligence bred out of them." And the entire handling of a fat, rich "win-crazy" owner is one of the most accurate examples of greed that I have seen this year. But a good deal of the fancy talk is contrived, and it hangs between people like tiny, misshapen dirigibles.

Milton Holmes, a movie specialist who writes only horse epics, is a born story-teller even if his stuff runs to pulp. His script treats the actuality of working for a living and does it without those short cuts that chop current movies into static fragments. The kid is shown learning how to ride on back-to-back chairs, a bale of hay, a chalk drawing, and finally race horses; this variety of mounts is obviously a gimmick for avoiding monotony, but it makes for a genuine movie atmosphere in which you see figures involved with racing and nothing else from dawn to midnight. This type of continuous and untightened narration gives actors room for small natural movements which never seem to get into a movie like "Detective Story," where close perspectives and absence of action force the actors into slightly hysterical business with eyes, lips, and hands. Holden, as the tarnished agent, is a dour sort who usually muffs the climactic scenes that demand big emotion (the pocket-picking in the beginning), but he is masterful in these realistic stretches—doing some relaxed coaching in the starting gate or galloping along with the boy telling him how to whip his mount (the best working shots I've seen in recent films). Holmes knows and likes the sights of a race track well enough to waste footage on the trip to the diner, motel life near the track, and the unrelated wanderings of a racing troupe stuck on the highway. This last scene, with its credible terrain and each shot connected into a line of actions that lead easily and logically from one thing to another, seems rather wonderful when compared to any of the vulgar settings and crazily viewed scenes of such over-touted masterpieces as "Streetcar" and "A Place in the Sun." "Boots Malone" is no world-beater, but it does show professional men actually working; the surface of their lives is almost real; and thanks to Holden, the story tells you a good deal about the grace, recessiveness, and quiet discernments of a moderately gifted man going nowhere.

A word or two further about the acting. However he does it, Holden seems in constant motion standing still; his posture, coloring, and disinterested technique are so perfectly adjusted to a natural setting that he appears to be a worn, moving part of the air currents in a scene. Basil Ruysdael's kindly trainer is so full of lofty spiritual feeling and the visual qualities of a daguerreotype that he could be a farmer who wandered off the set of "Tolable David" into this picture of corruption at the tracks. The rich kid, done in a controlled, over-trained Broadway style by Johnny Stewart, is just this side of revolting.

Also recommended: "Five Fingers," "The Captive City," "Los Olvidados."

RCA VICTOR'S second group of LP records with dubbings of recordings by famous singers of the past again includes one devoted entirely to Caruso's performances. Most of them offer nothing that was not already offered, in better music, by the performances on the first record; but two—the 1908 Ab, si, ben mio and 1906 Di quella pira from "Il Trovatore"—are interesting as fine examples of Caruso's singing in the early years when his voice was light in color (the high C's of Di quella pira come out as B's).

An entire record also is devoted to Ponselle, and rightly, since hers was one of the most extraordinarily beautiful voices ever heard at the Metropolitan. Its voluminously sumptuous beauty is reproduced perfectly by the 1926 electrical recordings of two arias from "La Vestale," but with alteration of its color by the dubbings from noisy-surfaced shellac pressings of the 1924 acoustic recordings of the Willow Song and Ave Maria from "Otello." I hear nothing in a 1924 "Home, Sweet Home" (with the voice altered in color) and a 1936 Schubert "Ave Maria" (with an offensive violin obbligato) that compelled their inclusion in place of, say, the acoustically recorded performances of arias from "Ernani" and "La Forza del Destino," which are two of the best.

The record devoted to McCormack offers his 1910 performances of arias from "L'Elisir d'Amore" and "Lucia"—superb examples of the flawless taste with which he used his beautiful voice in Italian opera. But for the rest there are Wagner's "Träume" and O König from "Tristan," recorded in the thirties—the voice rough, the singing undistinguished; and instead of reissuing his performances of Schubert and Wolf, Victor wastes space on the trashy songs on which he wasted his talent.

Hempel, to whom an entire record might have been devoted, doesn't, in Victor's estimation, rate even a place on the omnibus record Stars of the Golden Age. And though Battistini, Melba, and Destinn are included this time, Battistini's powers in quiet sustained melody are not employed in a duet from "Ernani" and Melba is not impressive in Voi che sapete from "Figaro." Also, what Galli-Curci did to Sempre libera from "La Traviata" in 1919 and her slithering about in "Song of India" in 1930 should have been kept hidden;
Scotti's L'Onore! from "Falstaff" is undistinguished; Bori's voice had become unpleasantly edged by 1928 when she recorded Un bel di from "Madama Butterfly"; and Tetrizzini is not at her most impressive in Veracini's simple "Pastoral." On the other hand the record offers an outstanding Caruso performance, his 1906 M'appari from
"Marta," with Destinn's Suicidio! from "La Gioconda," Homer's Mon coeur from "Samson et Dalila," and Ruffo's
1920 Pari siamo from "Rigoletto."

On the record Famous Duets are several beautiful performances. Alma Gluck's lovely voice is heard with Caruso's in Libiamo from Act 1 of "La Traviata"; Bori and McCormack are heard in a 1914 Parigi, o cara from Act 3; the style and taste of Schipa enable one to endure Galli-Curci in a duet from "La Sonnambula"; Gigli sings with beautiful quiet lyricism in the second part of a duet from "Lucia" with Pinza, after sobbing through the first part; Martinelli is impressive in a 1917 duet from "William Tell" with Journet; Farrar's voice is lovely in the Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann" with Scotti (but I would have preferred their Là ci darem la mano from "Don Giovanni"). Space also is given to the Farrar-Caruso duet from "Madama Butterfly" that would better have been given to, say, the Hempel-Amato duet from "La Traviata" or the Gadski-Amato duet from "Il Trovatore."

Except for Gigli's Celeste Aida the record Aida Yesterday offers excellent performances: Rethberg's Ritorna vincitor (cut), the Temple scene with Pinza and Martinelli (his voice tight and enveloped in buzzing distortion), Ponselle's 1923 O patria mia (her voice altered in color by the dubbing from a shellac record which reproduces the performance a half-tone sharp), the Gad-ski-Amato Su, dunque!, the 1924 Pon-selle-Martinelli Pur ti riveggo (her voice altered in color, the performance reproduced a half-tone sharp), the Homer-Caruso Già i sacerdoti.

Decca's second group of Lotte Lehmann's Parlophone recordings offers Porgi amor (in German) from "Figaro," which begins well but gets breathless and comes off the record a little dim; Wie nahe mir der Schlummer from "Der Freischütz," beautifully sung, but with some constricted and shrill high notes; an aria from Strauss's
"Arabella," also beautifully sung; So sei er gut from "Der Rosenkavalier," which is a pale copy of the performance in the great Victor set; and three passages from "Die Fledermaus"—Mein Herr, was dächten Sie, which is enchanting, the Czardas, in which there are again con-stricted and shrill high notes, and the Finale of Act 2 with Tauber, Branzell, and others. The loud passages of "Die Fledermaus" suffer from buzzing distortion.

To turn now to songs, and specifically to the celebrated HMV recording of Aksel Schiotz's performance of Schubert's "Die schöne Müllerin," which has at last been issued here dubbed onto an LP record in Victor's Treasury series:
Schiotz's singing turns out to be agreeable to the ear, his phrasing musically flawless; and wondering why nevertheless the performances of the songs leave me unmoved and disappointed, I think I find the reason to be their lack of vitality and intensity even in the degree demanded by these songs. I find this deficiency also in Gerald Moore's discreet playing of the piano parts; and it is made worse by the lack of brightness and power in the recorded sound.

Endocrinological Error?

Dear Sirs: I enjoyed reading The Malthusian Scarecrow in the February 16 issue of your excellent magazine. However, there is one statement in the article which merits clarification from the endocrinological point of view. I refer to the following: "Fecundation in women is closely related to the amount of estrogen produced in the system. Now since the liver controls the amount of estrogen which is put into the blood stream, anything that impairs the natural functioning of the liver would affect fertility. Protein deficiencies lead to cirrhosis and fatty degeneration of the liver, which in turn cause the release of more estrogen and an increase in reproductive capacity. Sexual appetite, a determinant of fertility, also depends on the amount of estrogen in the system."

Most endocrinologists agree that the amount of estrogen in the body plays only a minor role in stimulating the libido and that too much estrogen suppresses ovulation through the pituitary gland, and therefore would increase the percentage of sterile females, an opinion which is just the opposite of Mr. de Castro's.

Exchange Scholarships

Dear Sirs: Never before in history have countries had so many facilities for getting to know and understand each other as today; and yet one half of the world does not know or has only superficial ideas as to how the other half lives and what it thinks. It may be possible to find reasons for this condition in the case of countries which differ in language or culture or tradition, but it is difficult to explain it in respect to America and Britain.

Apart from ordinary travel—which may be enjoyable though not profoundly instructive—Anglo-American exchanges have been practiced for many years, although they have been confined mainly to the academic, scientific, and industrial fields. Since the war the valuable interchange of teachers has been initiated, as well as the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt plans. All these measures are to be greatly applauded, but none of them appear to recognize sufficiently the social revolution which the world is undergoing, or the resulting emergence of the common man. The common man has been somewhat ignored or treated in Cinderella-fashion in the Anglo-American exchanges.

I founded, therefore, in 1947 Transatlantic Foundation for the purpose of arranging Anglo-American exchanges of young people in spheres which were not covered by governmental or other agencies and which were to include the common man. In this connection it seemed well to remember that those of academic or similar status need not necessarily have, while people in other occupations may possibly have, wide liberal interests, social enthusiasm, and the urge and ability to spread the gospel of Anglo-American understanding.

At the suggestion of the then general secretary of the Workers' Education Association, Mr. Ernest Green, I approached Ruskin College, which occupies probably a unique position in the two countries as a workers' college. Founded by the American historian Charles Beard, it serves, par excellence, adult education in its broadest sense, with the added advantage of being located at Oxford. Fortunately, it had a few vacant places which enabled me to fix up five scholarships, based on one year's free board and study which I decided to donate for the benefit of American trade-unionists. I took this decision to fill a blank in the exchange field, although I have no connection with labor. An American committee was constituted by Mr. Harold Taylor, president of Sarah Lawrence College, which included representatives from the Institute of International Education, American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations, American Labor and Workers' Educational Services, and industrial employers. Simultaneously, Transatlantic Foundation set up on the British side an advisory council comprising a political economist, the editor of the Economist, the rector of Lincoln College, and representatives of the British Trades Union Congress, Workers' Education Association, Ruskin College, and Poinby Hall.

Working through trade-union machinery, the American committee chose, among two hundred applicants, five suitable persons. Thus a start was made to put the idea of Transatlantic Foundation into action. The five first American scholars found their experience enormously stimulating and valuable, while the British college profited, in turn, from the presence of Americans in its midst. The success of this beginning was undoubted, and we felt justified in trying to broaden the basis of the plan. We therefore approached the Trades Union Congress Educational Trust and also a fund of which the late Ernest Bevin was a trustee. Both organizations agreed to fall into line and to assume the responsibility for four scholarships, which they carried for some years. The T. U. C. is still carrying two and the writer one at present. In addition to Ruskin College, scholarships have now also been made available to young Americans at Harlech and Fircroft Colleges, which are likewise prominent in the field of adult education. Since the beginning, the American scholars have been drawn from all parts of the Union and from such varying occupations as business agent, telephone operator, union organizer, farmer, linotype operator, worker's counselor, automobile worker, educator, journalist, research worker, truck driver, seaman, librarian. Over twenty have returned to their own country, much enriched by the knowledge which they gained during their stay in Britain and immensely broadened in their outlook.

Since Transatlantic Foundation aims at exchanges, the reader may desire to know the American side of the plan. Unfortunately, this has not developed to any measurable extent. At the present moment there are only four young people from Britain who are enjoying scholarships granted to them at Antioch, Sarah Lawrence, and two Midwestern girls' colleges. So it is evident that something has to be done to make the plan truly reciprocal. It is not for us in Britain to say whether the initiative should come from independent individuals, from organizations such as the C. I. O. and A. F. of L., or from local unions. The outlook on exchanges of some American labor leaders is so well known that it would be indeed surprising if there were further delay. Not only all associated on both sides of the Atlantic with Transatlantic Foundation but also many young people in Britain are eagerly awaiting offers of scholarships and the chance of visiting the United States.

It will, I hope, be realized that the kind of education which Transatlantic Foundation envisages is not vocational or technical in any narrow sense. We seek to deal with people who, having reached a measure of maturity in the field, factory, workshop, or elsewhere, crave for further education, particularly those Americans who are keen to learn about conditions in Britain—and vice versa. . . . In the United States emphasis in workers' education is perhaps laid on "provide the tools for the job"; that is, preparing the student for growing into an effective trade-union leader and instructing him in labor legislation and collective-bargaining techniques. These things are not ignored in Britain, although the main aim may be to provide a liberal education in the humanities and to equip the student for accepting social responsibility within the community. An attempt is made to teach him not what, but rather how, to think.

In these grave disturbed times each country depends largely on its leaders, not merely in the political but also in the labor field, on men not only of character, personality, and moral stature, but also of trained intellect and wide experience. Transatlantic Foundation hopes that it may be allowed to play its own small part and, at the same time, to contribute toward Anglo-American friendship.

Dear Sirs: By restricting my answer to Lattimore to 300 words you force me to reduce to a few sentences the discussion of a problem that is politically immeasurably more important than the Lysenko-Mendel issue. I shall therefore not comment on Lattimore's lapse of memory regarding my political past. A man who cannot remember his visit to the President of the United States can hardly be expected to recall his talks with me.

This much, however, for the record:

1. In September, 1935, Lattimore wrote Frederick V. Field: ". . . I have just been traveling with Wittfogel, who, as you probably know and I dimly suspect, is a bit of a heretic from either the Stalinist or the Trotskyist point of view, when it comes to the bourgeois feudal controversy over the nature of Chinese society." Clearly Lattimore knew my scientific and my political position then.

2. Lattimore's attempt to laugh off the political significance of words like "feudal" and "feudal survivals" in describing Asiatic societies comes oddly from one who himself emphasized the role they play in official Soviet ideology. In March, 1944, in Pacific Affairs Lattimore lists Stalin's concept of "feudal survivals" as among the "paramount Communist theses" that "a Communist writer has . . . to maintain" when dealing with China; and he notes that "the social data are somewhat obscured by loosely used terms like 'semi-feudal' and 'feudal survivals'." In the late 1940's and without explanation Lattimore shifted from his view of the "bureaucratic" nature of Chinese society to the "feudal" position required of scientists of the U. S. S. R.

At times the "feudal" terminology is used in good faith but naively for civilizations ruled by a managerial bureaucracy. For Japan it is generally accepted as correct. Lattimore, who despite his pro-Soviet leanings once upheld the "bureaucratic" theory, which seemed only slightly heretical and which was scientifically so productive, can hardly plead ignorance on these points now.

. . . Lattimore

Dear Sirs: I thank the editors of The Nation for giving me the opportunity to comment on Dr. Wittfogel's letter. I have no comment to make other than to point out that this kind of tortured polemic by Wittfogel was accepted by the McCarran committee as "evidence" in a supposedly serious investigation.

Forgotten Actor?

Dear Sirs: In The Nation's review of "Golden Boy" the actor who played the part of the "ham" prizefighter was praised, but his name—Arthur O'Connell—was omitted. This often happens to actors in minor roles, and they take it hard since their bread and butter depend on good notices.

"this desperate fight ..."

What the 2nd Big Foley Square Trial means to you.

THE LATE HAROLD L. ICKES SAID:

"...this trial may well prove to be one of the most important constitutional lawsuits of our time."

Standing in the dock before Judge and Jury in Foley Square Federal Court are 16 New Yorkers ... your fellow Americans ... on trial—charged with violating the Smith Act.

These Communists are not the only ones on trial. You ... your ideas, your thoughts, your liberties ... are on trial, too!

In an historic letter expressing regret that he was not physically strong enough to join the legal staff of the 16 defendants, Harold L. Ickes wrote:

"I dearly wish that I might engage in this desperate fight to protect our liberties from further whittling ..."

Thinking of his own two children, Ickes emphasized the grave danger in the Smith Act in these words:

"I also owe them whatever I am reasonably capable of doing ... to preserve for them and their children the liberties that you and I have been able to enjoy, and felt assurance of, until the unfortunate majority opinion was handed down by the Supreme Court in the earlier Communist (Smith Act) Case."

▶ None of these 16 defendants has been charged with criminal acts.

▶ They have been charged only with such acts as mailing letters, attending meetings, writing articles, etc.

▶ If convicted, they face long prison terms.

▶ If convicted, all our Constitutional rights and liberties will be in jeopardy!

The swift repeal of the Smith Act is a sheer necessity for the maintenance of the Bill of Rights.

Yet, such repeal can be hastened and assured only by you—the people. The distinguished journalist, I. F. Stone, said of this case:

"...The Smith Act may begin to be 'repealed' in the court. There is a fighting chance, if not for acquittal, then for reversal on appeal."

A FIGHTING CHANCE! WILL YOU TAKE IT? WILL YOU HELP US ASSURE A COURTROOM VICTORY? WILL YOU HELP US TO START THE REPEAL OF THE SMITH ACT IN THE COURTS?

We urgently need your full support!

Such support requires taking no position on the political program of the defendants. It requires only the defense of their Constitutional rights as Americans. And by defending their rights we defend the rights of ALL Americans!

FUNDS ARE NEEDED for legal expenses, to issue literature, to sponsor radio broadcasts, to print advertisements, pamphlets and leaflets, and to utilize other media to inform and arouse the people to preserve their rights and liberties. CONTRIBUTE NOW!

The Shape of Things

FRENCH COLONIALISM HAS LEARNED LITTLE from the loss of Syria and Lebanon, little even from the bloody stalemate in Indo-China. When the French authorities in Tunisia arrested the Premier and several ministers, declared martial law, and forced the aged Bey to accept a pro-French Premier, they appeared to believe that their coup de main had settled things. Acting briskly, Jean de Hauteclocque, the Resident General, had himself appointed Foreign Minister, while the new Premier, M. Baccouche, searched for men willing to join a Cabinet set up to do French bidding. At the same time, and in the same tradition, de Hauteclocque came up with a program of domestic reform, offering an approach toward internal autonomy by very slow stages, while retaining for France many special powers including a veto over the decisions of Tunisian ministers. By completing these moves with brutal speed, France checkmated the Asian and African countries sponsoring a complaint to the Security Council that French rule in Tunisia represented a threat to international peace and security. Their request for a debate was lost without a vote when the United States delegation received orders from Washington not to support it. But the issue is far from closed. There will be more trouble in Tunisia and more protests in the U. N. As the Chairman of the Council, Dr. Ahmed Bokhari of Pakistan, said in a bitter, indignant speech from the floor: "To whom else can the Tunisians come if not the United Nations? . . . What is the United Nations for?" Once more the dictates of Atlantic diplomacy have aligned the United States with the colonial powers; Russia, Nationalist China, Chile, Brazil, and Pakistan were prepared to support the Tunisian complaint. Washington's role will not be admired in those countries it hopes to save from "neutrality" and the blandishments of Moscow.

THE REPUBLICAN PRIMARIES IN NEBRASKA and Wisconsin seem to have pleased everyone: Taft is elated; the Eisenhower leaders are "optimistic"; Warren is satisfied, Stassen cheerful. The results were not surprising. Both states are part of Taft's ideological terrain. Taft also enjoyed the benefit of powerful organized support, and his investment in time, energy, and funds was enormous. Neither state has a significantly large independent or "shifting" vote; there was little crossing of party lines. Under the circumstances Taft's vote was sufficiently large to keep him in the running but not large enough to offset the advantage Eisenhower currently enjoys. The ludicrously opportunistic Mr. Stassen—the Republican vote-splitter—was naturally pleased to make any showing at all, even if his intervention in Wisconsin gave twenty-four delegates to Taft. The candidate who has the most reason to be pleased with the Wisconsin primary is Governor Earl Warren, who kept expenditures to a minimum in the campaign. He was a late starter; his campaign was hastily improvised; he had to commute from Sacramento; and his delegates were a hybrid lot. Yet he picked up six delegates, made no enemies, and with the aid of those experienced campaigners, his two daughters, left a pleasant impression. Warren is certain to be a powerful figure in the Republican convention; indeed his influence could be decisive. Senator Kefauver also has good reason to be gratified: in Wisconsin he picked up an important delegation for a minimum investment and in Nebraska he not only defeated Senator Kerr by an impressive margin but knocked the Oklahoman out of the race. As a candidate Kefauver warrants much more serious consideration than he has received to date; he knows when to box and when to punch. His two-fisted attack on Kerr in Nebraska was perfectly timed and left little to be desired on the score of frankness.

LANCASHIRE'S COTTON INDUSTRY FOUND the boom it had been riding shot from under it at the end of last year and now seems headed for an alarming bust. According to Anthony Greenwood, Lancashire Labor M. P., who called the attention of the House of Commons to the situation recently, 70,000 workers, between one-fifth and one-fourth of the industry's labor force, are now unemployed or working part-time. Many mills have shut down, and others are working for stock and will have to close soon unless buying revives. But apart from some accelerated government orders, it is difficult to see where new business will come from. Depression in the textile industries—wool is as hard hit as cotton, and even synthetics are feeling the pinch—is now world-wide. Unemployment in New England is at least as severe as in Lancashire, and similar tales of woe are being heard in Belgium, Canada, Japan, and Australia. The immediate trouble in textiles appears to be the aftermath of the unprecedented boom which followed the outbreak of the Korean war. Manufacturers then rushed to obtain raw materials, egged on by ill-timed Washington announcements of large-scale government stockpiling; wholesalers and retailers built up inventories frantically; consumers bought with both fists, remembering the textile famine during the last war. When the scare subsided, linen closets, wardrobes, and bureau drawers were well filled, and even big price concessions failed to move goods. This is the short-term position, which presumably will be gradually alleviated if other sections of the economy remain prosperous. However, the textile industries also face serious long-term problems involving such factors as the tendency of manufacturing to shift, nationally and internationally, to cheaper labor markets and the effect of the development of synthetics on natural fibers. In the near future we plan to publish two articles by Keith Hutchison discussing both the immediate situation in textiles with emphasis on the American scene, and the outlook for the future.

Morris, McGrath, & Hoover

PUBLIC discussion of the Morris-McGrath fiasco has not yet penetrated to the basic issue nor has the key figure been publicly identified. The issue may be simply stated. Investigation has shown corruption to be fairly widespread in certain federal agencies and in the legislative branch. But aside from the abortive Morris affair, the investigations have been under the exclusive control of Congressional committees whose members, regardless of party affiliation, have upheld a dual standard of ethics: one for government officials, another for Representatives and Senators. When Grunewald's relations with Charles Oliphant were under scrutiny, the questions came thick and fast, but when his relations with Senators Brewster and Bridges were accidentally brought to light, the discussion became polite and meaningless.

If it was unrealistic to expect McGrath to authorize a real investigation of the Department of Justice, it is equally unrealistic to expect Congress to investigate itself. And just as it would be dangerous to permit roving Congressional committees to harass the Administration by endless investigations, so it would be dangerous to permit the Executive to keep members of Congress under a surveillance which could be used for political purposes. Nor should a permanent law-enforcement agency like the FBI be assigned the job of investigating corruption in either branch of the government. The FBI must seek appropriations from Congress; moreover, it is conceivable that some corruption might be found in the Bureau itself, not to mention the department to which it belongs.

Presumably it was with these thoughts in mind that Truman approved the appointment of Morris as an independent investigator. But the President had not reckoned with J. Edgar Hoover. It is now clear that from the first Hoover wanted his FBI to participate in any investigation and at the same time to be itself immune from investigation.

Hoover began to show signs of uneasiness the moment Newbold Morris was appointed. His uneasiness became more apparent after March 10, when it was revealed that Mr. Morris did not intend to rely upon FBI investigators and that he had failed to appoint alumni of the FBI to his staff. Hoover's uneasiness seems to have been immediately communicated to certain Senators and Representatives, who would probably have shared his feeling, however, without any prompting. One might have expected anti-Administration elements in Congress to support an independent investigation of corruption in the executive branch of government conducted by an able Republican lawyer, the more so since there was good reason to believe that Mr. Morris meant business. To be sure, Mr. Morris had said that all public officials, including Congressmen, who earned more than $10,000 should fill out a pesky questionnaire about net financial worth, but the Congressional opposition has another explanation.

In a broadcast on March 16 Walter Winchell suggested that Max Lowenthal, author of a book on the FBI and J. Edgar Hoover's pet hate, had recommended Newbold Morris for the job of chief investigator. A few days later Representative George A. Dondero repeated the statement. These were the individuals who had previously raised the hue and cry that Lowenthal was attempting to engineer the removal of McGrath (see, The White House Under Surveillance, The Nation, February 16, 1952). Both men are cronies of Mr. Hoover's. Their new theme was immediately picked up by David Sentner of the Hearst press. Then, on March 18, Representative Patrick H. Hillings complained that Mr. Morris had not been cleared by the FBI. A few days later Senator Pat McCarran demanded an investigation to determine who had recommended Morris, and finally Representative Francis E. Walter proposed that the entire corruption inquiry be turned over to the FBI.

It did not take Mr. Morris long to realize the source of his difficulties. On March 19 he told the press that the one unit of the Department of Justice he did not intend to investigate was the FBI, and he went out of his way to say that questionnaires were not being sent to FBI personnel. He never explained just why J. Edgar Hoover should not fill out the same questionnaire he had asked the Attorney General to answer. In the same interview Mr. Morris carefully denied that Lowenthal had prepared the famous questionnaire. Even these elaborate assurances, however, failed to quiet Mr. Hoover's strange fears. When McGrath read his curt dismissal of Morris to the reporters, he was conspicuously flanked by the top G-man.

Although J. Edgar's support was not sufficient to keep Mr. McGrath from being fired, he was able to block an independent investigation. The newly appointed Attorney General, James Patrick McGranery, in his first statement to the press, announced that he would rely upon the FBI to investigate corruption in government and that there would be no "outside" aid. Nor will any use now be made of the Morris questionnaire. Nor will an investigation be made of the FBI or of the need to place its entire personnel under civil service. Thanks to McCarthy, McCarran, and Nixon, aided by J. Edgar Hoover, the investigation has not merely been set back to where it was two months ago—it has been blocked.

The "resignation" of McGrath is the one net gain of the investigation to date. The Nation was one of the first publications to suggest that his removal would be definitely in the public interest. "I have done my duty," he now says, "I have stood up for what I believe to be great principles of personal liberty and the fundamental rights of employees of the federal government." It is a measure of McGrath's candor and intelligence that he should ask the public to believe that the filling out of a simple questionnaire on net worth would jeopardize personal liberty and the fundamental rights of federal employees. Presumably it is perfectly proper to cross-examine citizens on their political beliefs, to force federal employees who are not Cabinet officers to take test oaths, and to turn Congressional inquiries into savage witch-hunting forays. No Attorney General since A. Mitchell Palmer has had a worse record on the score of protecting personal liberties and the fundamental rights of government employees than McGrath. But it was in his remarks on March 16 to the Sons and Daughters of Eire, when he implied that he was being investigated because of his "faith and race," that McGrath revealed his true colors. This crude attempt to use religion as protective political coloration was of a piece with the suggestion that a request for financial information from public officers might undermine the Bill of Rights.

As for Mr. McGrath's successor, it should be noted for the record that Philadelphia's District Attorney Richardson Dilworth, a Democrat, has protested his appointment in these words: "The appointment of McGranery as Attorney General of the United States is so bad as to be almost unbelievable. For the regime of McGranery will be marked by incompetence, bias, favoritism, and ward politics at its worst."

Only an independent inquiry by a commission appointed for the special purpose, with authority to select its own staff and under orders to disband upon completion of its work, can cope with the issue of corruption as it has arisen in this instance. Instead of facing the problem and drawing the obvious conclusion, the President has surrendered to his enemies in Congress, aided and abetted by Mr. Hoover, and has thereby forfeited the chance to turn the corruption issue to his own and his country's advantage.

Stalin and Germany

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

STALIN'S message to the American editors, his farewell statement to the Indian Ambassador, the announcement at the Moscow economic conference of Russia's readiness to expand foreign trade with capitalist countries, all indicate that the Kremlin is prepared to apply the formula of "total diplomacy," once advocated by Secretary Acheson, at every point where the possibility of negotiation still survives. But this series of moves did not alter the fact that Moscow's note of March 10 marked the start of a new Russian policy on Germany.

The Soviet note has had an electric effect on those who consider the rearmament of Germany, whether undertaken by the Russians or the Americans, to be the most threatening development of the cold war. But it is not enough merely to record one's disapproval; it is also necessary to recall the circumstances under which the shift in Russia's policy took place. Otherwise the gravity of this most important event will be missed.

From the beginning Germany has been the focus of East-West conflict—the place where a truce could be achieved or the two sides must confront each other in dangerous proximity on terms excluding any agreement. But matters took a turn for the worse only last fall, when it became clear that the rearmament of West Germany had become the central item of American strategy. On the opening of the Sixth United Nations Assembly in Paris last November, I wrote that Moscow would revise its policy should it become convinced that the United States was determined to reject all negotiation on Germany out of fear that any kind of talk with the Russians would endanger the American military program. The Russian note of March 10 was the product of just such a revision of policy, as will be all Russia's moves in the coming months. The note reflected no transitory state of mind; it was neither improvisation nor fleeting maneuver; it was a major action resulting from long and earnest deliberation.

Moscow's conviction that the United States had turned its back upon negotiations as a means of settling the German problem was buttressed by a long series of events: the conference at Lisbon, the breakdown of French resistance to the rearmament of Germany, the mounting probability that General Eisenhower—the man of NATO—would be the next President of the United States, the State Department's aggressive disapproval of American participation in the Moscow Economic Conference, which had been called precisely for the purpose of attracting business men from the United States.

After analysis of the international situation in January and February had convinced the Soviet leaders that there was no likelihood of a change in the American attitude, they concentrated on handling the German problem in a way that would completely disrupt Washington's German policy. That they must have expected their proposals of March 10 to be rejected was indicated by the comments of the Soviet press and radio before the reply was received. But they could reasonably expect that the European members of the Atlantic coalition, beginning with Mr. Churchill, would insist—as in fact Mr. Churchill did—on an answer preserving at least the appearance of a desire for a settlement. In other words, the Russians could count on a communication which would justify the dispatch of a second note—and a third and a fourth if that served their purposes.

It has been rightly said that the Russians are running a great risk in sponsoring a united, independent, and rearmed Germany. They have as much reason as the rest of the world to fear the revival of German power. It is now known that the other Cominform members were stunned by the change in Soviet policy. But the Russians may be hoping to reduce the threat if their proposal becomes a reality. They have confidentially assured their Cominform colleagues that the Germany of tomorrow would have an army only large enough to protect its neutrality, certainly a smaller army than West Germany expects to have under NATO. In any case, in the eyes of Moscow the danger offered by such a Germany would be less immediate and less formidable than that which Russia would face if the military capacity of West Germany were added to that of the Atlantic coalition backed by the mobilized industrial capacity of the United States.

For a long time many of the leading European experts on Russian policy have maintained that the one thing which might decide the Soviet Union to go to war would be the rearmament of West Germany. Under these circumstances it is not so extraordinary that the Soviet leaders are willing to take the risk implied in their note of March 10.

The difficult position in which Moscow has placed all the movements and parties that have made prevention of German rearmament their main purpose was reflected in the long deliberations in Paris of the "Partisans of Peace," called together to take a stand in regard to the new Russian policy. Finally they came out with a statement that left no doubt about their feelings; M. Yves Farge, leader of the French "Partisans," delivered an important speech reaffirming his hostility to "any form of German rearmament." But nobody at the meeting harbored any illusion that the Moscow decision was of a temporary character.

That the United States will now be confronted by a series of actions expressing Moscow's new German strategy has been recognized by the conservative and well-informed Wall Street Journal in an article on March 31 by Joseph E. Evans. "Now, if for any reasons of their own," Mr. Evans wrote, "the Soviets should really want a united Germany, the United States is in the odd position where it must either oppose it—thereby earning German hatred—or give in slowly, grudgingly, and at the expense of the present policy which has cost it much in time and money. That is the trap which the United States created for itself, ready for the Soviets to spring at any time."

Moscow will not have an easy victory. The United States is going to fight now more determinedly than ever to make West Germany the hard core of its rearmament program. Should this prove successful, even though anti-Adenauer feeling is mounting throughout Germany, then the whole issue will return to its point of origin, and the Russians will have to make up their minds whether to accept defeat on this central issue or to take more drastic action.

Stevenson of Illinois

BY ALAN WHITNEY

Chicago
WHEN the politically unknown Adlai E. Stevenson was elected Governor of Illinois in 1948 by a record-breaking plurality of 572,000 votes, many local political observers contended that the magnitude of his victory should be attributed less to his own strength than to his opponent's weakness. They may have been partly right. But today few persons would bet against Stevenson's ability to repeat the accomplishment, regardless of who his rival might be.

A poll taken in Chicago several months ago by a professional agency at the behest of Republican ward leaders indicated that Stevenson would get 10 per cent of the votes cast by registered Republicans if he ran for reelection. That his stock as a Presidential candidate has been boosted by Truman's withdrawal is small comfort to the Grand Old Party in Illinois and offers no cause for rejoicing to Republicans nationally. For here is one Democratic office-holder who seems almost immune to the ills that now rack his party at various levels throughout the country. This political amateur who looks and talks like a kindly professor of English has aroused amazement, apprehension, and grudging admiration among the professionals since he first stepped before a hostile legislature early in 1949.

Although his name meant nothing to most Illinois voters in 1948, Stevenson had had experience in important but unglamorous federal offices, and his ancestors had been prominent in politics, both state and national, for generations. His grandfather, for whom he was named, was Vice-President during Grover Cleveland's second term in the White House, and his father, Lewis Stevenson, was Secretary of State of Illinois from 1914 to 1916. A great-grandfather on the maternal side, Jesse W. Fell, was a close associate of Abraham Lincoln.

Born fifty-two years ago in Los Angeles, where his father was then a newspaper executive, Stevenson was brought to Bloomington, Illinois, at the age of six. He grew up in that college and farm-market town of 40,000 inhabitants, where his mother's family owned the Daily Pantagraph, still one of central Illinois's leading newspapers. At Princeton he was managing editor of the campus newspaper and seemed to be headed for a career in journalism after his graduation in 1922. He worked for a short time in the editorial department of the Pantagraph, and then, yielding to his father's wishes, entered Northwestern University's law school. He got his degree in 1926 and began the practice of law in Chicago. While a young attorney, Stevenson met and married Ellen Borden, whose family owns the dairy-products firm. Public life never appealed to Mrs. Stevenson, and the divorce she demanded soon after he became Governor is probably his greatest political liability.

Stevenson entered government service in the early days of the New Deal. George N. Peek, an Illinoisan who had been associated with Stevenson's father in pressing for better farm legislation, was appointed administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and he took the youthful lawyer to Washington as his special counsel in 1933. Stevenson had early become interested in international affairs, and gave up the presidency of the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations to go with Peek. Back in Chicago in 1935, he was elected to that office for two more terms. After France fell in 1940, he became active on the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies and through promoting rallies for this group came into close contact with the foreign staff of the Chicago Daily News and with its publisher, Colonel Frank Knox. As soon as Knox was named Secretary of the Navy, he pressed Stevenson to become his special assistant and personal counsel. Stevenson joined him late in 1941 and remained with the Secretary until his death in 1944. He served as special assistant to Secretaries of State Stettinius and Byrnes in 1945 and was a member of the United States delegation to the San Francisco Conference on International Organization. At the first U. N. General Assembly he was senior adviser to the United States delegation; he attended the General Assemblies of 1946 and 1947 in New York as a delegate.

WHEN Stevenson returned to Illinois late in 1947, local Democratic leaders, without much hope of victory, faced the task of picking a team to run for Governor and United States Senator the following year. Liberals were urging that Paul H. Douglas, a University of Chicago professor and a marine combat veteran, be chosen as the candidate for Governor. Douglas had served in the officially non-partisan Chicago City Council and had bucked the Democratic organization in primaries without success. Soon Stevenson, with his experience in the federal government, was being boomed for the Senate. At the last minute, for reasons not made clear, the party leaders switched their choices, putting Douglas on the ballot for Senator and Stevenson for Governor. There has been considerable speculation about the reasons for the change. The deciding factor was probably a desire to match the well-known Douglas, a supposedly stronger Democrat, against the tougher Republican candidate, and to pit Stevenson against the weaker member of the G. O. P. team. In any event, the campaign was hardly under way before it became clear that the candidate for Governor was going to pull his own weight.

Stevenson has been compared to both Lincoln and Franklin D. Roosevelt as an orator. He has some of the Emancipator's ability to frame literary documents on scratch paper while on his way to a meeting hall. His inaugural address as Governor is said to have been composed on the train taking him to the state capital for the occasion. Another short-order offering was his recent invitation to the Republicans to nominate their best possible man to oppose him for the governorship. "It is of little importance," he said, "whether the next Governor of Illinois is named Adlai Stevenson, but it is of the highest importance that he finish what we have started. No matter then who loses, the people will win." Like Roosevelt, Stevenson has the ability to convince his audiences that he is an uncommon man with the interests of the common man at heart.

When the ballots were counted in 1948, Stevenson carried the state by 572,000 votes, Douglas by 407,000, and Truman by 33,000.

That a Democrat could be elected Governor by more than half a million votes and find a Republican majority in the state Senate and only an eight-member Democratic margin in the lower house testifies to the peculiar system by which legislators are chosen in Illinois. That was the situation Stevenson faced when he took office in 1949. It became worse in 1950, when both houses went Republican in the off-year election. This obviously unrepresentative government in Illinois stems primarily from the Assembly's long refusal to reapportion its election districts every ten years, as required by the state constitution. Stevenson's record of accomplishment in the face of legislative hostility is due chiefly to his continuous appeal to the electorate. On television monthly, on the radio more frequently, and in hundreds of personal appearances throughout the state he has kept the people constantly aware of the issues.

His administration has been chiefly engaged with streamlining the state government, cutting out waste, applying the money thus saved where the need is greatest, and holding the line against legislative pork-barreling. During his first few months in office the Governor ordered 1,300 jobs cut from the state pay roll. Fifty of these sinecures had been held by newspaper editors friendly to the former regime. To undertake the long-range task of introducing efficiency into executive operations, Stevenson appointed Walter V. Schaefer, a New Deal lawyer then teaching at Northwestern University.

Bent on giving Illinois better law enforcement, the Governor knew that reform of the state police was a necessary preliminary step. Appointments to the force had hitherto been purely political. Stevenson introduced the merit system and made professional training compulsory for every member. This reform has visibly improved law enforcement in Illinois.

In the early days of his administration Stevenson was determined to call a convention to modernize the state's outmoded constitution. When the plan was blocked by the legislature, he spearheaded a drive for the next best thing, the Gateway amendment to facilitate amendments to the constitution. This was passed in 1950.

Under the Stevenson administration truck license fees have been increased to finance the first major program of road construction in twenty years. State aid to the public schools has been doubled. Appropriations for welfare services in general have been increased, and the state's facilities for the mentally ill have been improved to a point where they now rank among the best in the nation.

ON THE civil-rights front Stevenson has worked, so far without success, for state F. E. P. C. legislation. To the same end he has instituted new procedures in the state employment service. Questions regarding race, religion, and nationality have been dropped from job applications, and employers can no longer specify racial requirements in applying to the state for workers.

The Governor's record-breaking 141 vetoes have been almost as important as his positive performance. He prevented passage of the Broyles bill, a state counterpart of the McCarran act which was in some ways a worse menace to civil rights. Another veto killed the Larson bill, a measure which would have reduced the principle of local option to an absurdity. Public housing in Chicago would have been virtually killed by its provision that all sites for such construction must be approved by the voters of the surrounding area. Most of the Governor's other vetoes served to keep the legislature from spending non-existent funds on pet projects of their constituents.

Unlike some amateurs in public office, Stevenson has not hesitated to use his reputation with the electorate in political maneuvering for the cause of good government. Late in 1950 death created a vacancy on the Illinois Supreme Court. The term was about to expire, and party leaders began looking for a deserving Democrat to sponsor in the June, 1951, election. The next thing they knew, Stevenson had appointed Walter Schaefer, his executive-department streamliner, to fill the vacancy, and the politicians had no choice but to slate him for election.

The numerous scandals that have rocked Chicago and Illinois in the past few months have not left the Stevenson administration entirely untouched. While the general quality of the Governor's appointments has been high, some dishonest politicians have been placed in state jobs through connections with the Democratic organization. But Stevenson's reaction to charges involving his subordinates has contrasted sharply with that of other Democratic office-holders. The culprits have been called on the carpet immediately and offered the opportunity to establish reasonable doubt of their guilt. Failure to do so has meant immediate dismissal.

When Republicans in Illinois look for a chink in Stevenson's political armor, they usually settle on his character deposition for Alger Hiss during the latter's perjury trial. In reply, Stevenson asks them if they would have lied about their impression of Hiss in order to be on the popular side. G. O. P. candidates have also tried to hold Stevenson responsible for the West Frankfort coal-mine disaster. The truth is that he had urged passage of a better mine-safety code at the last session of the legislature and his proposal had been buried through the efforts of downstate members of the Assembly, most of them Republicans.

Stevenson's brand of liberalism is as free from dogma as his Unitarian religious persuasion. His fundamental attitude toward government is that it must be clean, efficient, and close to the people; that the people can then be relied upon to shape it in such a way as to fulfil the promise of democracy.

A supporter of the principles of the Truman Administration's foreign policy, Stevenson has summed up his view of the world situation as follows:

The preservation of the free world hangs upon our ability to win the allegiance of those millions and millions of people throughout the world who have not yet made their choice between our democratic system on the one hand and the promises which communism offers on the other. That choice will be mainly shaped by our own performance. It will turn upon such things as our ability to avoid the disruptions of depression, to guarantee equality of opportunity, to narrow the gulf separating economic status, to preserve freedom of thought and action, to make democracy accord in practice with its promises and professions of faith.

Speaking at the battlefield of Gettysburg last November, the Governor of Lincoln's state made this declaration about one of our chief domestic problems:

Proud of the past, patient with what Washington called "the impostures of pretended patriotism," it is for us, the living, to rekindle the hot, indignant fires of faith in the free man, free in body, free in mind, free in spirit, free to hold any opinion, free to search and find the truth for himself; the old faith that is ever new—that burned so brightly here at Gettysburg long ago.

South African Madness

BY E. S. SACHS

Johannesburg, South Africa

THE lamps of liberty, which have never shone very brightly in South Africa, have now become painfully dim. The non-Europeans who constitute the overwhelming majority of its people have always lacked even elementary citizens' rights. Since the Nationalist government of Dr. Daniel François Malan assumed power in May, 1948, the bulk of the European population is also in danger of losing its say in government.

Dr. Malan's fundamental policy is apartheid, which literally translated means "separation." But its meaning is more accurately summed up in the brutal Nationalist slogan Kaffer op sy plek en Koelie uit de land—"The Kaffir in his place and the coolie out of the country." To the ten million native, colored, and Indian people of South Africa, apartheid means violence, terror, wholesale imprisonment, and slavery; it means landlessness, poverty, and the denial of education, vocational training, and elementary democratic rights. To the Nationalists, apartheid is a philosophy based on the conception that people who do not possess white skins are inferiors destined by Providence to remain servants of the whites.

Campaigning on this policy, the Nationalists in 1948 obtained a majority of 7 in the 153-member House of Assembly; in the Senate their majority for some time consisted only of the casting vote of the chairman. They and their ally, the Afrikaner Party, polled between them only 442,338 votes as against 623,716 in opposition.

From the moment they assumed power, the Nationalists—drawing their inspiration from the Nazis—embarked upon a policy of intimidating and terrorizing this majority opposition. Hooligans broke up anti-Nationalist meetings; the trade-union movement has been subjected to a campaign of vilification and violence; a Suppression of Communists Act was passed which gave the Nationalist Minister of Justice power to declare any person a Communist, to suppress publications, and to banish people from certain areas without trial or hearing.

On the legislative front the Nationalists resorted to flagrant juggling of the franchise in order to strengthen their frail parliamentary majority. In 1948 they disfranchised the 300,000 Indians in the country who had formerly been represented by three delegates in the House and two in the Senate—who by law had to be Europeans, incidentally. In 1949 they passed a law which gave the Europeans of South-West Africa—fewer than 20,000 voters in all, many of them Germans and Nazis—the right to elect six members of the House and four Senators. (In South Africa's urban areas a member represents an average of 12,000 voters; hence the vote of a German in South-West Africa is worth three or four times that of a citizen of Johannesburg or Capetown.)

The Union of South Africa has no constitution, but the South Africa Act, the legal basis of the union, has always been regarded as taking the place of a constitution. Section 35 of the act provides that no person may be disqualified as a voter by reason of his race or color except by the vote of two-thirds of the total members of both houses of Parliament sitting in joint session.

Today there are about 1,000,000 colored people—non-Europeans of mixed origin as distinct from Bantus or Indians—in South Africa. The overwhelming majority live in the Cape, southernmost province of the Union, where they have always enjoyed franchise rights equal—at least technically—to those of Europeans. Because of stringent property and educational qualifications fewer than 50,000 succeeded in becoming registered voters for the last election. Nevertheless, this colored vote was of great importance in about ten constituencies.

In the face of nation-wide protest the Nationalist government last year passed the Separate Representation of Voters Act, which placed colored voters on a separate roll and limited their representation to four Europeans in the House and one in the Senate. The act was passed by a bare majority in separate sittings and not by a two-thirds' majority in a joint session as provided by the South Africa Act. Four colored voters challenged the law before the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, and last March 20, in a dramatic moment, the Honorable A. van de S. Centlivres, Chief Justice of the Union, declared it was the unanimous decision of the five-man tribunal that the law was null and void.

The opinion was, in effect, a reversal of an earlier one by the same court—then differently constituted—which had upheld a 1936 act placing native voters, as distinct from colored voters, on a separate roll. Chief Justice van de S. Centlivres, in the current case, specifically said that he and his colleagues believed the earlier decision to have been wrong.

The court's action elated the masses of non-Europeans as well as all liberty-loving whites in the country. But on the afternoon of the same day Dr. Malan grimly challenged not only the decision but the court:

E. S. SACHS, general secretary of the Garment Workers' Union of Johannesburg, is author of "The Choice Before South Africa," to be published next month in South Africa.

Neither Parliament nor the people of South Africa will be prepared to acquiesce in a position where the legislative sovereignty of the lawfully and democratically elected representatives of the people is denied. . . .

There are now two conflicting judgments of the Appeal Court in regard to a constitutional issue which is of the very highest importance. . . . It is imperative that the legislative sovereignty of Parliament should be placed beyond any doubt, in order to insure order and certainty. The government will take the necessary steps to do its duty and will, at the appropriate time, announce such steps after reasons for the judgment have been studied and considered.

Many anti-Nationalists saw in Dr. Malan's reference to the "democratically elected representatives of the people" only a bitter jest, in view of the general state of the franchise. They felt that if he had really wanted to test the sentiment of the country, he should have resigned and held an election. But most of all, they saw in his challenge to the judiciary a dire threat to the whole people and to the few liberties left to them. The people of South Africa have always been proud of the integrity and independence of their high courts; moreover, as in the case of the American Supreme Court and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Britain, the right to reverse decisions of predecessors has always been accepted as a prerogative of the Appellate Division.

The following day Dr. Malan announced that legislation would soon be introduced which would deprive the courts retroactively of all rights to pass on acts of Parliament. The question arises: Would such an act be itself legal? Suppose it were approved by Parliament; suppose, in preparation for the general election scheduled for next year, Dr. Malan proceeded to put the colored voters on a separate list; suppose his act were again challenged and the Appeals Court again decided against him. Suppose, further, that on the basis of the March 20 opinion, voters again challenged, this time successfully, the 1936 law which had put natives on separate lists? What then would be the situation?

In effect, the people of South Africa would have to decide between the law as enunciated by an independent judiciary and by the independent Dr. Malan. There are some who believe that, in such a crisis, the Nationalists might decide to carry through a national revolution and proclaim a Nazi-style republic. Others believe that the position of the courts, if maintained, would force Malan in the end to dissolve Parliament and call for new elections on a "white-supremacy" and "sovereign-Parliament" platform.

Meanwhile mass demonstrations are being held throughout the country, organized chiefly by the War Veterans' Torch Commando, now a year old. With a membership of 150,000, its sole purpose is to seek the removal of the Nationalist Party from power by lawful means; it emphasizes that South Africans, thousands of whom gave their lives to help rid the world of Nazism and fascism, want no part of either in their own country.

The alternative to apartheid is a truly democratic South Africa, with all racial groups enjoying full democracy and equal opportunities for advancement. Unfortunately the Nationalists' major opposition, the United Party, which was led for thirty years by the late General Smuts, is in opposition only in the play for power, not in basic tenets. There is little difference between Malan's apartheid and the United Party's "Christian trusteeship." Both aim at maintaining a reservoir of cheap native labor for the mines and the farms—the cornerstone of national policy in South Africa for a half-century.

The Nationalists can always count on the vote of the rural Europeans, to whom the preservation of a cheap labor market and of high wool and maize prices would appear to be the only function of government. The urban middle class is overwhelmingly United Party, but much of urban labor was captured at the last election by the Nationalists. The explanation is simple: most of these city workers are Afrikaners only recently come from the hinterland and have not yet developed a labor tradition.

But tens of thousands of Afrikaner workers who voted Nationalist in 1948 are today bitterly disappointed because the government has done nothing to save them from the results of catastrophic rises in living costs. They are ripe for political plucking—but not by the United Party, which they consider the party of "capitalists" and "imperialists." What is urgently needed is a strong and influential Labor Party which could recruit the Afrikaner workers away from the Nationalists. Such a drive could destroy Malan's party forever as a political threat.

The defeat of the Nationalists would not of itself bring about any immediate fundamental changes in South Africa. It would, however, open the door to the possibility of a clear political division between those who want to see South Africa evolve into a "Third Reich" and those who want to see it evolve into a great democratic state leading the rest of Africa in progress and civilization. Moreover, the defeat of Dr. Malan will not be achieved on constitutional issues which interest only the middle class. Workers are more interested in living standards. South Africa can only be wrested from Malan by a strong and militant Labor Party in combination with a rejuvenated United Party and the solid backing of the trade unions. These must unite on a short-term constructive economic policy—a "New Deal" for the workers of South Africa—involving the destruction once and for all of the semi-slave, cheap native-labor system.

Unless the democratic forces of the country unite and challenge reaction, South Africa for a long time to come will continue to travel backward toward the dark ages. The process may even continue until one day the 150,000,000 black people of Africa say forcefully, "We shall no longer be Kaffirs," just as millions of Asians recently declared that they would no longer be "coolies."

Gagging Our Foreign Students

BY SALLY LIBERMAN

THE foreign students now studying in American colleges and universities are among the less well-known victims of the post-war witch hunt. Being "foreign," they are of course suspect, and since they are here as a matter of grace and not of right, they are particularly vulnerable. To many of them the price tag on a university degree is strict conformity to the prevailing orthodoxy. Those who express dissenting views are likely to suffer a chain of penalties—close surveillance, investigation, loss of their student visas, and in some cases arrest and deportation.

SALLY LIBERMAN is the author of "A Child's Guide to a Parent's Mind." Last year she wrote a series of articles for the New York Post on the World Assembly of Youth.

Most of the foreign students—there are about 31,000 in all—live on tight budgets and cannot afford legal counsel. By and large they are not familiar with immigration procedures, nor are they always aware of their rights. Immigration officials, moreover, seldom consult the college authorities before taking action against a student. If they refuse to renew a visa, they make no charge; the district office simply announces that the Immigration Service is "not satisfied clearly and beyond a doubt that the merits of the case are such that the applicant is entitled to remain longer in the United States in pursuance of the purpose for which he originally entered." Officials of organizations working with foreign students are noncommittal. "Above all," they say, "we must maintain the best relations with the Immigration Service."

The Chinese students face a particularly difficult situation. A student's rejection of the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek does not necessarily make him a supporter of Mao, but that fact is often overlooked. The Chinese Student Christian Association is on the Attorney General's "list." Sixteen students at the University of Illinois were ordered returned to China primarily because of membership in this organization. None had committed any overt act of subversion, but according to Arthur Hamilton, an adviser to foreign students at the university, the Department of Justice took the position that it was unable to determine which were Communists and which were not and therefore decided to send them all back "where they came from."

Even Canadians fare no better. William Willmott, a Canadian citizen born in Chengtu, China—his parents were missionaries—enrolled in Oberlin College in 1949. He was active in a number of organizations—the Methodist Federation for Social Action, the Y. M. C. A., the Young Progressives, the Student Volunteer Movement, and the Student UNESCO Committee. In September of his sophomore year Willmott filed a routine application for extension of his student visa. A month later, in a letter to the Oberlin Review, he questioned the reliability of information in the American press about the Korean war and developments in China, declared that South Korea might have invaded North Korea, and supported the Quaker peace proposals ("Steps to Peace").

Soon afterward he was summoned to the Cleveland office of the Immigration Service and informed that "a well-meaning patriotic student" had forwarded a copy of his letter to the FBI. He was then asked about membership in certain organizations and whether he subscribed to the Compass or the Daily Worker. Other questions dealt with literature he had received from China, particularly a magazine called The People's China, and his views on Nationalist versus Communist China.

THE interview took place on December 15, 1950. On January 10 of the next year Willmott was informed by the Buffalo regional office of the Immigration Service that he should make arrangements to leave the United States before February 10. President Stevenson of Oberlin wrote the district director that Willmott was a good student, that he was neither a Communist nor a fascist, and that his presence in Oberlin would not be detrimental to the security of the United States. In reply the district director wrote: "The situation involves a young man who doubtless is as good as you say he is but who nevertheless could be a deleterious force in the lives of certain others, and it is for this reason that the denial action was taken." The basic reason, however, appears to have been Willmott's interest in the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, whose publication he had read but of which he was not a member. The district director also wrote: "I note you say that Mr. Willmott has allied himself with certain organizations here 'not unlike a great many other young people here in America.' Those other young people, however, are doubtless citizens of the United States, which he is not." Apparently the Immigration Service is not familiar with a statement by former Attorney General J. Howard McGrath in a four-page pamphlet entitled "To All Alien Students Entering the United States." The statement reads: "During your stay here you are given the rights to the freedom and privileges enjoyed by citizens of the United States and aliens residing here permanently."

At President Stevenson's suggestion an attorney arranged a hearing for Willmott. The respite thus obtained enabled him to finish the academic year at Oberlin, but in March he chose to leave the United States voluntarily.

To the Immigration Service a foreign student whose studies keep him in this country more than six years is a "potential" immigrant, regardless of overwhelming evidence that he intends to return to his own country. In 1945 a young man from Sierra Leone, Africa—the first man in his village to learn to read and write—came to the United States to study. He had a burning ambition to become a doctor, rarely missed a class, and supported himself with odd jobs. He had taken a full course in medicine and was within six months of receiving a doctorate in public health at New York University when he was ordered, last October, to leave the United States before November 23.

An Iranian student who has been here since 1945 studying for a Ph.D. in city planning has been refused an extension of his student visa and told to leave. He believes that the chief reason is his potential-immigrant status but that his public stand in support of the oil-nationalization program in Iran may be another factor. Last summer he spoke at Lafayette College in favor of the program and later published an open letter to Premier Mossadegh congratulating him on the nationalization campaign. Copies of the letter, which was signed by members of the Iranian Student Group of New York, were sent to newspapers in Iran, to the New York papers, and to the press associations. The Daily Worker devoted considerable space to the letter, to the consternation of Iranian students in New York, who charged that its meaning had been distorted.

The immigration officials are under great strain—ill-paid and poorly prepared to enforce the increasingly complex laws and regulations demanded by Congressional inquisitors. Young foreigners are handy scapegoats and too often are treated in a way that is inconsistent with the American tradition of hospitality to visiting students. They have to prove their innocence of any disloyalty to our government instead of being presumed innocent until proved guilty, as the American system of justice prescribes.

Impressions of New China, II

BY V. K. R. V. RAO

Delhi, India

THE basis of agrarian reform in China is quite simple. The tiller must own the land he tills; a landlord who rents out his land is a non-producer and has no right to his income. He has no right to land on which he does not work or to own more houses or agricultural implements or cattle than are required for cultivating an average holding in his village. All land or equipment that a landlord owns in excess of the village average is considered surplus and may be confiscated by the state and made available to the land-poor and landless peasants in the village. The distribution is per capita: larger families get larger holdings, women and children being taken into account as full persons for this purpose. Surplus equipment, cattle, and houses are similarly distributed. No compensation is paid to the landlord, and those to whom this property is awarded get it as a free gift from the state. The new owners must pay the land tax, which amounts to about 18 per cent of the produce, but as against this they previously paid rent to the landlords of between 50 and 60 per cent of the produce. We were told that the relief thus granted to the actual tillers amounts to twenty million tons of food grains.

The so-called rich peasants, those whose holdings exceed the village average but who work on their land and are usually the best farmers of the village, are not disturbed in their property—they are, in fact, actually protected, as are the so-called middle peasants, whose holdings roughly equal the village average. Exceptions to the rule of no tilling, no ownership are made in the case of soldiers, teachers, civil servants, writers, and other workers residing in towns, provided that their income from land constitutes only a small portion of their total income and that their holdings do not exceed the village average.

Land reform in each area was preceded by education and intensive propaganda. The actual redistribution of land was effected through peasant committees aided by college professors and students. The redistribution was almost invariably made the occasion for the stimulation of class consciousness in rural areas; landlords alleged to have committed acts of oppression, usury, or inhumanity against their tenants were publicly accused and tried.

V. K. R. V. RAO is a distinguished Indian economist whose views reflect important non-Communist opinion in his country. This article is the second of two embodying his conclusions about the new China formed during a recent official visit. The first appeared last week.

Whether one approves of this procedure or not, there is no denying that it has linked the vast majority of the peasants to the new government by almost indissoluble ties.

The industrial workers, the petty bourgeoisie, and the private capitalists have one thing in common: they live in towns and have to purchase their food and other consumers' goods. The price level has therefore a direct bearing on their welfare. When the Communists came to power, China was in the throes of a severe inflation. By July, 1950, inflation had been checked and prices had been stabilized. It is true that there has since been some rise in the prices of industrial goods, especially of cloth, owing primarily to increased rural purchasing power; but prices of essential commodities as a whole have not risen very much.

While the government has obtained the support of the general urban population through this successful implementation of its anti-inflation program, it has taken special steps to win the favor of the different classes. The industrial workers enjoy many more benefits and amenities than they had under the previous regime. Social insurance on modern lines has been introduced, including workmen's compensation and maternity, sickness, and old-age benefits. A beginning has been made in the provision of rest houses, dormitories, sanitariums, and so on. Workers who distinguish themselves in increasing production are given the title of labor heroes or model workers and held up to the admiration of their comrades and of the entire country.

While government corporations have taken over foreign trade and a large sector of domestic wholesale trade, a certain portion of wholesale trade and the entire retail trade have been left in private hands. Storekeepers seem to be quite happy as the result of the increase in rural purchasing power and also of the new emphasis placed by government on the flow of commodities between towns and villages. An additional source of satisfaction is the rationalization of taxation and, with it, the abolition of petty and multiple taxes.

As for the capitalist class, Article 30 of the Common Program declares that "the People's Government shall encourage the active operation of all private economic enterprises beneficial to the national welfare and to the people's livelihood and shall assist in their development." The private capitalist has therefore a definite place in the new Chinese economy. Taxation of profits does not exceed 30 per cent. Dividends are limited and there is a general ban on sending profits abroad, but all possible facilities in the way of raw materials, transport, finance, and technical assistance are offered by the government to private industrial concerns carrying on approved productive activities; this is true not only for Chinese concerns but also for foreign concerns operating in China. At the same time the state has far more effective control over the private sector of industry than in either the United States or India. In effect, private industrial concerns in China either carry out processing activities for the government or produce finished goods on government order. There is no interference in operational or managerial matters, markets and reasonable profits are guaranteed, but there is effective integration of the private sector in the government's over-all economic program.

SO MUCH for the new government's hold on the Chinese people. What are its long-range plans? Politically, there is intense concentration on what is called "Aid Korea and Resist American Aggression." Simultaneously Sino-Russian friendship is being built up, with emphasis on the Sino-Russian treaty of alliance and the armed might of the Soviet Union. In the economic field the problem of industrialization—the need to meet the newly awakened demand of the peasantry for more consumer goods and thus stave off inflation—is certainly the subject of serious thought among the policy-makers. China needs both capital equipment and technical assistance to speed up industrialization, but because of the economic blockade recently imposed at the instance of the U. N. it is finding it difficult to get supplies from the Western world. As a natural corollary, a radical change is taking place in the direction of its foreign trade, and China is leaning heavily today for both technical assistance and supplies of capital goods on the Soviet Union and its associates in Eastern Europe.

The cultural ties between China and the Soviet Union are also being strengthened. The Russian language is now taught as a second language in many of the middle schools, and books and journals in Russian dominate the foreign-language bookshops that are found in the principal cities. The Chinese press contains little foreign news as compared, for example, with the Indian press, and the news agencies whose releases are published are mainly Hsinhua or Tass, not Reuter's or A. P. or U. P. Hostile observers see in all this the beginning of a new order in China in which contacts with the outside world will be mainly with and through the Soviet Union; some even fear that the new China will be a menace to the rest of Asia.

I myself feel certain the hostile observers are wrong in their reading of the Chinese puzzle. Undoubtedly Sino-Soviet friendship will be an enduring fact, but it is equally true that China is not and can never be a Soviet satellite. The Chinese leaders are essentially Chinese patriots; the program by which they are consolidating their hold is essentially a domestic program designed to solve the many economic, social, and cultural problems that confront the Chinese people.

The most noteworthy characteristic of the present Chinese leadership is its strong sense of actuality and its aversion from a doctrinaire course. The major factor in Mao's rise to power has been his realism, his framing of policies closely connected with concrete conditions. Thus the basic facts of the Chinese situation, together with the quality of the leadership, argue against militaristic adventures on China's part. The intense anti-American feeling that now prevails has arisen largely because the United States has been linked with the two things the Chinese people hate most — Chiang Kai-shek and Japanese rearmament; and even this feeling is directed against the American government rather than the American people, for whom there seems still to exist considerable regard.

Mao Tse-tung

The Chinese are conscious that they are a great power and will not tolerate any threat to their territorial integrity. But given understanding and recognition of present realities by the Western world, which means adoption of a policy toward China not based on the thought that it is a Soviet satellite, I have no doubt that friendly relations between China and the West can be revived and peace restored and made enduring in Asia. We Indians have just cause to be proud that, thanks to the statesmanship of Mr. Nehru, India is the one country that has shown a correct understanding of the Chinese puzzle.

The Chinese leadership is so anxious to improve the condition of the people that it would hesitate to revive internal disorder in pursuit of a doctrinaire mirage. Not that the Chinese Communist Party denies its goal of a Communist society; it is simply prepared to wait till the people voluntarily effect the transformation. I visualize the definite possibility that during this transition period Chinese culture, tradition, and psychology will influence the nature of the final goal, and that given peace and absence of foreign intervention, a new society will eventually emerge in China which may embody at least some of the West's liberal values.

To my mind, however, the brightest hope for the future of new China vis-à-vis the rest of the world, both East and West, lies in India's friendship for China and China's for India. On the development of that friendship depends perhaps not only the maintenance of peace in Asia but also the future form of communism in China.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Off with Their Heads

LET IT COME DOWN. By Paul Bowles. Random House. $3.50.

THE SWIFT CLOUD. By Sigrid de Lima. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

THERE WAS A MAN IN OUR TOWN. By Granville Hicks. The Viking Press. $3.

PAUL BOWLES'S "Let It Come Down" has been praised by people who should know better; it has also become the best-seller it was intended to be. I have not read his first novel, "The Sheltering Sky," but I recollect a real if qualified delight in the short stories of "The Delicate Prey." Most of them are about the same subject: the destruction of effete Westerners by the arts, the skulduggery, and the implacable hostility of primitive peoples, usually Mexican or Arab. Like D. H. Lawrence, Mr. Bowles sees the natural, which he equates with the primitive, as bound, one way or another, to destroy artifice. Unlike Lawrence, who found—by fits and starts at least—our eventual salvation in such destruction, Mr. Bowles's natural forces embodied in primitive peoples are worse than the human trivia they destroy. This is a view of things which when applied to the writing of fiction can lead quickly to a dead end. After "The Delicate Prey" the question remained: Can anything more of importance be written on this matter?

The answer is that Mr. Bowles has popularized his radical preoccupation by diluting it and sentimentalizing it. "Let It Come Down" is the history of a few weeks in the life of an American bank clerk, in flight from neurosis, who takes a job in Tangier. There he slips easily into a maelstrom of intrigue and debauchery which swallows him up. But, we are assured, in sloughing off his New York bank-teller standards, Charles Dyar has somehow found himself at the moment of his complete undoing.

Compared to "The Delicate Prey" this novel is studiously muted, as if Mr. Bowles were addressing himself to a Ladies' Home Journal audience which must be simultaneously shocked and informed—but never too much so—by an account of strange goings-on in far places. Long passages read like a rather dull travelogue. And where the writing in the short stories was wonderfully stripped of unnecessary detail and often deliberately flat so that no attention might be diverted from the subject, this writing seems flat merely out of carelessness or ennui. The process of cheapening has been drastic and thorough.

"The Swift Cloud" is a disappointment—the more so if one remembers Miss de Lima's first novel, "Captain's Beach," and the expectation it aroused of even better things to come. Its central theme, the importance of any kind of love, is developed through the close examination of one day in the life of a good man wrongfully accused of having murdered the idiot son whom he loved. During his brief stay in the jail of a small Southern California town, Clyde Cassen relives the problems which his son's idiocy and his own devotion created. Unhappily, in order to do this, Miss de Lima has constructed a special manner instead of writing quietly and in her own good fashion or, at least, in the fashion of "Captain's Beach." It is a manner which shuttles back and forth in time, often for no compelling reason, and which relies on repetition to create density and a sense of life going on. There is nothing wrong with these devices, but Miss de Lima uses them and others so excessively that they obscure what they were meant to clarify.

Yet "The Swift Cloud" has its excellences. The man, Clyde Cassen, and his family are re-created; Miss de Lima knows how to convey sights and sounds beautifully; she gets perfectly the feeling of September as it falls on one of those small Southern California towns which lie east of Los Angeles toward the desert. Nor does her unfortunate manner ever mask the acuteness of her moral sensibility.

Granville Hicks's new novel, "There Was a Man in Our Town," is the story of a retired college professor who sets out to break the Republican machine in an up-state New York town. He learns that "politics is people" the hard way.

Though he gets himself into some strange predicaments he acquires wisdom and is undefeated in spirit after various material defeats. The characters are all stereotypes conceived in great high spirits. The high spirits, indeed, are the most engaging thing about this novel, a roman à thèse on a theme so worn that Mr. Hicks should probably be congratulated on having managed to be amusing as often as he is.

ERNEST JONES

The Business of Government

HOW TO GET RICH IN WASHINGTON. By Blair Bolles. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

IT IS difficult to decide whether Mr. Bolles in writing this book hypnotized himself into being earnestly scandalized by the sorry Washington chicanery he rehashes, deliberately produced a quickie designed to sell on the basis of a snappy subtitle ("Rich Man's Division of the Welfare State"), or does not really understand the truth about our kind of government. In any case he makes no serious contribution to an understanding of the truth. The book is largely a recapitulation of stuff paraded in Congressional hearings and newspapers, a college undergraduate's version of those celebrated novelties for the gee-whiz set—Washington, New York, Chicago "Confidential."

There are some slick generalizations. Taxes are so high that "there is not much left for the Morgans and those in private life who used to finance the spread of capitalism." "Washington itself has become J. P. Morgan." Yet "economic royalists" are regaining "paramountcy." Regulatory agencies tend to become prisoners of the interests they are supposed to regulate. What we have now is "military socialism."

If Bolles is aware that even half-way smart financiers avoid stiff upper-bracket income-tax rates by manipulating the purchase and sale of assets so as to benefit through lower taxes on capital gains, he does not indicate it. Nor does he seem to realize that some of the RFC's most harshly criticized loans were at least vaguely justified under a Congressional injunction that "small business" should be helped. Nor does he acknowledge that the very existence of the RFC is a potential check on a return to the private monopoly of credit. Complaining that the independent agencies have too much power and that Congress "has less control over the real nature of government" than during "rubber-stamp" early New Deal days, he also writes, a little later: "Congressional laws and military policy in effect guaranteed a profit to the war contractors no matter how improvident or inept they might be."

If he would stick to that last statement he would be closer to the facts. Congress does not lack "control" of agency and department policies. The power of the sugar industry in the Department of Agriculture is a reflection of the power of the sugar industry in Congress. The important oil lobbyists are elected members of Congress. The important insurance lobbyists—the ones who helped decide the liability of fire-insurance firms under the anti-trust laws and the tax liabilities of life-insurance firms—are elected members of Congress. Even the collapse of the Federal Power Commission, a once vigilant regulatory agency, followed enactment of a bill by Congress to emasculate its work. Truman vetoed the bill, but the commissioners saw what happened to Leland E. Olds after he fought the utilities and oil companies: the Senate refused to confirm his reappointment. This reviewer doubts the validity of Bolles's insinuation that the FPC wrote itself out of the regulation of natural-gas companies because Senator Kerr, who opposed regulations, supported President Truman against General MacArthur. Passage of the Kerr bill and the stake-burning of Olds in the Senate were signs that any timid commissioner could read.

Business men have always got rich or poor depending on policies in Washington—not less in the 1880's and pre-Civil War days than now. High tariffs continued long beyond the period of "infancy" in industry were simply public plunder approved by the same kind of Congressmen who today insist that defense contractors make a profit no matter how improvident or inept they may be, the same kind of Congressmen who insist that even under price controls the profits of manufacturers, middle men, and retailers be guaranteed. The business of government is always closely related to control of the economy, to the dispensing or withholding of favors, to the issue of who pays how much in taxes.

We shall not get rid of deep-freeze artists, mink-coat grabbers, and Presidential aides who free-load at luxury hotels by making a few wisecracks that obscure a basic problem. We had a better-balanced government in early New Deal years because the people had elected a Congress with some interest in the general welfare, and members of that Congress, such as Senators Norris and Black, had guts enough to force through legislation despite the howling opposition of holding-company pirates and the whole community of legalized plunderers. It is not necessarily true that regulatory bodies continually deteriorate; the Federal Trade Commission in recent years has been far more vital and vigorous than it was under Roosevelt. If the people elected a better Congress again, the effect would quickly become evident in many departments and independent agencies.

WILLARD SHELTON

The Art of Biography

NELL GWYN, ROYAL MISTRESS.

By John Harold Wilson. Pellegrini and Cudahy. $4.

A BIOGRAPHY usually raises the query: is it entertaining or reliable? Mr. Wilson's is both. Its first advantage is its subject, a woman who rose from a player in Drury Lane to a royal mistress of Charles II; the whole concept of official mistresses is pleasantly shocking to our modern sense of public decorum. Then, too, she flourished during the Restoration, an era brilliant with lust, wit, intrigue, candle-light and brocade, with even a great plague and fire thrown in.

Yet even with these aids to entertainment, the biographer who wishes to write an honest, reliable book has his problems. Mr. Wilson tells us candidly at the beginning what sources he had available: reliable evidence, like deeds, wills, warrants, state papers, theatrical records; questionable kinds, like newspapers, letters, diaries, histories, and anecdotes; and, finally, the least reliable, prose and verse lampoons or libels. These materials are the kind usually used in scholarly biographies, often with edifying but unpalatable results. They are also sometimes used by the popular biographer, who then projects himself into the mind of his heroine, and tells us what she thought and said. This method, for all its popularity, is a falsification of history.

Mr. Wilson exhibits here the best qualities of the scholar and the popularizer and none of the faults of either. A good sample of how he raises a sound and graceful structure on a foundation of documents is his ninth chap-

Marx Against the Peasant

By DAVID MITRANY

THE first detailed study of Marxist theory and practice in dealing with peasant problems and peasant movements in Europe. Mr. Mitrany explores the great paradox of modern history—that Marxism, which is uniformly hostile to those who live on the land, has in every instance risen to power on the backs of disaffected peasants. This brilliant analysis provides a key for understanding why Communism must rely upon force to maintain its power in backward countries throughout the world.

ter, which describes Nell's manner of life on Pall Mall. He gives us the concrete facts about her house, taxes, servants, sedan chair, coach, food, drink, doctors' bills, cosmetics, gambling, shopping, clothes, bed (decorated with silver and costing about a thousand pounds); and then he ends the chapter with the concert she gave for the King in her new house. All this—as the brief chapter bibliography at the end of the book details—is based on reliable sources. The facts are specific without being diluted into pseudo-dramatic presentation. The reader, it is true, must work a little too, visualizing and integrating, but he ends with an authentic picture of Nell's home and not the painted prop of a stage set. The description here is rounded out by an anecdote. At the end of the concert the King, wishing to reward the players, fumbled in his pocket without finding any money and then asked the Duke of York, who had only a guinea or two. Whereupon Nell, turning to the other guests and borrowing the King's favorite oath, cried, "Od's fish! What company am I got into?"

But what if the biographer of the documented, critical method is faced with conflicting evidence? If he is "creative" he will choose the version which his intuition reveals as the true one. Mr. Wilson simply states the origin of the disputed fact, thus indicating its weight. If he has two versions, he gives them both—particularly if they are amusing and illuminating. Thus, there are two accounts of how Nell persuaded the King to give their son a peerage. According to one, she held the child out of an upper-story window and threatened to drop him unless—when the King cried, "God save the Earl of Burford." The other relates that once in the King's presence she called out to the boy, "Come hither, you little bastard," and when the King reproved her, replied that "she had no better name to call him by." Whether true or not these traditional stories point up what the indisputable facts show—that Nell exerted herself for her son and that the King procrastinated in granting honors he had awarded to his other illegitimate sons.

In sketching the background Mr. Wilson picks his way through vast complexities, yet manages to write always with clarity and zest. It is a brief book, but he packs into it all the color and controversy of Nell's rivalry with the other principal mistresses, the Duchesses of Cleveland and Portsmouth, and her friendship with the court wits—Dorset, Rochester, Sedley, and Buckingham. Historically, the capering of the King's mistresses is only an entertaining surface ornamentation; beneath it a grim struggle was being fought to make England a constitutional monarchy and a pivotal European power. Still, to compare Charles II's mistresses with the dowdy ones of the first two Georges is to mark the evolution of the monarchy from the aristocratic insouciance of the Stuarts to the middle-class stolidity of the Hanoverians.

It is personal, not national, history that has kept Nell Gwyn in the popular imagination since her own day. Her success story has classic appeal: the daughter of a man so obscure that his first name is not recorded, she was the mother of the royal Duke of St. Albans. Remembered by Charles as he lay dying—when he apologized for being so long about it—she herself died rich, respected, and not especially repentant. The Victorians tried to explain away the profession by which she earned her honors. In his biography Mr. Wilson has removed the whitewash to restore her to what she looks like in the Lely portrait that serves as frontispiece—an impudent beauty. ROBERT HALSBAND

Books in Brief

THE NEGRO FREEDMAN. By Henderson H. Donald. Schuman. $4. A detailed and dispassionate study of the effects of freedom on 4,000,000 former slaves in the years just after the Civil War—a perplexing and difficult period in which the Negroes, suddenly freed from bondage and preyed upon by carpetbaggers, were faced with the problems of earning a living in a ruined land and of adjusting themselves to a new way of life.

RAG, TAG AND BOBTAIL. By Lynn Montross. Harper. $5. The author has attempted to give an "eyewitness account" of the American Revolution by extensive quotations from diaries and letters, tied together by his own rather haphazard narrative. The result, while not particularly illuminating as history, is justified by the vividness with which some of the individual scenes are brought to life by the contemporary documents.

PLANTATION COUNTY. By Morton Rubin. University of North Carolina Press. $3.50. This volume, the first of the Field Studies in the Modern Culture of the South, prepared under the direction of John Gillin, describes the present social strata and ways of life in a typical Black Belt county with a population of 5,000 whites and 20,000 Negroes. The author is a Jew, a Bostonian, and a cultural anthropologist, but in spite of what must locally have been considered three strikes against him, he seems to have been successful in winning the confidence of the people during the year that he spent among them. A useful addition to our knowledge of the economic and social patterns of American life.

Drama

MARGARET MARSHALL

THE GRASS HARP (Martin Beck Theater) is about four sensitive misfits who run away from their crass families in a small Southern town and take refuge temporarily in a forest tree, where they live for a time on fried chicken and hard-boiled eggs brought along in a shoe box. Considered just as a plot, this is, I suppose, no sillier than the plot of "As You Like It"—which, as a matter of fact, it very remotely resembles: "Blow blow, thou winter wind, thou art not so unkind," etc. There are no banished dukes, no convenient lions to eat up a villain, and no holy hermits to produce a quick reform. But there are other personages and incidents equally surprising, including, for instance, a crooked promoter out to get possession of the formula for a secret dropsy cure owned by one of the refugees, a last-minute conversion, and a certain Miss Baby Doll Dallas who wanders into the forest peddling a line of cosmetics guaranteed to transform any hag into a Hollywood starlet.

I hasten to add that the purpose of this comparison is not either to depreciate "As You Like It" or to exalt "The Grass Harp"; it is simply a way of confessing frankly that to tell the story of a fantasy may be to do it less than justice. Conceivably a story like that just recounted might be transformed by some magic of poetry, imagination, or humor into a delightful piece. But Truman Capote, who has made the play from his own recently published story, is no Shakespeare, and though at least one of the leading critics thought the performance thoroughly delightful I found myself hanging my head in embarrassment at what seemed to me the fatuous goings-on presented on the stage.

The moral of the play is plain enough and like the plot might conceivably have served a purpose. Temperamentally I am not unsympathetic to those who find the world too much for them. On the whole I think I also agree with the author that, regrettable though the fact may be, utter flight is no solution, and one must come down out of one's tree to make some sort of peace with the world. But these are familiar thoughts and hardly call for long exposition unless one has some effective method of presenting them.

For all I know, Mr. Capote's narrative may have generated a special atmosphere. The only parts of the play not clumsy are the two or three long speeches in which one of the characters simply explains to another what he thinks it is all about. But so far as anything is dramatized, it fails to come off. What was no doubt intended as poetical naivete comes out as mere clumsy childishness, and it is obvious that the performers—on the whole they are good ones—feel from time to time as though they had wandered into a high-school play. In short, though I hope I am not only responsive to imagination but in some degree capable of making the best of whimsy, I am compelled to say that "The Grass Harp" just won't go down.

Considerable pains have obviously been taken with the production. There is incidental music by Virgil Thomson and there are settings by Cecil Beaton, whose tree house is one of the best things in the show. Russell Collins is almost convincing as the retired judge who joins the runaways, and Mildred Natwick does her very good best as the heroine who knows how to make the dropsy cure out of wild herbs.

TOSCANINI'S broadcast of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony completed, as the N. B. C. announcer pointed out, his fifteenth season with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra. I would add that it was the fifteenth year in which the radio public has heard what have been in large measure falsifications and distortions of Toscanini's performances. The first thirteen of those years the sound of the performances was falsified at its source by the acoustic defects of Studio 8H, and the proportions and balance were distorted partly by these defects and partly by method of pickup (i. e., microphone placement) and transmission; but the last two years pick-up and transmission alone have produced the continuing falsification and distortion of performances originating in Carnegie Hall, where their sound has been fabulously beautiful, and from where C. B. S. has transmitted excellent facsimiles of the New York Philharmonic's performances—facsimiles, that is, in which the orchestra appears to be heard from a sufficient distance for its components to reach the ear with the spaciousness, clarity, balance, and beauty they have in the hall. N. B. C. could have used the same set-up as C. B. S. and sent out equally good facsimiles of the N. B. C. Symphony performances; instead it has used a set-up which brings us close to the orchestra where the violins often get to be strident, or in the middle of it where its components are tightly crowded together around us, where the woodwinds sometimes are louder than tutti, and where the gradations of dynamics and the balances so carefully and laboriously and precisely worked out by Toscanini are destroyed.

This makes it difficult to evaluate the performances—to know, for example, whether one is hearing excessive tension in the performance of the Ninth, or only the tightness and stridency of the transmitted sound.

Two new recordings have been issued of one of Bach's greatest works, the Cantata No. 4 "Christ lag in Todesbanden." The Bach Guild offers a straightforward performance by Viennese musicians under Prohaska; Decca a performance by German musicians under Fritz Lehmann, whose pacing, shaping, and sensitive inflection give it greater expressive power and create more life in the contrapuntal texture. The recorded sound of the Decca performance suffers from occasional distortion, especially near the end of the first side. The Bach Guild record offers also the Cantata No. 140 "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," one of the works with superb choral passages and less interesting music for the soloists.

Bach's Magnificat is another of the works in which the arias move me less than the choral passages. The Decca record offers a performance by German musicians under Ferdinand Leitner, whose slower tempos are more effective than Shaw's fast ones in the RCA Victor performance of a few years ago (though in one or two instances they are too slow); but the chorus is not good or is poorly reproduced. The soloists, however, are good.

Handel's Te Deum for the Peace of Utrecht and his Coronation Anthem are agreeable but not among his most impressive works. They are excellently performed on a Haydn Society record by Danish musicians under Mogens Wöldike.

Another work that I find unimpressive is Haydn's Missa Solemnis ("Harmoniemesse") in B flat, performed on a Period record by Viennese musicians under Alex Larsen. It is the less effective for the shrill and wobbly singing of the solo soprano, the not much better singing of the solo contralto, and the ear-lacerating recorded sound.

The concert arias of Haydn on a Haydn Society record are good examples of the genre, well sung by Gertraud Hopf, soprano, with the Vienna Symphony under Von Zallinger. The sharp recorded sound requires reduction of treble to minimum.

Schütz's "Musical Exequies" is a recitative-like setting of verses chosen for the purpose by the prince at whose funeral the work was sung. Its interest is entirely in its detail, some—but not all—of which I found impressive. It is well performed on an R. E. B. record, but poorly reproduced: when the volume is right for the soloists the chorus is ear-shattering; and the sharpness requires reduction of treble to minimum.

Mahler's "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" are beautifully sung by Blanche Thebom with an orchestra under Boult and excellently reproduced by the RCA Victor LP, which offers also Thebom's previously issued performances of Wolf songs.

Mahler's "Das klagende Lied" is an early and immature work that I would recommend skipping. It is well performed by Viennese musicians under Fekete and reproduced with excessive sharpness by the Mercury record.

SUPPLEMENTING its fall show of paintings, the Whitney Museum of American Art offers its annual spring selection of sculpture, water colors, and drawings (through May 4). There are 72 items in the first classification, 80 in the second, and enough in the third to bring the total to 187, by as many artists. As in its previous shows of this sort, the Whitney is making a serious effort to discover new talent and to keep the work of interesting artists in the public's mind.

With an eye to the recent, and still current, controversy sparked by the protest of the National Sculpture Society to the Metropolitan Museum, the director of the Whitney has made it perfectly clear in his foreword to the catalogue on what basis the present exhibition was selected. It does indeed include conservative as well as the most advanced work—Ogden Pleissner's slick Sargent-in-the-rain water color of Avignon is, alphabetically, next to Jackson Pollock's No. 7, 1951. The management has made no attempt to represent all current manners in equal amounts; and if modern art predominates, "it is because it is unquestionably the leading movement in art today, and has exerted the greatest influence on younger artists to whom the Whitney Museum has always been hospitable."

Fair enough: the prevailing idiom is modern. But this is no guaranty against mediocrity, superficiality, and the forced effect. There are plenty of all three in this show, and the sculptors are the worst offenders. Aside from the terrific impact of Roszak's Skylark, a wild, scythe-like skeleton in three-four time, I saw little in the sculpture sections that made me want to linger, or else I had seen similar things represented long ago and elsewhere—Baizerman's powerful recumbent Unknown Soldier, of hammered copper, for instance. Minna Harkavy's Adagio seemed to me an inferior example. The staff of the Whitney selected the pieces shown; but I do not happen to know what there was to select from. In the case of David Smith I do: The Hero is not so large as its size, and it gives as pale an idea of what Smith can do as the Head in the Museum of Modern Art.

As a matter of principle, I prefer to single out for comment only those works which struck me as having something positive to offer, unless it be a lesser example of an artist who generally does. But Archipenko's Exaltation struck me as so little exalted that I cannot forbear comment; it is merely larger than some of the other paperweights in the show. There is something doubly depressing about bad sculpture: the time, the trouble, the expense, and, saddest of all, the permanence.

The water colors run a full gamut from the tender suggestion of Feininger's Houses in Hildesheim—in low-key orange and neutral—to the meaty impasto of James Brooks's No. 3, 1952, in layers, partially superimposed, of red, straw, pale green, and neutral. That this is a "water color" for the spring show rather than a "painting" for the fall show is, it seems to me, chiefly a matter of chemistry. But anyone who has ever organized an art show will have discovered the ridiculous pitfalls of classifications.

I was strongly impressed by John Atherton's Rocky Farmyard, though it may turn out to be too much School of Shahn; while Shahn himself, in Homeric Struggle, seems to be struggling homerically to be different from Shahn. He is an artist I admire, and I honor the struggle without applauding this particular result. Fortunately, Marin's reputation does not have to depend on the Sea Piece here shown. Tchelitchev's Head, except for its queer color, can be found in Renaissance instruction books on perspective, and Gwathmey's Ancestor Worship essays a thin elegance in which he cannot compete with the combination of Charles Demuth and Henry James—whether or not such competition was intended.

Among names new to me, I remember with pleasure works by Hans Moller and Janet Marren.

One memorable wall upstairs features non-objective black-and-whites: Pollock, deKooning, Kline, and Reinhardt. They are separated in the catalogue because Kline, who uses ink on paper, and deKooning, who works in oil on paper, are in the drawing class, while the other two are listed among the water-colorists. But they are properly hung together. It is impressive how strongly four individualities have been projected by nothing but a few black marks on white. The attention the ancient Chinese paid to calligraphy as an element of poetry comes to mind. Of the four, on this occasion Reinhardt seemed to have the greatest staying power. I would seriously like to see his Number 25 beside a Piranesi Prison, because they both achieve something of the same grandeur, though I have no doubt about which is the more resonant.

Across the room there is a small Motherwell drawing, Toledo (presumably not Ohio). I have often admired Motherwell, but this time it's the turn of the little boy who pointed out that the king has no clothes on. Me for Saul Steinberg, whose Cowgirl has plenty of clothes on.

"I would nominate this for the Book-of-the-Year if there were such an award given for courage and honesty in writing of the crisis of our time. Here there are no sensational charges, no unfounded accusations. With his fine intelligence Mr. Stone analyzes events and statements, searching always for the motive behind the act, like a good historian-detective." —Matthew Josephson said the commercial publishers. Read it and see why.

As thrilling as a detective story—as carefully documented as a "J'accuse," this sensational new book throws a piercing flood of light on the origins of the Korean war, the Chinese intervention, the real reason MacArthur was fired and the tangled truce negotiations since.

They found it "too hot to handle"; you will find it too exciting to put down.

"I can't imagine why you'd expect me to be interested in the Stone book. It may all be true; but what difference does it make? We had to bring Russia to a stop somewhere, and this (Korea) happens to be the place. If we hadn't done it, she'd have been in Yugoslavia now, and if we don't stand by it now she'd be in Iran, Indo-China and Germany before the year is up. 'Futile slaughter' be damned! No fighting was ever less futile." —Upton Sinclair

Professor Albert Einstein, in his article "Why Socialism" in Vol. 1, No. 1 of Monthly Review, (May, 1949), said: "Clarity about the aims and problems of socialism is of greatest significance in our age of transition. Since, under the present circumstances, free and unhindered discussion of these problems has come under a powerful taboo, I consider the founding of this magazine to be an important public service."

Cleveland

SOME 2,500 delegates assembled in Cleveland, April 3-6, for the Fifth International Education Conference of the United Auto Workers. The theme of this year's conference—"Freedom, Abundance, Security"—was sounded in Walter Reuther's keynote address. "We have to find a way," he said, "to mobilize our great productive power, the tremendous material resources that we possess in America, and gear these things to the needs of the people; to translate our technical progress into human happiness, into human dignity. That is the unfinished work that lies ahead."

An array of distinguished speakers tackled the key issues of the conference. Leon Keyserling developed the thesis that peace and prosperity are dependent upon a constantly expanding production accompanied by a wider and more equitable distribution of income. The objective, he suggested, should be not to provide equality of wealth but equality of opportunity through the removal of the disparities which now exist. As for the defense effort, Keyserling contended that those who are now clamoring for curtailment of production because our economy is strong are the same groups which in the early thirties clamored for restriction of production because the economy was weak. Production, in his view, could be increased another 6 to 10 per cent, which would more than offset the defense budget, and this added productive capacity, converted to peacetime production, could be used to create an unprecedented prosperity.

Walter White of the N. A. A. C. P. and Zechariah Chafee, Jr., spoke on "Civil Rights—Human Liberties." White received considerable applause when he charged Senator Robert A. Taft and Senator Richard Russell with responsibility for defeating civil-rights legislation in Congress and when he said that if the Democrats nominate either Russell or Senator Kerr, the party might just as well "kiss the Negro vote goodbye." In a strong speech, Chafee deplored the "gradual erosion of human rights," the glorification of spies and informers, and the "development of an American Party, deviations from which are regarded as disloyalty." "I am not saying all this is illegal," he added. "Everything Charles I did was strictly legal but he lost his head. I say it is time to look back and see how many steps we have taken away from freedom and ask, 'Is it necessary to abandon so much freedom?'"

On the "morals and responsibilities" of Congress—a timely topic—the delegates heard from Senators Wayne Morse, Hubert Humphrey, and William Benton. Morse urged adoption of a national Presidential primary and discussed a bill which he has introduced requiring Senators to make public reports on the sources of their income. "Any man who wants to be a Senator," he said, "should expect to live in a fishbowl." Senator Humphrey had some unkind words for the Dixiecrats, "who use the cloak of white supremacy to conceal the dagger they would plunge into the back of progress." Senator Benton lashed out against "the disgraceful spectacle of unlimited and irrelevant debate" and urged enactment of the Lehman resolution (SR 205) under which, in case of grave emergency, two-thirds of the Senators present and voting might limit debate. All three Senators blasted McCarthyism. Benton was particularly effective in pointing out the impact of McCarthyism in Europe, where the people still retain vivid recollections of Mussolini and Hitler. Wherever he had traveled in Europe, he had been asked: Will McCarthy take over in America? "You can be certain," he said, "that McCarthy is much better known in Europe than Robert A. Taft."

Willard E. Goslin, who was forced to resign as Superintendent of Schools in Pasadena, and Arthur Schlesinger cautioned vigilance against those who attack the public schools on the familiar grounds that the schools are teaching "socialism" and substituting various "frills" for the old-fashioned "three R's." Both agreed that these attacks are not directed at specific evils but are part of a subtle assault on the public-school system.

This being an educational conference, no action was taken by delegates on political issues, but politics echoed in the corridors. There was considerable talk for Justice William O. Douglas, Senator Estes Kefauver, and Governor Adlai Stevenson. Senator Kefauver, in Cleveland during the conference, visited the last session and lost little time introducing himself to delegates in the lobby. Later he joined Reuther on the platform. Leonard Woodcock, a member of the executive board, voiced the union's disapproval of a strictly labor party. Labor already has the means, he said, to exercise its political responsibilities within the framework of the existing parties. "We will get nowhere," he said, "chasing down the primrose path to some Utopian dream of a third party."

As I sat through the sessions of the conference, I kept thinking of a day in 1930. On that day I walked through Cleveland's Public Square and saw it packed with hundreds of unemployed workers milling about in hopeless frustration and despair, unorganized and leaderless. By contrast this conference showed careful organization and able leadership. The delegates impressed one as being the kind of people who demand good leadership. There was no demagoguery. No threats were voiced. There was no chest-thumping. Everything about the conference showed patient preparation, painstaking research, careful planning. The delegates had obviously come to Cleveland to learn something about the issues being discussed and their close attention to the proceedings reflected favorably on the care with which the conference had been planned.

On the subject of peace, Reuther said: "Either we find a way to mobilize the will and the power and the resources of the world and dedicate them to the human needs of people in peace-time or they will be geared to making the weapons of war and destruction. . . . In the kind of world in which we live, freedom and justice and peace cannot live side by side with great poverty. We found in World War I that peace is indivisible. We found in World War II that freedom is indivisible. If we are to avoid a third world war, we must understand that the question of economic well-being within the framework of basic human needs of people everywhere is also indivisible."

CHURCHILL'S GOVERNMENT IS IN SERIOUS trouble. Judging by Labor's striking gains in the County Council elections, the public is already regretting its verdict of last October with a degree of warmth that could melt the Tory majority in the event of new Parliamentary elections. Churchill is also having difficulties with the rank and file of his own party. One group feels that the government's proposals for advance army purchases will do little to ameliorate the textile slump and are pressing for drastic revision or abolition of the purchase tax on textiles. A still more powerful right-wing section, restive because the Cabinet has as yet taken no steps to implement its pledge to denationalize steel, has hardly been soothed by the Prime Minister's promise that a bill will be "initiated" this year. Finally, the government is under heavy fire from its moneyed supporters, backed by such powerful voices as the Times, the Daily Telegraph, and the Economist, which are furiously opposed to the new excess-profits levy. In these circumstances, Churchill may find some compensation in the ill-wind of the local elections which serve as a warning to dissident Tories to close ranks and postpone a general election as long as possible. The swing to Labor is too pronounced to be explained as a normal reaction. Labor reestablished its ascendancy in London with a thumping majority and polled astonishingly well in the suburbs where the Tories had made important gains in the last two general elections. It captured Lancashire, most conservative of the industrial areas, and won numerous victories in the politically backward rural areas. There can be no doubt that the voters were protesting broken Tory promises. That suggests to the New Statesman and Nation that the results also spell danger to Labor—a danger of return to office by "an angry electorate before it has ironed out its own divisions or decided on a program."

THE RECENT DECISION IN DELAWARE BY Judge Collins J. Seitz ordering the admission of Negro students to non-segregated elementary and high schools has been characterized by Thurgood Marshall, special counsel of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, as "the first real victory" in the campaign to abolish segregated public schools. After hearing much expert testimony, Judge Seitz found that segregation often leads to lack of interest and extensive absenteeism on the part of Negro children, as well as "a mental health problem . . . with a resulting impediment to their educational progress." The decision, however, actually turned on a finding that the white schools had "such an obvious superiority" to the Negro schools "as to be depressing." Rejecting Delaware's promise to equalize facilities through a building program, Judge Seitz ordered the education authorities to admit Negro students immediately to non-segregated schools. The decision will make it extremely difficult for the Supreme Court to dodge the central issue of segregation when the court passes, for the second time, on the Clarendon County, South Carolina, case soon to be heard together with similar cases from Topeka, Kansas, and Prince Edward County, Virginia.

IF THE SOVIET ECONOMIC CONFERENCE WAS deliberately arranged to coincide with the spring peace offensive, it was a neat bit of timing. But even the master planners of the Kremlin could hardly have figured on the added coincidence of a world textile slump; this was sheer luck. It injected a note of urgency into deliberations that otherwise might have been more concerned with the broad issues of East-West trade than with concrete orders and agreements. As it was, the conference produced a total of some $200,000,000 in contracts, according to Harrison E. Salisbury's report in the New York Times, with British business men alone departing with orders valued at $48,000,000—or twice that on a two-way basis. But if the eagerness shown by Western visitors was stimulated by the emergency in textiles—a commodity in which Russia had previously shown little interest—it also reflected a widespread desire to break through the cold-war controls and embargoes that have strangled world trade and to reduce their economic dependence on the United States. The over-all effect of these barriers is discussed by Eric Josephson on page 366 of this issue. That Moscow has done its full share in using trade restrictions as cold-war weapons, did not diminish the effect of last week's performance. On the contrary, the businesslike procedure at Moscow suggested that the Russians might now be prepared to "substitute action for words," as Washington has so often advised, while the absence of American business men equally symbolized this country's intransigent attitude. The State Department could have avoided this role very simply. Since the Moscow conference purported to be a non-government affair, Mr. Acheson could have washed his hands of it, as other Western nations did, permitting Americans to attend in their private capacity if they pleased. By warning them off he made their absence an official gesture of repudiation, thus handing Moscow full credit for a concrete, popular step in the direction of easier East-West relations. This seems to us unfortunate from every point of view including, ironically, that of cold-war tactics.

LAST SUMMER THE ISRAELI GOVERNMENT circulated among the Big Four powers a bill for material claims against Germany arising out of the Nazi persecution of Jewry. Though not directly addressed, the Bonn government announced its readiness to negotiate the matter directly with representatives of Israel and of the Jewish people. To most Jews the idea of direct negotiations with Germans was repugnant; the crematories of Auschwitz and Dachau were still operating only a little more than seven years ago. Many doubted German sincerity, feeling that nothing would come of the talks except good-will propaganda for the Germans. But the Israeli government and leaders of Jewish communities outside Israel felt that the best tribute they could pay to the dead victims of Nazism was to achieve something for the living: any sum received from the Germans would be spent chiefly on housing and other necessities for newcomers to Israel. So negotiations started a few weeks ago at The Hague. It must be said that certain aspects of the German approach to the talks have justified the fears of those who have steadfastly opposed direct negotiation. The Bonn delegates announced from the first that any settlement with the Jews must be scaled down in accordance with whatever agreements are made at the Conference on German Debts in London, where other Bonn delegates are discussing commercial debts with international bankers. That the Germans should take such an attitude will surprise few. But it is to be hoped that by the time The Hague talks (now in recess) resume early in June, the Western capitals will remind the Germans that obligations due on a 3-per-cent bank loan are not to be equated with those arising out of the murder and plunder of a people.

SENATOR MORSE'S PROPOSAL LAST SUMMER to investigate the China Lobby and the investigation of Senator Benton's charges against McCarthy—stalled these many months—moved a little nearer realization last week. The Senate's 60-to-0 vote of confidence in the subcommittee looking into Senator Benton's charges was not only a stunning rebuke to McCarthy but a clear directive to the subcommittee to proceed with its work. After a phony last-minute attack on Senator Benton, McCarthy ran out on the debate, so he didn't hear the scathing denunciations of his conduct by Senators Smith, Hendrickson, Moody, McFarland, and Humphrey. Joe's bag of tricks is now almost empty and his colleagues, by acting jointly, have finally found the courage to say what they think about him. The proposal to investigate the China Lobby was edged several notches forward by Senator Morse's introduction into the Congressional Record of a series of messages sent from the Chinese Embassy to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. For nearly a year, now, a committee of the Senate has been examining Owen Lattimore's "influence" on State Department policy in the Far East. But the messages presented by Senator Morse indicate who has really been influencing the State Department. According to these messages, Representative Walter Judd and Senator William Knowland have acted as "unregistered" advisers to the Chinese Embassy on ways and means of influencing American policy. The new documents, read in the context of the Reporter's excellent articles on the China Lobby (April 15), fully justify Senator Morse's statement of the pressing need for a reappraisal of our Far Eastern policy. Should the Senate push both investigations, the prime condition for such a reappraisal will have been realized, namely, an exposé of the China Lobby and its tie-in with McCarthyism.

THE REFUSAL TO ACCEPT NON-CAUCASIANS as neighbors is usually justified by reference to the myth that the presence of such "invaders" necessarily depresses property values, regardless of other factors. Luigi Laurenti, of the Bureau of Business and Economic Research of the University of California, has just completed a study which suggests that real-estate values in mixed neighborhoods fluctuate in response to general economic pressures and that property values bear little relation to the racial composition of the inhabitants. Of nine neighborhoods included in this study two were almost adjoining. Six Negro families have moved into one of these neighborhoods since February 1, 1950; the other remained all white. The presence of Negro families in the one neighborhood, however, has not depressed property values; on the contrary, values have increased in both neighborhoods. Even if these findings had been available they would probably not have been accepted by the irate property-owners who snubbed a young Chinese family in the Southwood area of South San Francisco in February, or by the residents of the Rollingwood tract in San Pablo who recently stoned a Negro family that had "invaded" the area. Nevertheless, the accumulation of such findings will weaken the coercive effect of the myth that the presence of non-Caucasian "invaders" depresses property values in residential neighborhoods.

April 19, 1952

REPRESENTATIVE RICHARD VAIL OF ILLINOIS has asked the House to investigate the fitness of Judge Leon Yankwich to retain his federal district judgeship in Los Angeles. Five years ago Judge Yankwich presided at the trial in which a jury returned a verdict in favor of Lester Cole, one of the Hollywood "ten," in a breach-of-contract suit against Loew-M-G-M, his former employer. The judgment was reversed on appeal, but the case was finally settled out of court. The basis for the attack on Judge Yankwich is that he chose to "interpret the law and evidence in diametric opposition to the national interest." The notion that a suit for breach of contract should be determined by the way in which a judge appraises the impact of a jury's verdict on "the national interest" is strikingly reminiscent of Adolf Hitler's peculiar views on the function and responsibilities of the judiciary. Under American law it is possible to reverse a judge if he commits an error, to disqualify him if he is prejudiced, or to impeach him if he is corrupt. But Representative Vail would like to add to these remedies by making it possible to investigate judges—and why not jurors?—who decide cases in a manner that the House Committee on Un-American Activities does not regard as furthering the national interest. Any attempt to conduct the investigation should be accompanied by a demand that Mr. Vail disclose just who it was that prompted him to make this attack on Judge Yankwich five years after the trial of the Cole case.

THE MONTH-LONG HEARINGS WHICH REAR Admiral Francis C. Denebrink has been conducting in Hawaii on conditions aboard the U. S. S. Reclaimer, an auxiliary repair and salvage ship, have finally come to a close. The investigation was ordered after seventy enlisted crewmen, and two newspaper reporters, had complained that the skipper, Lt. Marion C. Kirkpatrick, was a petty tyrant who crushed morale and violated navy regulations. From these complaints it would appear that the Reclaimer—dubbed "U. S. S. Ridiculous" by the crew—was rather like the ship described in "The Caine Mutiny." The case is important not only because of the gravity of the charges but because of the manner in which the navy has conducted the inquiry. The investigators seem to have been more interested in finding out who made the charges, and how, than in investigating conditions aboard the ship. Closed to the press, the hearings were conducted in a "hush-hush" atmosphere despite a recent directive from the Secretary of the Navy enjoining officers and their spokesmen to "give frank, honest answers to questions from newspapers and wire services" and to "tell the truth, even when the truth hurts." If the navy wants to inspire confidence in its investigations, it should carry out the spirit of Secretary Kimball's directive by stopping the practice of excluding the press.

Steel and Stabilization

SPRING has brought a sudden blossoming of strikes and industrial controversies—in steel, in oil, in communications. Putting aside for the moment the question of the President's "right" to seize the steel industry, the undeniable fact behind the disputes is that a substantial part of organized labor is fed up with the stabilization program.

There are three basic reasons. First, the Administration's delay in imposing economic controls in the summer and autumn of 1950 allowed speculative price jumps that cut consumer purchasing power. Second, the price-control laws passed by Congress contained built-in profit guarantees for business men but were otherwise punctured with loopholes. Third, while the Wage Stabilization Board is struggling with a backlog of cases, it has been constantly handicapped by the overt hostility of big industry and its spokesmen in Congress.

Industry spokesmen fought bitterly to cut down the board's sphere of activity even before it was organized. An "emergency" committee, with the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers cooperating, was formed to persuade Eric Johnston, then Economic Stabilizer, that the wage board should have no jurisdiction over "non-economic" labor disputes. The departed Charles E. Wilson's General Electric Company denounced the record of the earlier War Labor Board for giving too much to labor in wages, union security, and other "non-economic" clauses.

The attitude of the steel companies before and after the W. S. B. recommendation in the current dispute has reflected unrelenting hostility to any wage increase for which the companies could not immediately recover all direct and prospective indirect costs in the form of higher prices.

It should be clearly understood, therefore, that labor unions never have consented and do not now consent to the idea of a wage "freeze." Prices are not frozen; taxes are not frozen. Under these circumstances wages cannot be frozen, nor do the laws of the land require it.

Clarence Randall, president of Inland Steel Company, who was chosen to reply on behalf of the industry to President Truman's steel-seizure speech, asserted that if the W. S. B. recommendations were accepted, steel wages would have been raised above the increase in living costs. That is one way to argue. But another way is disclosed in W. S. B. Chairman Feinsinger's testimony before a Senate Labor subcommittee that, with a cost-of-living escalator clause in their December, 1950, contract, the steelworkers would have been entitled this year to a boost of sixteen cents an hour instead of the average 13.75 cents (in the basic wage) recommended by the board.

Wage stabilization has never been proclaimed as a formula tying wages to living costs ■ of any particular date. In shipbuilding, pulp and paper, textiles and meat-packing the W. S. B. applied its formula flexibly; in none of these instances did industry resist so bitterly that strikes were called and the President was led to intervene with seizure or other drastic measures.

The steel companies' protests that they should not be compelled to grant "fringe" benefits, such as six paid holidays a year and premium pay for Sundays, serves as a reminder of the long years during which steel protested that it could not operate with less than a twelve-hour day. Long after other industries had accepted the shorter day, the masters of steel had to be appealed to by President Harding to follow suit. Moreover, workers in dozens of industries and literally hundreds of thousands of companies long ago won paid holidays and Sunday overtime pay. Steel lagged in these just as it lagged in instituting the eight-hour day. It has little reason to complain if it is now asked to catch up with the parade.

Adjusting inequities is part of the W. S. B.'s business. Many companies have voluntarily joined unions in asking the board's approval of "fringe" benefits: in the Curtiss-Wright case the board granted longer vacations for veteran employees; to the workers of the American Smelting and Refining Company it granted reclassification of job categories.

Part of the savage attack on the W. S. B. in the steel controversy has been executed through Representative Ralph Gwinn, a propagandist for the Committee for Constitutional Government, who has tried to smear public members of the board as biased because they are financially " beholden " to unions. But George W. Taylor, one of those he mentioned, left the board long ago and had nothing to do with the steel award. Chairman Feinsinger is as much "on the payroll" of industry as of unions, for in private life he arbitrates labor contracts and is paid jointly by management and labor. This is also true of one or two other public members.

The basic issue in stabilization is and always has been prices. If stabilization is destroyed, it will not be because of the W. S. B. proposals in the steel case. It will be because the steel companies, defying the government, succeed in forcing a greater increase in prices than is justified by the Copehart amendment and by their capacity to cover some added costs out of profits.

Perón Turns to Torture

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

I AM in possession of a document that reveals better than any published story on Argentina both the rapid deterioration of the Perón regime and its mounting brutality. In general the Latin American dictatorships have preferred to take over from the Franco dictatorship, of which they are the spiritual heirs, everything but its Gestapo methods. It is only when their power is directly weakened that they pass from repression to terror. Even then terror is usually applied only to workers, but the document I have received—which was excluded from the Buenos Aires papers on the express orders of the Presidency—cites acts of torture perpetrated by the government against high-ranking army officers and other leading citizens. All of them had been arrested on suspicion of participation in the attempt to upset the Perón regime last February.

The author of the charges is Dr. Arturo Frondizi, one of the most courageous political leaders in the opposition. In the last general elections he was the candidate for Vice-President of the moderate democratic party, Unión Civica Radical, which polled more than two million votes. Now a deputy, Dr. Frondizi submitted in the Argentine Chamber on March 21 of this year a series of questions to the government which form the basis of the document in my possession.

1. Who ordered the beating and torture with picana eléctrica (electric goad) of Colonel José Domichelli, and Señores Oscar G. Martínez Zemborain, Alfonso Nuñez Malnero (former member of the staff of La Prensa), and other political prisoners who have been held in jail since February 3?

2. Will anyone challenge the names of the police officers who performed these acts of terror and of those others who witnessed them? (The names, given orally, were not included in the document.)

3. Will it be denied that police officers, whose names are known, when ordering the use of the electric goad specified that it should be applied to the most sensitive parts of the body—to the soles of the feet, under the fingernails and to the sexual organs, with further instructions that the victims should be soaked with water so that the pain would be more intense? Or that one of the victims was tortured directly on the penis?

4. Will anyone challenge the list of doctors whose function, during the application of the goad, was to check the pulse of the victim so that the torture could be halted if death seemed imminent?

5. Will it be denied that officers, after blindfolding one of the prisoners and binding him to a table, slashed a vein in his wrist and then put the bleeding hand to his forehead so that he would believe he would bleed to death if he did not give the police the information demanded of him?

Dr. Frondizi concluded his challenge to the Argentine government with these words: "Does the Executive Power not consider that the moment has arrived to put an end to these tortures, since they are methods that violate the rights of man, are repugnant to the moral conscience of our people, and lower the level of civilization of the Argentine Republic?"

I have been informed that within the next few days the Frondizi document will form the basis of a special communication to the United Nations.

The Trieste Boomerang

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Rome, Italy

A FEW days after I arrived here there were several mild police charges in the Piazza Colonna, where the students—Fascists, Monarchists, Communists, everybody—were raising an infernal row over Trieste. The chalk trade must have done a roaring business. On every wall, bus, trolley car and shopwindow were scribbled: W (meaning "long live") Trieste, W Fiume, Tito Go England (in English), M (meaning "death to") Tito, with a picture of a pig and the legend: "Pig, don't be offended if we call you Tito."

The trouble started with the riots in Trieste on March 20, the fourth anniversary of the famous Tripartite Declaration by which the Western Big Three promised to do their best to see the Free Territory of Trieste restored to Italy. Whoever conceived that idea in March 1948—and Ernest Bevin is considered the chief culprit—was playing with fire. The Yugoslavs were then on the "other side"; the peace treaty inaugurating the F. T. T. had been signed; but on the appointment of a governor—after which the Allied troops were to withdraw from Trieste—a deadlock had been reached between the West on the one hand and Yugoslavia and Russia on the other. It was then that Sforza started working for revision of the Trieste provisions of the treaty and, benefiting from the West's ferocious anti-Yugoslavism as well as from the fact that a general election was impending in Italy, won the restoration pledge from Washington, London, and Paris.

The Nenni Socialists and Communists, evicted by that time from the government, were quick to point out that this unilateral declaration by only three of the signatories of the peace treaty was strictly illegal; they declared it also to be a double-cross calculated to influence the election in favor of De Gasperi. It did prove to be an important political factor in the election; and once De Gasperi had won, the West—as the Left had foreseen—promptly forgot all about it. The West's memory failed the more readily inasmuch as the Tito-Soviet quarrel had created the need to keep Tito in just as good humor as the Italians.

Today everybody agrees that the declaration was nothing but an election stunt, for which De Gasperi at the time had every reason to be grateful but which has now, since its virtual repudiation, made things very awkward for him. For one thing is certain: On the question of Trieste there is a deep and genuine national feeling. Trieste is an Italian city, and the majority of the population of the F. T. T. is Italian; and even the population of Zone B (its southern section, now in Yugoslav hands) used to be predominantly Italian and may even be so still, in the opinion not only of Italians but of many Western diplomats here.

The Nenni Socialists, though not chauvinist, have warned the De Gasperi government that the nationalist frenzy over Fiume after World War I was the real prelude to the establishment of the Fascist regime in Italy; and what Fiume was then, Trieste may be now. Like many others, they consider it insulting to Italian national pride that Zone B should in fact have already been fully annexed by Yugoslavia, while in Zone A (the northern section, including the city of Trieste, which adjoins Italy) Anglo-American troops should be in indefinite occupation. Nor does it help matters that the present negotiations are aimed at admitting a few Italian civilian or military representatives to Trieste as "foreign co-occupiers." The Nenni Socialists, the Communists, and independent liberals like Nitti and Orlando are concerned, above all, with the withdrawal of the Anglo-Americans. The Nenni view is that the peace treaty should be applied, a governor (no matter who) appointed by the United Nations, and the foreign troops withdrawn. After that the "beacon of Italianism" would shine so brightly in the F. T. T. that a territory-wide plebiscite would surely see the area return to Italy.

AS FOR the Yugoslavs, their ethnic case for Zone A—except for a few small enclaves—appears nonexistent. Their case is not very strong even in Zone B, where despite the exodus of a large proportion of the Italians and the ingress of Slovenes, the existence of a Yugoslav majority is still doubtful. But for Tito, Trieste is a matter of prestige and the abandonment of Zone B is out of the question. His recent proposal for a joint Italo-Yugoslav administration, with alternating governors, is considered unrealistic and demagogic by both the Italians and the Anglo-Americans. The conditions which Tito has laid down for a plebiscite are based on the assumption that Italy has changed the city of Trieste's ethnical position by enforced denationalization of the Slovene element. The reality is that enforced denationalization has been much more widespread in Zone B, where evidence is accumulating of genuine Yugoslav terrorism against the Italians.

On the other hand, a general plebiscite for the whole zone is unacceptable to Tito, since the great majority of the population is Italian. With Tito in an uncompromising mood, backed by a Yugoslav parliament which has adopted a resolution against "further concessions," no solution seems to be in sight. Clearly Tito feels himself in a position from which only a strong American push can dislodge him.

But the Americans, as the Italians constantly and regretfully recall, want to maintain good relations with Tito, whose army is more valuable (in the American scheme of things) than the Italian. Moreover, the Anglo-Americans frequently argue that it is impossible to withdraw their troops because the Italians and Yugoslavs can't be trusted not to fight each other. This is a position with which Tito seems to have no quarrel; indeed, he may even prefer the presence of the Anglo-Americans, for so long as they stay in Trieste the transfer of the area to Italy must remain in abeyance. Tito seems to feel that time is on his side; he believes his army will become steadily more important to the Western allies whereas the Italian army will become less so.

Opinion here is divided on whether the De Gasperi government itself encouraged the demonstrations and riots of March 20 in Trieste. Certainly the government needed something to prop up its flagging prestige on the eve of the local elections to be held in May in southern Italy, and the concessions it hoped to get in Zone A were perhaps calculated to improve its chances. But if so, then the government was lagging far behind Italian public opinion. The concessions offered in Zone A are interpreted here, both on the Left and on the Right, as implying a tacit surrender to Yugoslavia for all time of Zone B, and, simultaneously, the perpetuation of the Anglo-American occupation of Trieste.

So all of De Gasperi's opponents are making political capital out of the result. It may be argued that Trieste is not that important to Italy. But mixed up in the Italians' attitude toward it are factors in addition to genuine national feeling. There is the old Fascist dislike of Anthony Eden; strong anti-American and "anti-Atlantic" feeling on the Left and, to some extent, on the Right; and dissatisfaction with De Gasperi—for quite different reasons—by the Vatican. Trieste, moreover, is a peg on which many grievances against the government will be hung, including some with no relation to the problem of Trieste. The whole situation greatly increases the danger of a swing to the extreme Right in Italy, and, consequently, the danger to the present democratic Republic—such as it is.

Ickes: American Legend

BY RUTH GRUBER

IT IS fitting that a memorial meeting for Harold L. Ickes, who died February 3, should have been scheduled for April 20 on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial. It is especially fitting that Marian Anderson should journey to Washington to sing there. It is now thirteen years since that historic Easter Sunday afternoon when Mr. Ickes invited Miss Anderson, barred from the hall of the Daughters of the American Revolution, to sing before the lonely, brooding figure of the Great Emancipator.

There is no fighter left to fight the way Ickes did. There is no voice today like his.

For me the key to Ickes was that he was an American. In no other country could he have functioned as he did; no other country could have produced him. He was an all-American combination of German, Swedish-Finnish, French, and Scottish ancestry, with relatives who fought in the Revolutionary War; a combination of small-town insulated childhood and big-city political sophistication; of belly-racking poverty and real wealth.

He was the best liberal, the best Negro, the best Indian, the best Nisei and the best Jew in Washington. He was on the side of every oppressed minority. He fought their fights, rejoiced if they were victorious, stormed if they were hurt. "There has been no time since my resignation," he wrote barely six months before he died, "that I have been able to go to bed at night with the comfortable feeling that all was well along the Indian front." The five years that I worked for him were unforgettable years of working with one of the liveliest personalities Washington has ever known. He was that rare thing—a reformer with wit. He hated revolution. He hated Nazism. He hated communism. He hated fascism, including Franco's variety. Like Roosevelt, whom he adored, his reforms were aimed at saving the country from revolution.

THE Old Curmudgeon was his trademark. He created it. He taught the world what a curmudgeon was. He loved to boast, as he did in his "Autobiography of a Curmudgeon," that he was America's No. 1 Sourpuss. "There was a time," he confessed, "when I was, owing to my mother, in danger of becoming, if not exactly a mellow and urbane human being, at least a reasonable facsimile thereof. I claim sole credit for having rescued myself from such a ghastly fate."

It was a fine pose, and nobody enjoyed it more than he. But it was a carefully grown crust to hide the things he knew better than to expose to his critics—a fierce idealism, a thick vein of sentiment, a complete freedom from race prejudice, a devotion to his employees that was almost the devotion of a father (and he could be hurt, like a father, by any betrayal), a great loneliness, and in his last years, an agony of spirit.

He loved America. He loved its institutions. He loved its heritage. According to Jane Ickes, his wife, when he could no longer fight for that heritage, he died. "Actually," she told me recently at her farm in Maryland, "he died in February, 1946, the day he resigned. It took him six years to stop breathing. He died because he had no more will to live. He died because he felt he could no longer be of service to the country and the world."

His fights were epic fights—and most of them he won. He fought for the rights of American minorities. He refused to send helium to Germany to fly Hitler's dirigibles over the protests of the army, navy and State Department. He refused to let scrap iron from America and shipments of lubricating oil go to Hirohito's Japan. To the exasperation of his critics, who were legion, he was outrageously upheld by history.

Soon after Roosevelt surprised Ickes as well as the nation by appointing him Secretary of the Interior because, as Roosevelt told him, "Mr. Ickes, you and I have been speaking the same language for the past twenty years," he gave him the ammunition with which to fight against revolution in America. He made him head of the Public Works Administration, with the biggest appropriation ever voted until then in the history of the country.

Ickes used the depression-born agency to battle the diseases of depression. He fought for slum clearance and low-cost housing. He struggled to outlaw Jim Crowism in any of his projects. He helped lick starvation through a subsistence-homestead program that became the basis of the present Farm Security Administration. In his twin role as Secretary of the Interior and Public Works Administrator, he called a federal halt to the looting of the West that had been going on almost undisturbed since the nineteenth century. The huge dams, the reclamation projects which created sorely needed power and cheap energy, the Big Inch pipeline which brought oil to the East during the war when our tankers were being sunk, were first initialed on his desk. He turned a department that had one of the least savory reputations in history (Teapot Dome had come out of it) into a department whose honesty became a watchword in government.

It took a Roosevelt to recognize an Ickes. Roosevelt soon realized that with Ickes's guts, his driving energy, his full-steam-ahead approach, he was the best administrator in Washington. Roosevelt kept dropping bigger and tougher jobs in his lap. At one time in World War II he held sixteen jobs, each of them enough to keep an ordinary man busy twenty-four hours a day. He was the boss of all the nation's coal mines, Fishery Coordinator for War, Petroleum Administrator for War, Coordinator of Solid Fuels, as well as, of course, Secretary of the Interior. He was boss of all the lubricating oil that kept our planes flying over Germany and Japan and our ships patrolling the seven seas.

How did he do it? "By having a damned good organization," he told an interviewer. He knew how to delegate authority, and once he did, he backed his employees to the hilt. In turn, most of them gave him blind devotion.

HIS tests of character were simple ones—honesty, loyalty, political incorruptibility. And he was incorruptible. His enemies sought a chink in that armor of incorruptibility and never found it. In three different election campaigns, the Republicans went over his department in what must surely have been the most thorough attempt at political muckraking in history. Each time he came out unscathed. His very resignation after thirteen years was over the question of bribery and corruption. Edwin Pauley, a wealthy oilman from California, had offered him a huge sum for the coffers of the Democratic Party if Ickes would let some of the untold riches of the California offshore oil fields go out of the federal jurisdiction to the states and private hands. When Pauley was nominated as Secretary of the Navy (with potential control of those very oil fields), Ickes revealed the offer as "the rawest proposition ever made to me." He resigned with fireworks, refusing to "commit perjury for the party." It was his last great fight and again he won. Pauley's nomination was withdrawn.

Harold Ickes's humor and poison-arrow wit, as well as his joy in battle, made his press conferences second only to Roosevelt's. He was a wonderful wordsmith, and the reporters were forever scurrying to their dictionaries. At one press conference, he called Martin Dies a "zany." Some of the boys rushed to their Webster's to see if he had made the word up.

Ickesisms have already become part of American folklore. He attacked Wendell Willkie as "the simple, barefoot Wall Street lawyer" and Tom Dewey as "Thomas Elusive Dewey, the candidate in sneakers" who "threw his diaper into the ring." He described Walter Winchell as having an "obstetrical turn of mind." He called Martin Dies "Loaded Dies," and in a series of fine flamboyant battles he told Huey Long what his best friend wouldn't tell him, that he had "halitosis of the intellect," and he diagnosed Hugh Johnson's ailments as "mental saddle sores."

He educated nearly everyone around him, especially in grammar. It was no mean task for a Cabinet member to give English lessons to 50,000 people. But he managed. He was not merely a perfectionist; he was a classicist of the old school. He insisted upon having the conjunction that put in, wherever possible, in any letter or draft written for him. Many of us who had written for newspapers had been trained to leave out the thats as much as possible. Now we put thats in by the dozen. But it was rarely enough. Back would come the page with that scrawled all over with a thick, stub pen. The staff finally got even. At a birthday party for "The Boss," he was presented with about a thousand huge cardboards, each bearing the word THAT, with instructions to "sprinkle as desired."

He hated waste—big or small. He would fight just as hard to save a penny's worth of electricity in an office in the Interior Department as to save billions of dollars of oil which belonged to the people. His own day never ended. He came to work at 7:30 a. m. and, for a long time, stayed until midnight. At the beginning, he would frequently call up his bureau chiefs at 7:45 to see if they were at their desks. He stopped the practice later on, but in the early years he would walk around the building to make sure everyone was working.

He made everyone who worked for him feel important. He would constantly call even minor officials into his office for advice. He was as ready to fight for the rights of an elevator girl as for the rights of victims of Hitlerism abroad. One of his subordinates scolded a Negro elevator operator sharply one day, with stern threats of firing her because she failed to recognize him and took him one floor above his own. Ickes learned of the incident, called the terrified girl into his office, apologized for his staff, and promised that she would not be fired. She was later promoted, and today is a clerk in the Interior Department.

Washington was a "border town" when Ickes arrived. It still is a "border town," though much less so now than in 1933, and Ickes played no small role in that progress. Today the National Theater is reopening, and Negroes may sit in any seats they can afford. Negroes work in government bureaus—not only as cleaning girls, janitors, chauffeurs, and handymen, but as secretaries, clerks, research workers—in fact in any jobs for which they qualify. At his recommendation, President Roosevelt appointed a Negro, Judge William H. Hastie, Governor of the Virgin Islands. (Judge Hastie is now on the bench of the Federal Court of Appeals.) Ickes was an old Urban Leaguer whose blood boiled at the discrimination he found in Washington. He not only appointed Negro advisers to his staff, but permitted Negroes to eat in the Interior Department's dining room—something that rocked Washington. He then forced the Willard Hotel to admit Negroes to the birthday party for his great friend Jane Addams.

Ickes personally declared war on Hitler's Germany long before the rest of the Administration. It was a little embarrassing for Washington to have one Cabinet member at war, but it never bothered Ickes. He swung out at Adolf every chance he got. He called him "the biggest liar in history." He said that Germany's treatment of Jews carried it back to "a period of history when man was unlettered, benighted, and bestial." The Führer demanded a national apology. But President Roosevelt, personally approving his Secretary of the Interior's private and slightly premature war, directed Sumner Welles to announce to the world, in his iciest diplomatic manner, that there would be no apology to Mr. Hitler from the United States.

Of all the minorities, Ickes fought longest and hardest for the American Indians. They were his special care. He had been trying to protect them as a lawyer in Chicago for many years, and one of his first acts of office was to appoint John Collier Commissioner of Indian Affairs. With a humility that most of his critics would never dream lay behind the crusty, belligerent exterior, he once told me, "Long after I'm gone and forgotten, the world will remember John Collier."

The most dramatic fight he ever led for civil rights was that for Marian Anderson in 1939. Miss Anderson, less well-known then, had been billed to sing for the Daughters of the American Revolution in Constitution Hall. The D.A.R. suddenly canceled her contract. Ickes immediately announced that he would grant her permission to sing on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial, which was under his control as a National Monument. The concert would take place on Easter Sunday. Everyone—and he meant everyone—was invited.

The Washington metropolitan police went to the Secretary and offered him the entire police force. Obviously, they said, there would be race riots. There had never been such a huge mixed crowd as they now expected. The Secretary declined the offer. Then the army came around. "There's going to be bloodshed," they predicted. "We'll give you a whole regiment." He declined that too. He told them there would be no trouble if only the army and police would stay home.

But he began to get a little nervous. He called in the Superintendent of the National Capital Parks, Marshall Finnan.

"We want about eighteen of your park patrolmen to keep order. You're responsible—do you understand?"

Drawing by Ernest Finnan

Harold L. Ickes

"Yes, sir," Mr. Finnan said. Most of his park patrols were grandfathers, a good deal of whose policing consisted of finding lost children or pointing the way to the ladies' room.

"We've got elevator operators, too," Ickes said.

"Yes, sir."

"They have uniforms."

"Yes, sir."

"All right, use them too."

It was a beautiful Easter afternoon. Seventy-five thousand people had come from the North and the South to hear a Negro girl sing in the shadow of the man who had freed her people. The audience, in their best Easter finery, was about equally divided between Negroes and whites. They were so proud to be there that if anyone had so much as jostled anyone else, the crowd would have taken care of him. It was one of the greatest self-policing jobs in history.

The leaders of the nation were there—Eleanor Roosevelt, who had resigned from the D. A. R. in protest, Cabinet members, Senators, Congressmen, Supreme Court Justices. Hugo Black had been nominated for the Supreme Court and was being fought on the grounds of having been a member of the Ku Klux Klan. The newsreel cameras shot a full sequence of Mr. and Mrs. Black walking across the platform.

Marian Anderson sang, perhaps as she had never sung in her life. There were tears in the audience. But everyone stood with his head high. It was a day for pride. Ickes had won another victory for civil liberty. "Under this open sky," he said "all men are free and equal."

East Europe's New Trade Potential

BY ERIC JOSEPHSON

Geneva, Switzerland

A New industrial revolution, little understood in the West, has swept Eastern Europe in the brief period since the close of the war. It is in the light of certain features of this revolution that the whole question of East-West trade, and the significance of the international trade conference which closed last week in Moscow, can best be studied.

The first post-war goal of the smaller countries of Eastern Europe was immediate industrial and agricultural recovery. Trade with the West was still important at that time and there was even some competition among Eastern countries in the world market—as between Poland and Czechoslovakia in coal. With the exception of Czechoslovakia, of course, all the Eastern countries were producers of raw materials. Nevertheless, even before the Council of Mutual Economic Assistance was created in Moscow in January, 1949, Czechoslovakia and Poland had begun to integrate certain features of their production and foreign-trade policies.

A new phase of cooperation, however, began with the signing of the Moscow mutual-economic-aid agreement, by which the long-term plans of the Eastern countries were integrated. Since 1950, original long-term programs have been revised extensively to place greater emphasis on heavy industry; the specific objectives are to increase supplies of steel and investment goods, to avoid duplication of effort, and to provide for greater regional specialization based on the national resources of each country. Entirely new industrial centers were planned, such as the giant Nowa-Huta steel works in Poland. One of the biggest projects is the Oder-Danube canal joining the Baltic with the Black Sea, which will give Hungary and Czechoslovakia access to the sea and make possible closer integration of the supply of equipment and raw materials within the region as well as an increase in foreign trade. According to the plans, it will be the responsibility of the Soviet Union to provide the needed raw materials and some of the necessary capital equipment.

The complementary character of the integrated plans is illustrated by Czechoslovakia, which will continue to produce a wide range of industrial machinery and also specialize in light engineering, precision instruments, and automobiles, while depending to a certain extent on its neighbors for food. Czechoslovakia's engineering exports are stated to be entirely intended for the Soviet Union, other Eastern countries, and China; in all, more than half of its planned production of heavy engineering, machine tools, and road vehicles in 1953 is slated for export.

Poland, which will concentrate on heavy engineering, offers another interesting example of specialization within the area: Polish targets for the production of railroad cars have been raised and those for East Germany reduced. In fact, according to a survey by the Economic Commission for Europe, it appears that Poland manufactured almost as many railroad cars in 1951 as did Britain. Furthermore, Hungary will specialize in textiles and food processing, Rumania in petroleum and its by-products, and Bulgaria in agricultural machinery.

THE industrialization of this formerly agricultural region has been described as a major event in European history, and its appeal to the young people and intellectuals of Eastern Europe must not be underestimated. The industrial potential of this area is already far greater than is generally supposed in the West. Its ninety million people produce as much industrial goods per capita as the U. S. S. R. Their output of coal amounts to one-half, of steel one-third, and of oil more than one-fifth that of the Russians. The rate of industrial growth in the region is now faster than Russia's: in 1951, the ECE estimates, the area produced 9,300,000 tons of steel; its goal for 1954-55 is more than sixteen million tons.

The production of consumer goods, of course, reflects the high priority given to heavy industry; Czechoslovakia, whose consumer-goods industries were the most important in the East, has further shifted emphasis away from this sector. So far, the rate of increase in capital-goods production throughout Eastern Europe has been much higher than that of consumer-goods output, which has barely managed to surpass the pre-war level. Nevertheless, the ECE reports that the total volume of consumption in Eastern countries increased up to 5 per cent in 1951 compared with smaller increases or, in many cases, actual decline in the West. The modest climb in consumer goods was not sufficient to prevent a fall in living standards in Eastern countries, however. The ECE ascribes the fall chiefly to the fact that the pace of industrialization increased the number of workers faster than it did the supply of consumer goods.

Compared with pre-war levels, total industrial production has risen faster in the East than in the West; industry in Poland grew 268 per cent from 1938 to 1951, while the rates of increase were even higher in other Eastern countries. Agricultural production, on the other hand, is still below the pre-war level, and compared with pre-war the difference between agricultural and industrial growth is much larger here than in the West. It is clearly recognized in the East that this lag creates a major obstacle to further economic development.

Progress made toward industrialization and closer economic integration within Eastern Europe is reflected in changing trade policies. There has been a large increase in trade between the Soviet Union and other East European countries; at the same time, general intra-regional trade has made gains all the more striking since the traditional pattern of production was not complementary to any large extent. The key to further trade increases is the mutual adaptation of production plans; during 1951 several long-term trade agreements were concluded, covering generally the period of national production plans. Among the more important changes in the "structure of imports" has been a decrease in consumer goods in proportion to capital goods and raw materials.

Even critics of the Eastern regimes have admitted that the industrialization and coordination of resources in the region have been forward steps making possible a far better utilization of manpower and resources. In so far as the region is becoming a single large producing and consuming area, economic interdependence has tended to weaken national differences. Here the interest of the Russians in helping to build the industrial power of the East coincided with the economic needs of the smaller countries themselves. Of course, it is readily admitted in the East that one of the major objectives of the mutual-aid pact between the U. S. S. R. and the People's Democracies was to make the area independent of Western markets.

IN THESE circumstances, what is the future of East-West trade in Europe? It is clear that the East would still like to import capital goods, but since this is no longer possible and the region is not particularly interested in the West's offers of consumer goods, it has made strenuous efforts to achieve self-sufficiency. If this is the case, it may be asked, why all the talk about reviving trade between East and West? Why the recent trade conference in Moscow? While Britain reduces its exports to the Soviet Union by more than a third in order to deny the Russians "strategic materials" (and therewith expects the Soviets to quit the British market to "launch a trade assault on backward tropical countries"), the U. S. S. R. claims that Britain can solve its economic difficulties by resuming heavy trade with the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries. Although the Moscow conference has been interpreted variously as propaganda designed to weaken and divide the West and as the opening of a "trade war" against the United States and Britain, it nevertheless appears that the Western European countries have as much to gain as has the East from a revival of East-West trade.

The interest of the Eastern countries—which was admitted frankly by one of their delegates at the last ECE session—is to make Europe as a whole less dependent on the United States. However, it must be realized that when and if East-West trade in Europe is revived, the position of the Eastern countries, and particularly of the People's Democracies, will be far different from what it was before the war when the region had no more to offer than raw materials. On the other hand, certain Western countries face the unpleasant alternative of becoming more dependent on America—which in turn must make up for the West European loss of trade and raw materials—or competing with the rising industrial power of Germany and Japan. Despite the curious logic of certain Congressmen who would like to end both our subsidies to Europe and all East-West trade, the West's basic interest in reviving this trade remains. It is not the East, but the West, that must export to live.

But what does the East itself have to offer? In considering the sincerity of its appeals for increasing East-West trade, it should be remembered that the Eastern European countries outside the Soviet Union, although themselves constituting a grain-deficit area (since grain production is hardly above pre-war levels), have repeatedly expressed, along with the U. S. S. R., their willingness to expand grain exports, depending on the nature and quantity of counter-deliveries offered by the West. Nevertheless, the ECE is skeptical about the possibility of increasing this trade:

When exports in any case account for only a small proportion of total production—as is true of nearly all the major export products of Eastern European countries—the concept of export availability becomes rather vague, and within a given volume of production the supply of exports may be extremely elastic. It can be safely assumed, therefore, that the increase in exports from Eastern Europe which has actually taken place since the immediate post-war years was smaller than it could have been in a different political atmosphere.

The U. S. S. R., of course, as the second industrial power in the world and a major producer of basic commodities, is in a far stronger position to engage in expanded East-West trade than the People's Democracies, but as the smaller Eastern countries industrialize further, they may be in a better position to increase their trade with the West, and the entire area may be able ultimately to compete with the West in world markets outside Europe. The ECE concludes:

Available information on the development of production in Eastern Europe tends to suggest that the next few years will bring about some further increase in export possibilities, which is a necessary, albeit insufficient, condition of expanded East-West trade in Europe.

It has been pointed out in both East and West that any trade between the planned economies of the Eastern countries and the less planned economies of the West presents certain problems not easily overcome. However, stable exchange between East and West is still believed feasible on the basis of long-term arrangements compatible with Eastern planning. Of course, if obstacles to trade remain, the Eastern countries believe themselves capable of taking up the slack and will do so, if necessary, through mutual agreements and a continued emphasis on economic self-sufficiency. It may soon be impossible for the West to turn the clock back.

Do Lie-Detectors Lie?

BY JULES H. MASSERMAN and MARY GRIER JACQUES

DURING periods of social stress and tension every body politic is apt to become sensitive to real or supposed enemies in its midst and to cast about for means of revealing and eliminating them. But even in societies with a latent sense of justice the juridical methods adopted may be somewhat unreliable—as witness the trials by combat in the “heroic” ages, or the prescribed techniques of torture employed by the judges of the Inquisition to detect witches and heretics for public execution. More in accord with our modern era of technology and psychosomatics, we now have the “lie-detector,” a device which is being used with increasing frequency by police laboratories on suspected criminals and their accomplices, and by some government agencies on suspected Communists and “fellow-travelers.” However, our talent for gadgetry has not left our sense of equity so far behind that we cannot still ask: What is this mysterious lie-detector? Does it serve any useful function? How trustworthy are its findings? What is their legal status?

What is the lie-detector? This first of our queries is easy to answer: it is a relatively simple device for making a graphic record of a person's breathing and blood pressure while he is being questioned. Formerly, the rate of sweating of his palms (the so-called “psychogalvanic reflex”) was also determined, but this proved to be so unpredictable that it was abandoned. The usual procedure is to seat the subject “comfortably,” put a rubber tube around his chest and an inflated cuff on his arm, connect each to a pneumatic diaphragm which operates a pen, and start these writing on a moving sheet of paper. When, after about ten minutes of preliminary observation, the respiratory and blood-pressure tracings seem to have reached a relatively stable level, the subject is asked a series of supposedly innocuous “control” questions interspersed with various “crucial” ones, such as “Is your name John Doe?” “Are you forty-eight years old?” “Did you kill Cock Robin?” “Do you live in Washington?” “Is your wife named Emmy?” “Is today Thursday?” “Did you ever read the Daily Worker?” and so on. The subject is required to confine his replies to “yes” or “no,” since any extension of his remarks would interfere mechanically with the record. Finally, after a period of ostensible “rest,” the procedure may be repeated to follow up any leads that have been revealed.

The entire method is founded on a principle with some basis in fact: namely, that when people with a fairly well-developed conscience violate it by deliberate prevarication, they experience an inner anxiety which may be expressed physiologically not only by transient blushing, muscular tensions, and other signs, but also by alterations in respiration and blood pressure that can be limned in neat squiggles for exhibition to a jury. But can these changes, no matter how accurately detected and recorded, be interpreted categorically as valid evidence for the truth or falsity of any statement? In other words: Does the lie-detector serve any useful purpose?

As is usual in scientific discourse, the answer to our second rhetorical query must be: yes, and no, and usually both—depending on what is meant by “useful purpose.” To begin with, the general public and not a few criminals have built up so many fears of the oracular powers of the device that true confessions are sometimes obtained by the mere threat of its use, or by the desire to turn state's evidence before being involved by an accomplice about to be examined. F. E. Inbau, in his “Lie Detection and Criminal Investigation,” also justifies its use in this connection on the basis that “the availability of the lie-detector technique will reduce the extent of ‘third degree’ practices, especially upon innocent suspects.” Again, there is no question that a thoroughly trained and experienced observer—of which, incidentally, there are relatively few—can use this method to obtain valuable clues which can then be followed up. But granted all this, there are still so many pitfalls of technique and interpretation implicit in the procedure that our third question becomes immediately apropos: How trustworthy are the findings?

Here serious difficulties arise. On physical grounds alone, bodily exhaustion or systemic diseases of the lungs, heart, or circulation can put gross distortions into the record. In all cases, then, it devolves upon the examiner to prove that such disorders did not exist at the time of the test—a task made doubly difficult by the circumstance that some healthy and guiltless people are subject to unpredictable irregularities in respiratory and cardiac function. Again, various grades of mental deficiency may render the subject incapable of understanding the meaning of the questions, whereas schizoid or other psychotic tendencies may lead to gross misinterpretations of, or indifference to, the import of examination. But of even greater concern is the more common psychologic fact that both "positive" and "negative" responses on the polygraph may be either invalid or seriously misleading. Thus, one falsely accused subject may become so anxious over the implied threat to his reputation and career that he may over-react to the "crucial questions"; another may show the repressed hatreds of a martyr being persecuted; a third may fear the detection of some other quite unrelated culpability—yet in each case the cardio-respiratory deviations may be spuriously "positive." Conversely, a guilty person may have rationalized his actions so effectively that he suffers few pricks of conscience during his examination and therefore remains subjectively and physiologically placid. Or if he lacks this inner serenity, he may have learned how to "beat the detector rap" in a number of ways. He can, for instance, tense his muscles undetectably in such a manner that his tracings during "control" observations indicate greater deviations from normal than those in response to the "crucial" questions; or he can vitiate the results even more subtly—as an intelligent spy or saboteur can be trained to do—by maintaining certain "mental sets" or by concentrating on emotionally stimulating topics during the entire examination.

THESE are but a few of the reservations on the reliability of so-called "lie-detection" by the polygraphic technique; there are many other medical and psycho-analytic qualifications to the method too technical for discussion here. In their totality such difficulties led a group of Northwestern University investigators to conclude that even under favorable circumstances at least one record out of four is either invalid or erroneous, and that with less careful control the proportion of seriously misleading results may be much higher. In view of this, our last question becomes particularly relevant to considerations of liberty and justice, namely: What is the legal status of lie-detector evidence?

Seven appellate courts have ruled that lie-detector records are not admissible as evidence in the trial of criminal cases, though, of course, duly attested confessions obtained by the polygraphic or any other non-violent method may be so admitted. The Bureau of Legal Medicine and Legislation of the American Medical Association recently reported such a decision in the following words:

We are of the opinion, said the court, that the foregoing enumerated difficulties alone in connection with the lie-detector present obstacles to its acceptability as an instrument of evidence in the trial of criminal cases, notwithstanding its recognized utility . . . for uncovering clues and obtaining confessions. This conclusion is in line with the weight of authority repudiating the lie-detector as an instrument of evidence in the trial of criminal cases. In addition, the authorities give other cogent reasons for its inadaptability as an instrument of evidence in the trial of cases, such as the impossibility of cross-examining the machine (a constitutional impedient) and those human elements of fallibility which surround interpretations of the lie-detector recordings predicated upon the hazards of unknown individual emotional differences, which may and oftentimes do result in erroneous conclusions. We can foresee conditions where to ascertain the truth, it would become necessary to require the operator of the machine to submit to a test to determine the truthfulness of his interpretations.

And yet, despite such rulings, the "lie-detector" continues to be given credence as evidence for Congressional committees, in interviews of applicants for government positions, and in "loyalty" investigations in military or civilian life. Since it is here in particular that the competence of the investigators themselves plays so important a role, let us turn to an article in the Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology by Professor Inbau for an opinion on this subject:

Some branches of the armed services have used and are perhaps still using as examiners certain individuals who are basically unqualified and improperly trained. They have at times conducted tests—and on a large-scale basis at that—upon persons whose loyalty was under scrutiny, and in many instances the reports of these examiners appear to have been accepted at face value and upon the assumption that the technique produced results approximating perfection. For the future welfare of this nation, let us hope that somewhere along the line of persons responsible for the security of our secret weapons or of any other project or interest of national importance there develops a realization that the dependability of lie-detector-test results is no greater than the qualifications and ability of the examiner himself. Moreover, there should be an awareness that even as regards a highly qualified examiner mistakes are still a possibility.

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY: A MEMOIR

BY EDMUND WILSON

ONE is grateful to Vincent Sheean for having written the memoir of Edna Millay that he calls "The Indigo Bunting" (Harper), because, since this extraordinary woman's death, no adequate tribute has been paid to either her work or her personality, and Mr. Sheean, though he saw her only a few times in the later years of her life, has been able to bring to the subject his almost novelistic gift for dramatizing contemporary personalities. What sets Mr. Sheean off from the ordinary writer of memoirs, who depends on mere big names or on gossip, is his ardent sense of human greatness. Nothing, for example, could be more different from the way in which celebrities are usually described than the way of Mr. Sheean in such a book as "Between the Thunder and the Sun." In his account of a house party on the Riviera, he can give you the colors and contours of Maxine Elliott and Winston Churchill—like a portrait painter in the best old tradition—in such a way as to make them impressive, without relinquishing a strong sense of character and personal idiosyncrasy. It is the special Irish faculty, no doubt—which one finds in Yeats's autobiography—for seeing people in their most human, and sometimes in their comic aspects, and yet making them walk the earth like the creatures of heroic legend. In Edna Millay, who had herself so much Irish, Mr. Sheean finds an ideal subject, since one needed no romantic temperament, no predisposition to hero-worship, to recognize in her an exceptional being.

It is one of the themes of his portrait that she exercised over wild birds what seemed to him a special attraction. This, he says, she pooh-poohed herself—she was not a romantic or a mystical person—explaining that they came to her window or circled about her head simply book out of his necessarily slender memoirs. There is a whole chapter on birds in general, which seems little to the purpose and reads like padding—though I believe it is true, as he says and as the following pages will confirm, that Edna Millay had some special affinity with birds; and he runs later to speculations along the lines of his recent interest in Hindu religion, in which he conveys the impression that she did not seem eager to follow him—not surprisingly, in view of her exclusive preoccupation with the actual human world. (God never, I think, appears in her work after such early poems as God's World and Renaissance, except as a mythological property, and her vision of man and the universe is expressed in her Epitaph for the Race of Man.) But "The Indigo Bunting" has a certain importance, for Mr. Sheean has recognized and been able to convey something of Edna Millay's qualities, and he has given the lead for others who knew her better and longer and to because she fed them; but what he tells us does show unmistakably that she exercised an enchantment for Vincent Sheean and induced him, for the first time in his life, to become acutely aware of birds, of which he seems hitherto to have been subnormally ignorant. One never forgot the things she noticed, for she charged them with her own intense feeling. This power of enhancing and ennobling life was felt by all who knew her.

It was probably a mistake, however, for Mr. Sheean to try to make a small whom her work has meant more (Mr. Sheean says he read her poetry only after he met her in the forties) to supplement what he has written of his visits to the Boissevains at Austerlitz, New York, and on the island in Maine where they spent their summers. I propose to take advantage of this cue, with apologies to Mr. Sheean for using "The Indigo Bunting" as a pretext for a kind of counter-memoir. I hope that others who knew Edna Millay will also write about her. There ought to be a memorial volume. The wonder is, one realizes with shame, that none of those who were especially indebted to her—with the exception of Rolfe Humphries, who registered a brief protest in The Nation against the stupidity or indifference with which the news of her death was received—has done anything to commemorate this great writer. It is the proof of Mr. Shecan's instinct for spotting and his talent for celebrating what is really important in his own time that he first should have broken the silence.

I

I FIRST met Edna Millay sometime early in 1920, but I had already known about her a long time. A cousin of mine, also a poet, Carolyn Crosby Wilson (now Carolyn Wilson Link), had been in Edna's class at Vassar, 1917, and when I had visited her at college in the spring of 1916, she had given me the April number of the Vassar Miscellany Monthly, of which she was one of the editors. I had read it coming back on the train and had been rather impressed by the leading feature, a dramatic dialogue in blank verse called The Suicide, by Edna St. Vincent Millay; and later, in "A Book of Vassar Verse," published in 1916, I found The Suicide and another similar poem by Miss Millay called Interim. In 1917, when Miss Millay's book "Renascence" came out, I was in France with the A. E. F., and my cousin sent me a copy of the book, which impressed me much more than the Vassar poems. In 1920, when I was back in America, I read in the March issue of the new literary magazine, the Dial, a sonnet called To Love Impuissant, which I immediately got by heart and found myself declaiming in the shower:

Love, though for this you riddle me with darts,
And drag me at your chariot till I die,—
Oh, heavy prince! Oh, panderer of hearts!—
Yet hear me tell how in their throats they lie
Who shout you mighty: thick about my hair,
Day in, day out, your ominous arrows purr,
Who still am free, unto no querulous care
A fool, and in no temple worshiper!
I, that have bared me to your quiver's fire,
Lifted my face into its puny rain,
Do wreathe you Impotent to Evoke Desire
As you are Powerless to Elicit Pain!
(Now will the god, for blasphemy so brave, Punish me, surely, with the shaft I crave!)

The fascination that this poem had for me was due partly to its ringing defiance—at that time we were all defiant—but partly also to my liking to think that one who appreciated the poet as splendidly as I felt I did might be worthy to deal her the longed-for dart. This was a different, a bolder voice, than the brooding girl of "Renascence." How I hoped I might some day meet her!

This was finally brought about—sometime in the spring of that year—by Hardwicke Nevin (the nephew of Ethelbert Nevin, the composer), whom my friend John Peale Bishop had known at Princeton. He had further excited my interest by his description of Edna's enchanting personality, and he had invited John and me to an evening party at his apartment in Greenwich Village to which Edna came, late, from the theater, where she was acting with the Provincetown Players. I think it was just before this that I had seen the double bill there: a play of Floyd Dell's, in which she had acted, and her own "Aria da Capo," in which her sister Norma played Columbine. I was thrilled and troubled by this little play: it was the first time I had felt Edna's peculiar power. There was a bitter treatment of war, and we were all ironic about war; but there was also a less common sense of the incongruity and the cruelty of life, of the precariousness of love perched on a table above the corpses that had been hastily shoved out of sight, and renewing its eternal twitter in the silence that succeeded the battle. In any case, it was after the theater that Edna came to Hardwicke Nevin's. She complained of being exhausted, but was persuaded to recite some of her poems.

She was dressed in some bright batik, and her face lit up with a flush that seemed to burn also in the bronze reflections of her not yet bobbed reddish hair. She was one of those women whose features are not perfect and who in their moments of dimness may not seem even pretty, but who, excited by the blood or the spirit, become almost supernaturally beautiful. She was small, but her figure was full, though she did not appear plump. She had a lovely and very long throat that gave her the look of a muse, and her reading of her poetry was thrilling. She pronounced every syllable distinctly; she gave every sound its value. She seemed sometimes rather British than American—in her quick way of talking to people as well as in her reading of her poems, and I have never understood how her accent was formed. I suppose it was partly the product of the English tradition in New England, and no doubt—since she had acted from childhood—of her having been taught to read Shakespeare by a college or school elocutionist. She had probably also been influenced by the English Mitchell Kennerleys—Kennerley had been her first publisher—who had taken her up when she was still a girl, and, in a more important way, by the English dramatist Charles Rann Kennedy, who, with his wife Edith Wynn Matthison, the actress, had also been interested in her and had tried to persuade her to go on the stage. In any case, the trueness of her ear made it possible for her to write verse which was really in the English tradition. I believe that our failure in the United States to produce much first-rate lyric poetry is partly due to our flattening and drawling of the vowels and our slovenly slurring of the consonants; and Edna spoke with perfect purity. It may have been partly her musical training, which came out also in her handling of her voice.

Among poets whose phonograph recordings I have heard, it seems to me that Edna Millay and E. E. Cummings and James Joyce give conspicuously the best performances. Joyce, like Edna Millay, is a musician with a well-trained voice; Cummings has, like Edna, the New England precision in enunciating every syllable. All three are masters of tempo and tone. If you play the recording of Renascence, you will hear how the r in the first line gets just the right little twist—so different from the harsh or the slighted r's of the American regional accents; and how the vowels in long and wood are correctly made, respectively, short and long. If you play Elegy, you will hear in the closing lines her characteristic cadences that are almost like song. I do not remember whether she recited this poem the night that I met her first. If she did not, I heard it soon after. It was one of a series she had written for a girl friend at Vassar who had died, which I thought among the finest of the things that she showed me then. What was impressive and rather unsettling when she read such poems aloud was her power of imposing herself on others through a medium that unburdened the emotions of solitude. The company hushed and listened as people do to music—her authority was always complete; but her voice, though dramatic, was lonely.

MY NEXT MOVE was to cultivate her acquaintance by way of Vanity Fair, in the editorial department of which magazine John Bishop and I were both working then. She had at that time no real market for her poems; she sold a lyric only now and then to the highbrow Dial, on the one hand, or to the trashy Ainslee's, on the other. She was hard up and lived with her mother and sisters at the very end of West Nineteenth Street. When I would go to get her there or take her home in a cab, the children that were playing in the street would run up and crowd around her. It was partly that she gave them pennies and sometimes taxi rides, just as she later put out food for the birds, but it was also, I think, the magnetism that Vincent Sheean felt.

We published in Vanity Fair a good deal of Edna's poetry and thus brought her to the attention of a larger public. This was the beginning of her immense popularity. Frank Crowninshield, the editor of Vanity Fair, a clever and extremely entertaining man, was in some ways rather shallow as well as unreliable, but he did have—as it were, as a heritage from his distinguished Boston family—a true instinct about painting and writing and a confidence in his own taste. He deserves a good deal of credit for featuring Edna Millay's poetry and for enabling her later to go abroad. There was nobody else in the publishing world who was both qualified to appreciate her work and in a position to do something to help her in a financial and practical way.

As for John Bishop and me, the more we saw of her poetry, the more our admiration grew, and we both, before very long, had fallen irretrievably in love with her. This latter was so common an experience, so almost inevitable a consequence of knowing her in those days, that it is possible, without being guilty of personal irrelevancies, to introduce it into a memoir of this kind. One cannot really write about Edna Millay without bringing into the foreground of the picture her intoxicating effect on people, because this so much created the atmosphere in which she lived and composed. The spell that she exercised on many, of the most various professions and temperaments, of all ages and both sexes, was at that time exactly that which Vincent Sheean imagines she cast on the birds. I should say here that I do not believe that my estimate of Edna Millay's work has ever been much affected by my personal emotions about her. I admired her poetry before I knew her, and my most exalted feeling for her did not, I think, ever prevent me from recognizing or criticizing what was weak or second-rate in her work. Today, thirty years later, though I see her in a different "context," my opinion has hardly changed. Let me register this unfashionable opinion here, and explain that Edna Millay seems to me one of the few poets writing in English in our time who have attained to anything like the stature of great literary figures in an age in which prose has predominated. It is hard to know how to compare her to Eliot or Auden or Yeats—it would be even harder to compare her to Ezra Pound. There is always a certain incomensurability between men and women writers. But she does have it in common with the first three of these that, in giving supreme expression to profoundly felt personal experience, she was able to identify herself with more general human experience and stand forth as a spokesman for the human spirit, announcing its predicaments, its vicissitudes, but, as a master of human expression, by the splendor of expression itself, putting herself beyond common embarrassments, common oppressions and panics. This is man, who surveys himself and the world in which he moves, not the beast that scurries and suffers; and the name of the poet comes no longer to indicate a mere individual with a birthplace and a legal residence but to figure as one of the pseudonyms assumed by that spirit itself.

This spirit so made itself felt, in all one's relations with Edna, that it towered above the clever college girl, the Greenwich Village gamine, and, later, the neurotic invalid. There was something of awful drama about everything one did with Edna, and yet something that steadied one, too. Those who fell in love with the woman did not, I think, seriously quarrel with her or find themselves at one another's throats, and they were not, except in very small ways, demoralized or led to commit excesses, because the other thing was always there, and her genius, for those who could value it, was not something that one could be jealous of. Her poetry, you soon found out, was her real overmastering passion. She gave it to all the world, but she also gave it to you. As in The Poet and His Book—at that time, one of my favorites of her poems—with its homely but magical images, its urgent and hurried movement—she addressed herself not to her lover, by whom, except momentarily, she had never had the illusion that she lived or died, but to everyone whose pulse could throb quicker at catching the beat of her poetry. This made it possible during the first days we knew her for John and me to see a good deal of her together on the basis of our common love of poetry.

Our parties were in the nature of a sojourn in Pieria—to which, in one of her sonnets, she complains that an unworthy lover is trying to keep her from returning—where it was most delightful to feel at home. I remember particularly an April night in 1920, when we called on Richard Bennett, the actor, who had been brought by Hardwicke Nevin to the Provincetown Players, in the cheerful little house halfway downtown where he lived with his attractive wife and his so soon to be attractive daughters; I sat on the floor with Edna, which seemed to me very Bohemian. On some other occasion, we all undertook to write portraits in verse of ourselves. John's, under the title Self-Portrait, appeared in Vanity Fair, and we wanted to publish Edna's, but one of her sisters intervened and persuaded her that this would not be proper. There was also a trip on a Fifth Avenue bus—we were going to the Claremont for dinner, I think—in the course of which Edna recited to us a sonnet she had just written: "Here is a wound that never will heal, I know." For me, even rolling up Fifth Avenue, this poem plucked the strings of chagrin, for not only did it refer to some other man, someone I did not know, but it suggested that Edna could not be consoled, that such grief was in the nature of things.

I used to take her to plays, concerts, and operas. We saw Bernard Shaw's "Heartbreak House" together, when it was first done in New York, in the November of 1920. I had not liked it much when I read it and had told her that it was a dreary piece on the model of "Misalliance." But the play absorbed and excited her, as it gradually did me, and I saw that I had been quite wrong: "Heartbreak House" was, on the contrary, the first piece of Shaw's in which he had fully realized the possibilities of the country-house conversation with which he had been experimenting in "Getting Married" and "Misalliance." At the end of the second act Edna became very tense and was rather upset over the scene in which Ariadne—who had just said, "I get my whole life messed up with people falling in love with me"—plays cat-and-mouse with the jealous Randell; and when the curtain went down on it, she said: "I hate women who do that, you know." She must have had, in the course of those crowded years, a good many Randells on her hands, but her method of dealing with them was different from that of Bernard Shaw's aggressive Ariadne. She was capable of being mockingly or sternly sharp with an admirer who proved a nuisance, but she did not like to torture people or to play them off against one another. With the dignity of her genius went, not, as is sometimes the case, a coldness or a hatefulness or a touchiness in intimate human relations, but an invincible magnanimity, and the effects of her transitory feminine malice would be canceled by an impartiality which was amiably humorous or sympathetic. It is characteristic of her that, in her sonnet On Hearing a Symphony of Beethoven, she should write of the effect of the music:

The spiteful and the stingy and the rude
Sleep like the scullions in the fairy-tale.

Spitefulness and stinginess and rudeness were among the qualities she most disliked and of which she was least willing to be guilty.

BETWEEN JOHN BISHOP and me relations were, nevertheless, by this time, becoming a little strained. Frank Crowninshield was complaining that it was difficult to have both his assistants in love with one of his most brilliant contributors. There was a time when, from the point of view of taking her out, I was more or less monopolizing Edna, and John, who, between the office and his perfectionist concentration on his poetry—which he recited in the bathroom in the morning and to which he returned at night—had collapsed and come down with the flu. I went to see him, and afterward told Edna—no doubt with a touch of smugness—that I thought he was suffering, also, from his frustrated passion for her. The result of this—which I saw with mixed feelings—was that she paid him a visit at once and did her best to redress the balance. I knew that he had some pretty good poetry to read her, and this did not improve the situation.

But her relations with us and with her other admirers had, as I say, a disarming impartiality. Though she reacted to the traits of the men she knew—a face or a voice or a manner—or to their special qualifications—what they sang or had read or collected—with the same intensely perceptive interest that she brought to anything else—a bird or a shell or a weed—that had attracted her burning attention; though she was quick to feel weakness or strength, she did not, nevertheless, give the impression that personality much mattered for her or that, aside from her mother and sisters, her personal relations were important except as subjects for poems; and when she came to write about her lovers, she gave them so little individuality that it was usually, in any given case, impossible to tell which man she was writing about. What interests her is seldom the people themselves but her own emotions about them; and the sonnets that she published in sequences differed basically from Mrs. Browning's in that they dealt with a miscellany of men without—since they are all about her—the reader's feeling the slightest discontinuity.

In all this she was not egotistic in any boring or ridiculous or oppressive way, because it was not the personal, but the impersonal Edna Millay—that is, the poet—that preoccupied her so incessantly. But she was sometimes rather a strain, because nothing could be casual for her; I do not think I ever saw her relaxed, even when she was tired or ill. I used to suppose that this strain of being with her must be due to my own anxieties, but I later discovered that others who had never been emotionally involved with her were affected in the same way.

She could be very amusing in company, but the wit of her conversation was as sharp as the pathos of her poetry. She was not at all a social person. She did not gossip; did not like to talk current events; did not like to talk personalities. It was partly that she was really noble, partly that she was rather neurotic, and the two things, bound up together, made it difficult for her to meet the world easily. When Mr. Sheean met her, late in her life, she at first, he tells us, seemed tongue-tied; then puzzled him extremely by thanking him, as if it had happened yesterday, for his having, in some official connection about which he had completely forgotten, sent her some flowers five years before; then analyzed, with a closeness he could hardly follow, a poem of Gerard Manley Hopkins, the sense of which she insisted, with bitterness and an "animation" that brought out "her very extraordinary beauty—not the beauty of every day but apart," had been spoiled by Hopkins' editor, Robert Bridges' having put in a comma in the wrong place. But although Edna sometimes fatigued one, she was never, as even the most gifted sometimes are, tyrannical, fatuous, or vain. She was either like the most condensed literature or music, the demands of which one cannot meet protractedly, or like a serious nervous case—though this side of her was more in evidence later—whom one finds that one cannot soothe.

WHAT WAS THE CAUSE of this strain? From what was the pressure derived that Edna Millay seemed always to be under? At that time I was too young and too much in love to be able to understand her well, and I afterward saw her only at intervals and in a much less intimate way. But I had found, when I had come into contact with the formidable strength of character that lay behind her attractiveness and brilliance, something as different as possible from the legend of her Greenwich Village reputation, something austere and even grim. She had been born in Rockland, Maine, and had grown up in small Maine towns. I heard her speak of her father only once. He and her mother had not lived together since the children were quite small, and her mother, who had studied to be a singer, supported them by district nursing, without ceasing—as I learn from Mr. Sheean—to train the local orchestra and write out their scores. They were poor; the mother was away all day, and the three girls were thrown much on themselves. To Edna, her sisters and her poetry and music must have been almost the whole of life. Such suitors as she had had in Maine she did not seem to have taken very seriously. By her precocious and remarkable poem, Renascence, written when she was hardly nineteen, she had attracted, at a summer entertainment, the attention of a visitor, Miss Caroline B. Dow, the New York head of the National Training School of the Y. W. C. A., who raised the money to send her to college. She did not graduate, therefore, till she was twenty-five, when she at last emerged into the freedom of a world where her genius and beauty were soon to make her famous, to bring all sorts of people about her, with a character and intellect that had been developed in solitude and under the discipline of hard conditions. Her human emotional life had, it seemed to me, in her girlhood been rather cramped, but she had herself given her emotions their satisfaction through the objects—the poems—she was able to create, and this life of the mind, this life of art, by which she had triumphed in a little Maine town that offered few other triumphs, was to remain for her the great reality that made everything else unimportant.

It is all in the astonishing Renascence, which is a study of claustrophobia. Hemmed in between the mountains and the sea of Camden on Penobscot Bay, the girl is beginning to suffocate; she looks up, and the sky seems to offer escape, but when she puts up her hand, she screams, for she finds it is so low that she can touch it, and Infinity settles down on her—she can hear the ticking of Eternity; she is beset by a new ordeal, for she begins to feel all human guilt, experience all human suffering, and this, too, becomes an oppression which is killing her; she now sinks six feet into the ground, and she feels the weight roll from her breast; her tortured soul breaks away, and the comforting rain begins to fall; but she is dead now and she wants to escape from the grave, which itself has become a prison, for she imagines how beautiful the world will be as soon as the rain is over; she prays to God for the rain to wash away the grave, and a storm comes and sets her free to those beauties of the world she has longed for; she springs up, embraces the trees, hugs the ground, feels that nothing can ever hide her from God again; the world, she now knows, is as wide as the heart, the heavens as high as the soul, but East and West will close in and crush you if you do not keep them apart, and the sky will cave in on you if your soul is flat.

This poem gives the central theme of Edna Millay's whole work: she is alone; she is afraid that the world will crush her; she must summon the strength to assert herself, to draw herself up to her full stature, to embrace the world with love; and the storm—which stands evidently for sexual love—comes to effect a liberation. Her real sexual experience, which came rather late, was to play in her poetry the role of this storm, for it gives her the world to embrace, yet it always leaves her alone again, alone and afraid of death. Withdrawal is her natural condition: she was always, as Mr. Sheean indicates—and this made itself felt as a part of the strain—extremely shy of meeting people; and she was terrified by New York, of which I do not think she saw much, for she would not cross a street alone. She feels that she is "caught beneath great buildings," and she longs to be back in Maine—though the Maine she is homesick for is never in the least idealized, but, on the contrary, a meager country with threadbare interiors, wizened apples, and weedy mussels on rotting hulls. One of her poems of this time that impressed me most was the long Ode to Silence, in which she celebrates an inner sanctuary that is like the grave of Renascence—a garden which lies "in a lull," like it, "between the mountains and the mountainous sea."

OF THE HOUSEHOLD in which Edna grew up I had a glimpse, in the summer of 1920, when I went at her invitation—she had John Bishop and me on different week-ends—to visit her at Truro, near the tip of Cape Cod. It was already dark when I got there—there was in those days a train that went all the way to Provincetown, shuffling along so slowly that it might have been plodding through the sand—and though I was met by a man with a cart, he did not, for some curmudgeonly Cape Cod reason, drive me all the way to the house but dropped me some distance away from it, so that I somehow got lost in a field and dragged my suitcase through scrub oak and sweetfern in the hot breathless August night. At last I saw a gleam—a small house—which I approached from the fields behind it, and there I found the Millays: Edna, with her mother and her two sisters, none of whom I had met.

The little house had been lent them by George Cram Cook (always known as "Jig"), the organizer of the Provincetown Players, who with Susan Glaspell lived across the road. It was bare, with no decoration and only a few pieces of furniture; a windmill that pumped water and no plumbing. Norma has told me since that when it rained the first night they got there, before they knew they had neighbors who could see them, they had all taken a shower under the spout from the roof. They gave me a dinner on a plain board table by the light of an oil lamp. I had never seen anything like this household, nor have I ever seen anything like it since. Edna tried to reassure me by telling me that I mustn't be overpowered by all those girls, and one of the others added, "And what girls!" Norma, the second sister, was a blonde, who looked a little like Edna; Kathleen, the youngest, was different, a dark Irish type. Edna was now very freckled. All were extremely pretty. But it was the mother who was most extraordinary. She was a little old woman with spectacles, who, although she had evidently been through a good deal, had managed to remain very brisk and bright. She sat up straight and smoked cigarettes and quizzically followed the conversation. She looked not unlike a New England school teacher, yet there was something almost raffish about her. She had anticipated the bohemianism of her daughters; and she sometimes made remarks that were startling from the lips of a little old lady. But there was nothing sordid about her: you felt even more than with Edna that she had passed beyond good and evil, beyond the power of hardship to worry her, and that she had attained there a certain gaiety. The daughters entertained me with humorous songs—they sang parts very well together—which they had composed in their girlhood in Maine.

Edna had been turning into verse, for a collection called "Folk Songs of Many Peoples," prose translations of some European peasant songs, and she sang me her versions, which enchanted me—especially one from Estonia, with a merry and poignant tune:

Piper, pipe a tune, call the dancers out!
Oh, the happy bag-pipes, the laughing shout!

Now the merry step we are treading!
Health to all, and joy bless this wedding!
Tra, la, la! Tra, la, la! Youth is all pleasure!
Let the beating foot strike the time of the measure!

Now the master's son, riches spurning,
Weds the farmer maid of his yearning;
Now the girl the rose garland covers,
Leaves her father's house for her lover's.
Tra, la la! Lonely my heart, dream-laden.

Would that I the bridegroom were, of so sweet a maiden.

The word lonely in the second stanza was given a dramatic emphasis by being put in the place of the second Tra la la, in such a way that the first syllable was prolonged in two drooping notes.

Since there were only two rooms on the first floor, with no partition between them, the only way for Edna and me to get away by ourselves was to sit in a swing on the porch; but the mosquitoes were so tormenting—there being then no mosquito control—that we soon had to go in again. I did, however, ask her formally to marry me, and she did not reject my proposal but said that she would think about it. I am not sure that she actually said, "That might be the solution," but it haunts me that she conveyed that idea. In any case, it was plain to me that proposals of marriage were not a source of great excitement.

The next morning she sat on the floor and recited a lot of new poems—she rarely read her poetry, she knew it by heart. The Millays were rather vague about meals and only really concentrated on dinner, but they never apologized for anything. We played the Fifth Symphony on a primitive old phonograph that had been left with them by Allan Ross Macdougall. She was committing the whole thing to memory, as she liked to do with music and poems; and raspy and blurred though it sounded, the power of its bold or mysterious motifs came through to me—surcharged with her power—as it never had done before.

Jig Cook and Hutchins Hapgood dropped by and sat on the edge of the porch. The conversation was light but learned, and I was rather astonished when Jig quoted a poem in Sanskrit: I did not know at that time that he was a liberated Greek professor. But the things that remain with me most vividly—because she called my attention to them—are the vision of Jig Cook's daughter, Nilla, a handsome and sturdy little girl in a bright red bathing suit walking along the beach, as we looked down from the cliff above; and a gull's egg we found on the naked sand—gulls do not build nests—which made Edna stop and stare. It came back to me seven years later when, going up to Cape Cod in the early summer, I found myself alone in Provincetown:

We never from the barren down,
Beneath the silver-lucid breast
Of drifting plume, gazed out to drown
Where daylight whitens to the west.

Here never in this place I knew
Such beauty by your side, such peace—
These skies that, brightening, imbue
With dawn's delight the day's release.

Only, upon the barren beach,
Beside the gray egg of a gull,
With that fixed look and fervent speech,
You stopped and called it beautiful.

Lone as the voice that sped the word!—
Gray-green as eyes that ate its round!—
The desert dropping of a bird,
Bare-bedded in the sandy ground.

Tonight, where clouds like foam are blown,
I ride alone the surf of light—
As—even by my side—alone
That stony beauty burned your sight.

For I was not "the solution," nor was anyone else she knew; and she had come to a crisis in her life. "I'll be thirty in a minute!" she said to me one day. She moved from the apartment she had shared with her family and where, she complained, the sewing-machine had interfered with her writing, and took two rooms and a bath on West Twelfth Street, where Kathleen eventually joined her. But this made her more accessible and exposed her to the importunities of her suitors, who really besieged her door. She did not want to marry any of them, and, having tried two Greenwich Village ménages, she no longer had any illusions about extra-marital arrangements that were supposed to leave the parties free but, since somebody was always jealous, actually made their relations intolerable. And even with her literary career, she had lately been running into difficulties of a most discouraging kind. Her new book, "Second April," had been set up a long time before—she showed me the proofs when I first knew her—but Mitchell Kennerley, who was having financial troubles, did not bring the book out and would not even communicate with her. Besides this, her benefactress, Miss Dow, to whom she had dedicated "Second April," did not approve of her recent work—just as James Joyce's patron, Miss Harriet Weaver, was scandalized by "Ulysses"—and this worried her very much, for she could not write differently to please Miss Dow, and did not know how to answer her letters. She had one or two depressing illnesses. Her apartment was poorly heated, and I brought her an electric heater. I remember how miserable she seemed—though she never lost a certain liveliness—wrapped up in an old flannel bathrobe and bundled in shabby covers. Above the bed was a modern painting, all fractured geometrical planes that vaguely delineated a female figure, which the Millay girls called Directions for Using the Empress.

IT WAS DECIDED she should go abroad. She had never been in Europe, and she wanted to get away from the Village. She had begun to do for Vanity Fair the satirical dialogues and sketches which were published under the pseudonym "Nancy Boyd," and this made it possible for Crowninshield to pay her a regular allowance. He did his best to induce Edna to sign these pieces with her own name—he offered her, in fact, more money; but she never would compromise about her work. No matter how confused her life became, she was always clear about this. If one compares the contents of "Figs from Thistles," written in the same year as the poems in "Second April," with the contents of the other book, one can see that she imposed on herself a pretty rigorous critical standard. She would not mix with her serious work any of the merely cute feminine pieces that had something in common with the songs that the sisters made up for their own amusement, nor any of the easier lyrics that reflected the tone of the women's magazines. This serious work, never loosely written, was tragic, almost pessimistic (though the best of her lighter verse had the same sort of implications). It was natural that Hardy and Housman should have been among her admirers. From Housman she partly derived (Mr. Sheean, in asserting that Edna Millay owed nothing to any other poet since Shakespeare, has neglected this important exception), and she was closer to this masculine stoicism than to the heartbreak of Sara Teasdale. It was this tough intellectual side combined with her feminine attraction that made her such a satisfactory companion, and that persuaded so many men that they had found their ideal mate. She was quite free from the bluestocking's showing-off, but she did have a rather school-marmish side—which rapped Mr. Sheean's knuckles when he put out a cigarette in his coffee cup. In just this way I have heard her complain of the vandalisms of Greenwich Villagers who made a point of scorning bourgeois sanctions. And so she reprimanded me once when I tried to fulfil my editorial function by urging her to sign her name to her Nancy Boyd articles. Her attitude was: "Don't you know it's impolite to the teacher and reflects on the home you come from to throw chalk around in class?"

I tried to help her get on with these sketches, at the time when she was not yet well, by typing to her dictation, but she was anything but a facile writer and she insisted on putting in as comic lines remarks I had just made in earnest. We had at this time some wonderful conversations, at which quite a lot of bootleg gin was drunk, and even in that dreadful form, this exhilarating bitter liquor has always kept for me a certain glamour that others have not acquired. On one of these occasions she recited to me the fragments of a long poem she had started, called Epitaph for the Race of Man. This was something quite different from the sonnet sequence that she published in 1934. It was written, like Renascence, in iambic tetrameter; but it was equally evolutionary: there were monkeys, though not yet, I think, dinosaurs. It surprised me, for it was purely philosophical, and it gave me a new idea of her range. One evening we set out to talk French in preparation for her coming trip. I remarked that her ex-admirers ought to organize an alumni association—to which she answered with promptness and point: "On en parle toujours, mais on ne le fait jamais." John Bishop and I, who had realized that we were both quite out of the running without, however, we thought, having yet been superseded by a serious rival, had renewed our good relations and spent an evening with her together, just before she left, on our old high and festive basis. But neither of us saw her off. I think that we were both afraid of the possible unknown others we might have to confront on the pier.

THAT I MISSED HER may be seen from the following poem. I had read the "Georgics" of Virgil in the summer of 1922, and the phrase in luminis oras—which he uses in connection with the sprouting plants that reach upwards to "the shores of light"—though a conventional Latin formula that had appeared in the older poets, had echoed in my head with the accent of pathos that haunts even fertility in Virgil, and eventually gave me a motif.

Shut out the Square!
Though not for grayness and the rainy path.—
For that intolerable aching air
Of meetings long resolved to silences
And absences like death—
For the throat a moment lifted, the wide brow shaken free,
Where there was neither leaf nor wind
A dryad by her tree—
Against the narrow door that closed the narrow hall,
Blank then but for a night that now for all
With blankness wounds the mind.
Gaze out with steady glare!
Present the tough unbroken glove!
For suddenly you heard to-night
Your voice that speaks and saw your hands that write,
Yet never speak nor write the name they love—
And knew the hours were waves that wash away
Farther each day to sea the summer sound
Of children shrill and late, of summer hours that run
Late, late, yet never sleep and never tire,
Before they meet the sun.
We spoke the sudden words, the words already known—
We spoke, and spoke no more, for tongues were fire.
Now, watching from this shore at last,
alone
I seem to wait the turning of that tide
That ebbs for ever.

Children, waking to the day,
Cry out for joy.

My stubborn heart to-night
Divines the fate of souls who have not died,
Buried in sullen shadows underground—
That reach for ever toward the shores of light.

II

I SAW her in Paris in the summer of 1921. She had made new friends and, both there and in England, was having, I think, a very good time. I had the impression that Europe frightened her less than New York, but she must have continued to live with considerable recklessness, for at the end of two years abroad she was in very bad shape again. Returned home at the beginning of 1923, she married, in July, Eugen Boissevain, just before she went to the hospital for a serious operation. She had met him at Croton since she had come back from Europe, and had first got to know him in a round of charades. He was a Dutchman with an Irish mother, the son of the editor of the largest Dutch newspaper and himself a coffee importer, with offices in New York. He had been married to Inez Milholland, a Vassar girl who had practiced law and become a famous public champion of labor causes and women's rights, who had died in 1917. He was a gentleman and had once been quite well-to-do. Max Eastman, in his autobiographical "Enjoyment of Living," describes him at the time of his first marriage as "handsome and muscular and bold, boisterous in conversation, noisy in laughter, yet redeemed by a strain of something feminine that most men except the creative geniuses lack." With no particular talent or bent of his own, it was possible for him only vicariously to express this imaginative and sensitive side, and he was led, as it were, to the special vocation of assisting the careers of gifted women. He was twelve years older than Edna, and, although, as Max Eastman says, he had "the genius, the audacity, and the uncompromising determination to enjoy the adventure of life," he made one feel that he had always behind him a stout background of Dutch burgher stability. She had made a very sound choice. He took her on a trip to the Orient and then bought a large farm at Austerlitz, New York, where they settled in 1925 and lived for the rest of their lives.

I used to see and correspond with her occasionally. I have a memory of calling on her once in January, 1924, in the tiny little house in Bedford Street, 75½, where they lived before they went to the country. I found her absorbed in a paint catalogue, of which she made the special shades of color and their often delightful names start into a relief that seemed almost as vivid as the voices of the Fifth Symphony when she had played it on the phonograph in Truro. From a notebook of 1928—it must have been early in the year, since "The Buck in the Snow" had not yet come out—I learn that she "summoned me to the Vanderbilt to talk about [her] bobolink poem," about which I seem to have been only moderately enthusiastic. "You mean you think it sounds like Mary Carolyn Davies!" I find she replied to my criticisms. "I said," my record continues, "that at the time she had written 'Second April' she had been under so many kinds of pressure that the people who read her poems hardly thought about them as literature at all: there had been an element of panic about them. She said, 'Yes, and I still want to knock 'em cold!' For two cents she would tear up the bobolink proof and not let the Delineator have it. . . . She looked quite beautiful, very high pink flush, and brown dress that brought out her color." I noted, also, Boissevain's "protective attitude" and his saying that her recent work was "more objective." He was right, and the volume of lyrics called "The Buck in the Snow"—the first she had published since "The Harp Weaver" of 1923—which came out later that year, contained work of a much less desperate, a more contemplative kind, which included, along with the bobolink, several of her finest poems: Dawn, The Cameo, Sonnet to Gath, On Hearing a Symphony of Beethoven.

This book contained also a piece that I read with both pleasure and embarrassment, for I recognized it—she afterwards confirmed this—as an account of an evening we had spent together—it must have been sometime that same winter, when I had been living in a little room on West Thirteenth Street opposite a taxi garage and just around the corner from Eighth Avenue. I had read her the Latin elegiacs that A. E. Housman had prefixed to his Manilius and a translation of them I had made; some of Yeats's latest poems, which she had not seen; and James Joyce's "Pomes Penyeach," as to which I thought her rather old-fashioned for objecting that the title cheapened them, as if he had let them go as the work of some "Nancy Boyd." I do not remember behaving as she describes (as people seem so often to say). I think she must have combined this occasion with some memory from our earlier phase, but it is painful to me to reread this poem today and to feel again, in retrospect, how much I must have hated to part from her.

PORTRAIT

Over and over I have heard,
As now I hear it,
Your voice harsh and light as the scratching of dry leaves over the hard ground,
Your voice forever assailed and shaken by the wind from the island — Of illustrious living and dead, that never dies down,
And bending at moments under the terrible weight of the perfect word, Here in this room with fire, without comfort of any kind,
Reading aloud to me immortal page after page conceived in a mortal mind.
Beauty at such moments before me like a wild bright bird
Has been in the room, and eyed me, and let me come near it.

I could not ever nor can I to this day Acquaint you with the triumph and the sweet rest
These hours have brought to me and always bring,— Rapture, coloured like the wild bird's neck and wing,
Comfort, softer than the feathers of its breast.
Always, and even now, when I rise to go,
Your eyes blaze out from a face gone
wickedly pale;
I try to tell you what I would have you know,—
What peace it was; you cry me down;
you scourge me with a salty flail;
You will not have it so.

She had said to me in the course of that evening that the only bad feature of Austerlitz was its not being near the sea, of which she had a permanent need, that the hills and the woods walled her in and sometimes made her feel imprisoned (this was, as I now can see, one of the phases of her recurrent claustrophobia). I suppose it was to remedy this that they later bought their island in Maine. In the May of 1928, I had a wire from her inviting me to Austerlitz for a week-end. I went, and it was pleasant, as I learn from my notes—the prospect of seeing her again must, as usual, have stimulated my perceptions—to find myself on the train, in the widening landscape of upstate New York, with its dark and thick-bristling hills, today blurred with mist at the tops and misted at the bases with fruit-blossoms; and, in intervals of reading Proust's letters to Mme Sheikévitch, I looked out on the long roads leading over these hills, the white houses and little red cabins and large-looming tarnished barns, the stone fences that lay in loose meshes, the small faded rural hotels that so often stood opposite the stations—with the soddenly wet gray day superimposed rather queerly on the freshest greenness of spring. There were desolate yellow freight cars trailing along the route, and the timbery marshes were studded with the rank green of skunk-cabbage leaves. The ponds and the stream had a dark smooth luster even under the rain, but the foam of the apple blossoms, like some dirty sheep in a pasture, seemed yellowed by the turbid weather. A growth of squarish, whitish houses in the bowl of one of the valleys seemed almost a product of the damp, like the skunk-cabbage in the swamp.

At Austerlitz—hirsute hills—the overcast sultry weather seemed brooding like a mother bird over the not yet quite opening beauties of spring, the little pink fruit-tree buds that were just on the point of bursting. The birds themselves seemed subdued, and Edna, when I reached the Boissevains' place, said that she imagined the farm hands—"ominously silent," also—perched somewhere with their heads under their wings. I had, on my side, been saving for her a simile and remarked that on one of the lawns I had passed the dandelions had looked like grated egg on spinach. We were neither of us quite at our best perhaps, but we always made a certain effort. Above the Boissevains' house—called Steepletop—a big densely green tree-grown hill, with the flat effect of a tapestry, was stitched with distinct white birch.

Gene Boissevain, when I arrived, was planting a border of pansies with a gardener's intent application; but his attention seemed soon to flag, for he began singing cockney songs at the top of his voice. Then he addressed himself to oiling the lawnmower; then suddenly dropped it and proposed a drink. There was a comfortable living-room, in which, as one first came into it, one was startled at being confronted by a dark black human head staring fixedly and almost fiercely from eyes that had black irises and glowing whites: a bronze bust of Sappho, painted black, on an immense marble pedestal, which an admirer had sent Edna from Italy. There were also hangings from India, golden birds on a background of green, that she had brought back from her first trip to London. We did a good deal of leisurely drinking, all in the gamut of apple products, on which people who lived in the country much depended under Prohibition: apple brandies and apple wines that ranged in color from citron to amber. Edna was interesting herself in the local animals and birds and trees, which begin to turn up in "The Buck in the Snow"; but we decided not to go for a walk, as it had been earlier proposed to do. They had a sensitive German police dog, who, when Boissevain had given her a scolding, would drag herself into the room, bumping against the chairs, as if her hind legs were paralyzed. They thought she was a case for Freud.

There was a piano in the living-room, and the next morning I asked her to play. I had not heard her since years before, when she had taken off her rings and left them on the piano in my apartment in Sixteenth Street, and I had found in my mailbox the next morning a note dated "three p.m. (out to get food)"—since she lived only a few blocks away—asking me to bring them back. She had now, she told me, taken up music again and was trying to work regularly at it. She was studying a sonata of Beethoven and played parts of it with her bright alive touch, dropping them, however, with impatience at the raggedness of her own performance. Then she got out a lot of new poems, over which we had a long session. It brought her back to her old intensity. She was desperately, feverishly anxious not to let her standard down. She sometimes kept a poem for decades before she got it into satisfactory form. I remember one ambitious piece called Pittsburgh Rose, on which she had been working that summer, that impressed me very much at the time but that she never got to the point of publishing—also Menses, which was not printed till "Huntsman, What Quarry?" in 1937.

I tried to relieve the strain that was inevitably set up between us by talking about current ideas and books—to which at that time she paid little attention—and by telling her a gag of Joe Cook's, which I had also been saving for her, because it was a little in her own vein. Cook, in his latest show, had exhibited to the audience two shower baths and explained they were his own invention: the remarkable thing about them was that you could have a complete shower without taking off your clothes and without getting them wet. He introduced to the audience two men in full evening dress, wearing silk hats. They stepped into the showers and pulled the curtains—the sound of water was heard. Joe Cook then jerked open the curtains, and the gentlemen emerged drenched. Cook turned to the audience and said, "I have never been more embarrassed in my life!" But even as I was telling this and Edna was laughing at it, I was chilled by the awful seriousness of the implications it was taking on.

The next summer I was visiting near Austerlitz and called on the Boissevains one afternoon. While we were talking, it began to grow dark, and the living-room was half in shadow. There were a number of people there, and the conversation was general. I had a curious and touching impression, as Edna sat quiet in a big chair, that—torn and distracted by winds that had swept her through many seas—she had been towed into harbor and moored, that she was floating at anchor there.

IT WAS DIFFICULT for the romantics of the twenties to slow down and slough off their youth; when everything had seemed to be possible and they had been able to treat their genius as an unlimited checking account. One could always still resort to liquor to keep up the old excitement, it was a kind of way of getting back there; the old habit of recklessness was hard to drop, the scorn for safe living and expediency, the need to heighten the sensations of life. Edna had now been led back to something like the rural isolation of her girlhood, and in her retreat she had no children to occupy her, to compel her to outgrow her girlhood. Though I did not see much of her through all these years, I got the impression that she was alternating between vigorously creative periods when she produced the firm-based strong-molded work that represented her full artistic maturity—"Fatal Interview" and "Epitaph for the Race of Man"—and dreadful lapses into depression and helplessness that sometimes lasted for months. I did not encourage her to talk about these; but I remember her telling me on one occasion, not very long after her marriage, when she had apparently spent weeks in bed, that she had done nothing but weep all the time; and on another she startled me by saying, in the midst of showing me her poetry: "I'm not a pathetic character!" This must have been in 1928, at the time when she was still a romantic figure and a fabulously popular poet, imitated, adored, and envied all over the United States, who was able to make big fees by reading her poems in public. Through all this Eugen Boissevain must have been inexhaustibly patient, considerate, and comprehending. He had given his whole life to Edna. He dropped his business and seriously worked the farm. He accompanied her on the triumphs of her reading tours and saw her through the ordeals of her hospitals. He arranged for her a social life—it is reflected, I suppose, to some extent, in "Conversation at Midnight"—of a kind that she could never have made for herself, which afforded her more "human" contacts than were possible in the exhausting relationships that were natural to her passionate spirit. Yet she continued, from time to time, to follow her old pattern of escape by breaking away from her domestic arrangements. The sequence of sonnets called "Fatal Interview"—certainly one of her most successful works and one of the great poems of our day—was evidently the product of such an episode. It is, I think, unique among her poems in representing the lover as wanting to end the affair before the poet is willing to let him go.

I DID NOT SEE her for nineteen years after my call of 1929. It was not till 1944 that I seem even to have written her again. I had been astonished and worried by the poetry she had been pubishing during the war, on a level of war-time journalism of which I had not imagined her capable. I tried to explain it as partly due to the natural anxieties of Eugen when Holland was seized by Hitler, and I remembered Henry James's description, in his life of William Wetmore Story, of Mrs. Browning's "feverish obsession" with the Italian Risorgimento. "It is impossible," says James, "not to feel, as we read, that to 'care,' in the common phrase, as she is caring is to entertain one's convictions as a malady and a doom. . . . We wonder why so much disinterested passion . . . should not leave us in a less disturbed degree the benefit of the moral beauty. We . . . end by asking ourselves if it be not because her admirable mind, otherwise splendidly exhibited, has inclined us to look in her for that saving and sacred sense of proportion, of the free and blessed general, that great poets, that genius and the high range of genius, give us the impression of even in emotion and passion, even in pleading a cause and calling on the gods." I concluded that when women of genius got carried away by a cause, this was the kind of thing that deplorably sometimes happened. But I thought that, since she had come to that pass, she probably needed artistic encouragement; the reviewers were giving her plenty of scolding.

So I wrote her a letter in which I refrained from mentioning her war verse at all but congratulated her on the album of her recordings, which, although it had been made some time before, in 1941, I had only recently bought. One of the poems she had recorded was The Harp-Weaver, for which I had not much cared when it first appeared. I had told her that it was one of her poems that belonged in a woman's magazine, and was surprised when she defended it strongly, as she did not always do with her work when it verged on the sentimental. I had known that it was about her own mother, and the volume was dedicated to Cora Millay. During the years when Edna had been living in Europe, she had arranged to bring her mother over—which, with her own meager resources at that time, could not have been easy to manage; and I knew how devoted she was to the debonair, hard-bitten old lady who had worked for her and educated her. But I did not know with how much effectiveness she had put it into the Harp-Weaver poem—or, at least, into her reading of it, for it is better to hear than to read: the loneliness, the poverty, the unvalued Irish heritage, the Spartan New England self-discipline, the gift of artistic creation and intellectual distinction—her mother had taught Edna to write verse at four and to play the piano at seven—that the mother had been able to transmit. She had made of it something dramatic and almost unbearably moving, a record of the closest relationship that Edna, up to then, I suppose—that is, up to her marriage—had ever known. I wrote her something of this, and I told her that John Bishop had died that spring. I heard nothing from her for two years; then, in the summer of 1946, I received from her this strange letter:

Steepletop,
August, 1946.

. . . It is two years now since I received your letter. You had bad news to tell me: the death of John Bishop. Even now, that seems unlikely* . . . How you must have missed him that summer, and how you still must miss him, is something that I would rather not go into in my mind. For it would make me ache, only to think of it . . . and I don't like aching, any more than anybody else . . .

You told me also, in that letter, that you liked my recorded readings from my poems. That pleased me enormously. I had felt pretty sure, myself, that they were good, but your verdict was like an Imprimatur to me . . .

Your letter reached me at a time when I was very ill indeed, in the Doctors Hospital in New York. I was enjoying there a very handsome—and, as I afterwards was told, an all but life-size—nervous breakdown. For five years I had been writing almost nothing but propaganda. And I can tell you from my own experience, that there is nothing on this earth which can so much get on the nerves of a good poet, as the writing of bad poetry . . . Anyway, finally I cracked up under it. I was in the hospital a long time . . .

This does not explain, of course, why, when I got out and came home, after I got well and strong again, still I did not write you . . . But here, happily for me, and for you, I can save ourselves the cumbersome explaining, by reminding you of a letter of Gerard Hopkins . . . In this letter he makes apology—I forget to whom; possibly to Robert Bridges, although, somehow, I think not—for having been so slow in answering. And he states—not in these words at all, but this is the meaning of it—: that the driving of him-

by Jean Gould

This is an exceptional biography for young adults. The story of the great leader of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America begins in a small Russian border town. A serious youth who revolted against czarist tyranny, Hillman came to America and became a cutter at Hart, Shaffner and Marx in Chicago. Miss Gould carefully traces Hillman's career including the early strikes, his presidency of the Amalgamated, and his welfare programs. Her information comes from Union files, from interviews with Union officials and with Mr. Hillman's widow.

self by himself to make the beginning of a letter, is almost more than his strength can support. When once he has forced himself to begin the letter, he says, the going is not so bad. . . Well, I, too, suffer from that disease. For it is a disease. It is as real, and its outlines are quite as clear, as in a case of claustrophobia, or agoraphobia. . . I have named it, just in order to comfort myself, and to dignify this pitiful horror with a name, epistolaphobia. . . I say, "I, too, suffer from that disease." But I think I have it very much worse than he had. For after all, he did write many letters. . . And I don't. . . It is sheer desperation and pure panic—lest, through my continued silence, I lose your friendship, which I prize—that whips me to the typewriter now. I don't know where you are. But I think, and I think it often, "Wherever he is, there he still is, and perhaps some day I shall see him again, and we shall talk about poetry, as we used to do."

I have just finished learning by heart Matthew Arnold's Scholar Gypsy,—such a lovely poem. I had wanted for years to know it by heart, but it had always looked a bit long to me. . . It is not at all difficult, however, to learn by heart stanza by stanza; it is so reasonable. I have also learned by heart The Eve of St. Agnes and Lamia. Lamia, let me tell you, is a very long poem. And Keats, in both these poems, makes it as tricky as possible for you, by shifting all the time from "thou" to "you," and by whisking you suddenly from the past tense into the present tense. . . To get these passages into your memory, and exact, is really quite a chore. I have learned by heart, of Shelley, not only To the West Wind—and surely the second stanza of that poem is as fine a thing as ever was written in English—but also the Hymn to Intellectual Beauty—a devil to learn by heart. Anyway, I have them all now. And what evil thing can ever again even brush me with its wings?

With love, as ever,

Edna

. . . I am sending you, here—enclosed, three new poems of my own. I hope, of course I hope very much, that you will like them. But don't—oh, for God's sake, don't for one moment—feel that you must write me something about them, or, indeed, in any way acknowledge this letter at all. I would not put so great a burden upon the shoulders and upon the brain of the person that in all the world I hated the most. . . I do not need your answer. I am happy enough as it is. For I have at last, after two years of recurring spiritual torment, been able to flog myself into writing a very simple letter to a dear and trusted friend.

E.

I forgot to tell you, even though I was speaking of Father Hopkins, that I have also learned by heart at least one-third of his published poetry. Have you ever tried to learn him by heart?—It is great fun, very exciting, difficult.

IN THE AUGUST of 1948 I was attending the Berkshire Music Festival and, discovering that Austerlitz was not far away, I called up the Boissevains and went over with my wife to see them. I had not seen them for nineteen years, and when I had inquired about them of such friends as I happened to meet, they had not seemed to know much about them either. As we drove through the long tunnel of greenery that led to the Steepletop house, I felt, as I had not done before, that Edna had been buried out there. Gene Boissevain came out in his working clothes. He shuffled in his leather moccasins; he had aged: he was graying and stooped. I had a feeling that his morale was low. "I'll go and get my child," he said. I did not realize at first that this meant Edna. I found in the living-room most of the things that had been there in 1929: the scaring Ethiopian Sappho, the golden birds on the "Tree of Life." But the birds were paler, their background was gray; the couches looked badly worn. The whole place seemed shabby and dim. I had the feeling that it was so long ago that they had set up keeping house together that they had ceased to notice the room, that they never did anything to freshen it up. One saw, standing outside the window, three rusty old tin oil barrels, on which Edna could put food for birds without having it stolen by the squirrels. In one corner, a litter of copybooks covered table, couch, chair, and floor.

In a few minutes Edna came in, wearing slacks and a white working shirt, open at the neck. It was a moment before I recognized her. She had so changed in the nineteen years that if I had met her unexpectedly somewhere I am sure I should not have known her. She had become somewhat heavy and dumpy, and her cheeks were a little florid. Her eyes had a bird-lidded look that I recognized as typically Irish, and I noticed for the first time a certain resemblance to her mother. She was terribly nervous; her hands shook; there was a look of fright in her bright green eyes. Eugen brought us martinis. Very quietly he watched her and managed her. At moments he would baby her in a way that I had not seen him use before but that had evidently become habitual, when she showed signs of bursting into tears over not being able to find a poem or something of the kind. My wife said afterward that Gene gave the impression of shaking me at her as if I had been a new toy with which he hoped to divert her.

Edna said that she had been writing in the last two months and was very much excited about it, because, for two years before that, she had not been able to work. She talked about her war-time poetry as an error that she frankly confessed to. She knew that she had deserved the reviews she got, but had been hurt by them, nevertheless. She said that she had been dismayed when this handful of political verses—under the title "Make Bright the Arrows"—had been issued in the same format as her other books, as if she meant it to stand beside them, for she had intended a paper-bound pamphlet that could circulate quickly and be read and thrown away. I was confirmed in my supposition that these poems had been inspired by loyalty to Eugen when he talked about his family in Holland. One of his cousins had been tortured and killed; others had had hairbreadth escapes. Edna now constantly sent them packages. She always spoke of "our relatives," and one could see that she was very much attached to them. She had visited them in Holland and had even learned the language. My wife knows Holland and understands Dutch, and, for her benefit, Edna produced and read a poem she had written in Dutch. She showed us a good deal of her poetry, much of it in an unfinished state. It was of an almost unrelieved blackness. I could see that she was just emerging from some terrible eclipse of the spirit.

I had difficulty in adjusting myself to Edna in her present phase. There was something more distressing than the old anxiety that she had shown before in discussing her verse: a pressure that she now put upon you for assurance, approval, praise, and even in those moments when she sounded like a good-natured healthily laughing elderly woman, this, too, was a person I did not know, and these moments, as it were interpolated, seemed to leave her more nervous still. But the nervousness wore off with the drinks, as did my feeling of strangeness about her. This was, after all, the girl, the great poet, I knew, groping back in luminis oras from the night of the underworld. She had tackled Catullus's bitter poem, Si qua recordanti benefacta priora voluptas . . .; and I could see that the last lines, Ipse valere, opto et taetrum nunc deponere morbum.

O di, reddite mi hoc pro pietate meal had for her a special and desperate meaning. She was afraid that the translation she had sketched would not do the poem justice; and she told us that, when she had sat on the judges' committee for the Guggenheim fellowships, she had not been able to bring herself to vote for Horace Gregory, in spite of his list of distinguished supporters, on account of the badness of his translations of Catullus. But she had had some misgivings since—wasn't it better, perhaps, that the Latinless public should be able to get Catullus, even in an imperfect version. Eugen pulled her up: "Remember," he said, "that was the kind of thing you thought about your war poetry—that it was important to rouse the country." I thought this was very shrewd of him. We talked about John Bishop's poetry, of which I had sent her the collected volume, brought out after his death. She said that his poems had "more overtones" than those of any other contemporary poet: "It's like a row of poplars on a river, with another row reflected in the river." I told her how impossible it had been for me, though John had talked about his illness, to realize that the gloom of his poetry had a real and serious cause or to guess that it announced the approach of death. "Yes: he was despairing," she said.

I was reminded of the little Estonian folk-song that I had loved so when she sang it in Truro, and I asked her about the anthology in which it had appeared. She didn't know where to find it, but, after reflecting a moment, she was able to recover the song, with its sweet little plaintive tune and her own bitter-sweet words. I inquired about the original version of the "Epitaph for the Race of Man"—I had been surprised by its coming out in such a different form from that of the version I had heard in 1920; and she told me that she had lost her first draft, of which she could now recall only scraps. Wanting Elena to hear her read, I asked her to recite The Poet and His Book. As she did so, the room became so charged with emotion that I

Morality AND Administration IN Democratic Government

Mr. Appleby does not make specific reference to the 1951 scandals, but he does take cognizance of them and thinks they indicate a public awareness of conditions which had existed but which had been hidden.

His conclusion regarding moral lapse among federal employees is that "standards of the national government remained in 1951 higher than ... outside it."

He also discusses such issues as the menace of communism in our government as opposed to the perhaps greater menace of the communist-labelers represented by Senator McCarthy. He even suggests that such over-emphasis on communist leanings may be indirectly responsible for moral shortcomings in the government.

began to find it difficult to bear. I could not weep, I did not want her to weep, and though Elena thought we should have stayed, I soon insisted on leaving.

I told myself that Edna was even more fatiguing than she had been in her younger days, and I reasserted my middle-aged indifference. It was too much for me, at fifty-three, to go back to that old state of mind, so demandingly, imprisoningly personal. The whole thing was like one of those dreams that I had never quite ceased to have, in which I found myself with Edna again—though in these dreams she had sometimes seemed faded and shrunken, never ruddy and overblown as I saw her now. The gap of the almost two decades was something that, encountering the real woman, I could not accept or take in. I had found them there, Edna and Eugen, just as I had left them in 1929, and this latest visit connected itself with my glimpses of that summer long past, not with anything that had happened between. It became like the fears and desires, the revived emotions, of sleep; and the changes in her were like the old images of dreams that come to us exaggerated, distorted, swollen with longing or horror. So she was still, although now in a different way, almost as disturbing to me as she had ever been in the twenties, to which she had so completely belonged—for she could not be a part of my present, and to see her exerted on me a painful pull, as if to drag me up by the roots, to gouge me out of my present personality and to annihilate all that had made it. My own life was now organized and grounded, I had children to worry and divert me; and from my present point of view, besides, it disturbed me to find Edna and Eugen haunting like deteriorated ghosts their own comfortable old house in the country. I tried to imagine their lives.

They were evidently very hard up—a certain income that Gene had from Java had ceased at the time of the war, and Edna could no longer give readings; they never seemed to see anyone or go anywhere. When we asked them to come to Tanglewood—an hour's drive away—and go with us to one of the concerts, I was astonished to find that Edna, who loved music so, had no idea at all of what the festival had become and assumed that the concerts were still held under canvas as they had not been since the very first years. We could not persuade her to go. Gene had said that he would ask us to dinner, but "I'm the only thing in the house—I'm the cook and bottlewasher and maid"—so I assumed that he attended to the house as well as—with little help nowadays—the farm, and cooked all the meals for Edna. But I could not conceive what their daily existence, month after month, had been like or what it would be like in the future. It did not occur to me, as it had not done in connection with John Bishop, that they were both very soon to die. What had desolated and frightened me there was death, to which Eugen was wearily resigned but against which Edna, when I saw her, with the drafts of her unfinished Erebean poems, was making her last fierce struggle.

EUGEN BOISSEVAIN died in the autumn of 1949. I had wondered already, at the time of our visit, what would happen to Edna if he should die first. All I was able to learn about her was that she was still living out at Steepletop. The night of October 20, 1950, I had a long dream about Edna. It began with a kind of revival of the longing I had had for her in the twenties, and she came to me in her old dream-shape, which was so much more familiar to me than that in which I had seen her last; but then it turned into a conversation that was taking place in the present. I was telling her about John Bishop's relations with another contemporary poet, who had sat at his feet and learned from him, then later had become better known than John and treated him, I had thought, rather shabbily. The next evening I heard of her death, which had taken place the day before, apparently very early on the morning of the nineteenth (Mr. Shecan gives the erroneous impression that she died the morning of the twenty-first). She had been living alone in the house and had evidently sat up all night reading the proofs of Rolfe Humphries' translation of the "Aeneid," which were found in the living-room. She must have been going upstairs at dawn and have felt faint and sat down on a step. She had set down on the step just above her a glass of wine she was carrying. A man who came in to do the chores found her there the next afternoon. My dream was probably prompted by Sartre's book on Baudelaire, which I had been reading at night in bed and which must have led me to Edna by way of the translation of the "Fleurs du Mal" that she and George Dillon had made, which I had recently been rereading; and it was motivated partly, no doubt, by my wanting, in my sleep, to have somebody to listen to my literary gossip and somebody from old times to talk to, but partly, I believe, also, by the impulse to console her in this vicarious way for the neglect that she, too, had been suffering. And I may have had some sort of intuition about what had happened the morning before. I do not mean anything supernatural, but the kind of sympathetic sense of the rhythms of another's life that may sometimes persist in absence, ■ I had had, in 1944, the feeling that she needed support, at the time of her nervous breakdown.

[Mr. Wilson's Memoir of Miss Milway will appear in a new book by him called "The Shores of Light: A Literary Chronicle of the Twenties and Thirties," which is to be published next fall by Farrar, Straus and Young.]

U. S. S. R.: The Early Years

THE BOLSHEVIK REVOLUTION, 1917-1923. Volume Two of A History of Soviet Russia. By Edward Hallett Carr. The Macmillan Company. $6.

NOWADAYS it has become banal to declare that history is always written from a distinctive intellectual point of view. Like many banalities, this one is not necessarily correct, and may merely mark the exchange of one fashion in self-deception for another. After all, events either happened in a certain way in the past or they did not, even if the pattern may at times be beyond human recovery or discovery. But the contemporary intellectual vogue does have the advantage of making both historians and their reviewers explicitly aware of the standpoints from which they write.

Anyone who is familiar with Professor Carr's outstanding writings on international politics and Russian affairs will expect freedom from the moralistic blindfold that has affected so much American and English work on these topics. To place such a brilliant mind ■ Carr's in an intellectual pigeonhole is of course impossible. Nevertheless, in the two volumes which have thus far appeared in Carr's history of the Soviet Union, I feel that he has taken the position of an intelligent Bolshevik—too intelligent and too independent to have survived for long in the regime whose early stages he analyzes here. The greater portion of what he says would be anathema to the present rulers of the U. S. S. R., whose regard for historical fact is somewhat less than scrupulous. Yet the treatment is largely Marxist, with overtones of sympathy for Lenin's original objectives. In this volume, ■ in the first, this sympathy becomes quite explicit in occasional revealing phrases. One of the more striking is the observation on page 14 that the Bolsheviks avoided the "insidious danger which had overtaken the German [Socialist] Party" of becoming ■ gradualist group satisfied with orderly change under capitalist auspices. Yet to reject this book as ■ mere apologia would be an act of parochialism and a sign of inability to make essential intellectual distinctions.

In the work as ■ whole Professor Carr has chosen to stress trends and institutions rather than single events and personalities, though the importance of the latter is by no means overlooked. The present volume recounts the major economic developments of the period. The central problem, facing both Russia of the Tsars and that of the Commissars, Carr sees as the consequence of beginning industrialism and the spread of Western ideas in an overwhelmingly peasant society. Three aspects of the problem's protean forms after 1917 draw most of the author's attention. One was the question of how to utilize the forces of an elemental peasant upheaval, when the Bolsheviks' own plans for the peasantry went counter to these immediate demands. The second question was similar. How would a party that represented itself as the spearhead of proletarian discontent reimpose the discipline necessary in any industrial society, and bring together its mines and factories into a functioning whole? The third aspect concerned the way in which the peasants could be forced, or induced, to part with enough food to feed the townspeople, when the town could not supply the village with manufactured goods. The actual content of these questions, the surrounding circumstances under which they arose, and the manner in which various leading Bolsheviks approached them, all varied tremendously during the brief period covered by this volume. To highlight them in this fashion inevitably distorts the lucid variety of Carr's narrative. But I hope that it may draw attention to some of the book's most significant points.

Much of the material will be familiar to those who have read the accounts of Dobb and Baykov, whose treatment is somewhat more sympathetic and less politically discerning than Carr's. There is also a variety of specialized studies, such as those by Hubbard, Manya Gordon, Naum Jasny, W. Koch, that have beginning chapters covering much of the same ground. From none of these books, however, can one get the same sense of the interrelationship of the various developments that emerges from Carr's pages. Since the others deal with longer time periods, there is not the same scholarly—yet most unpedantic—exploitation of the sources. Carr is an expert at finding just the right quotation to illustrate or drive home a point. As one who has spent considerable time burrowing in the same sources, I can testify that he has not chosen them to buttress any narrowly conceived thesis. That does not mean that there is no room for disagreement, or that all the sources have been mined out. I wish, for example, that more attention had been given to the often revealing trivia of memoranda, notes, records of telephone calls, and the like, whose preservation and publication have been one useful aspect of the veneration for Lenin. And at the level of interpretation various points are open to severe question. As Jasny's work has shown, the Marxist argument that only socialism could solve the economic problem of the peasantry is, to say the least, highly dubious. That no solution other than the one ultimately adopted was compatible with the Bolsheviks' retention of power may be a tenable conclusion. Here, however, one touches on problems for which the present book merely lays the groundwork.

The over-all significance of an intellectual structure still in the process of construction cannot be evaluated. Carr's study can throw but limited light on the problems of the moment, since the structure of Soviet society and of international relationships has fundamentally changed since the date with which his three volumes will close. Yet, for anyone seeking a comprehension of the historical forces that have produced the chief totalitarian power of our age, his work will constitute a major landmark. In this context it suggests comparison with Hannah Arendt's "The Origins of Totalitarianism." Aside from Carr's vastly superior competence in handling Russian developments, the difference appears to be largely one of temperament. Both make considerable use of the Marxist intellectual framework. But where Arendt is passionate, intuitive, and often chaotic, Carr is restrained, balanced, urbane, and slightly mocking. Finally, even though the two books complement each other, they cover only a portion of the totalitarian growth that is a central feature of our century. To understand this development adequately we shall have to draw on other intellectual traditions, in whose eventual synthesis such contributions will be included. BARRINGTON MOORE, JR.

Ecce Roma!

ROME AND A VILLA. By Eleanor Clark. Doubleday and Company. $4.

DRENCHED with sunlight alternating with ominous shade, the scenes of novel after novel by non-Italians revolve about Italy: within two years we have had "The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone," "Friends and Vague Lovers," and "SPQR." Of these three, the first came closest to the touchstone, but Williams's Rome, accurate and sensitive as is the recording retina, was a small, special Rome and did not pretend to reach beyond that limited scene. We had to wait for a non-fiction title to contrast authenticity of atmosphere with what Bonner and Dunphy offer as a substitute. Almost any page of Eleanor Clark's book is at the true center, more communicative, more freely felt, more informed than the fiction writers have found time to be. "Rome and a Villa" is, of course, not a novel, nor does it aim to catch up the reader with trite or even true nostalgic touches (in this sense, it defies classification as a "travel book"). Instead, it is a distinguished and enthralling collection of non-fiction pieces in which Miss Clark does more than any writer in English in my memory (except possibly Lawrence) to reveal the essence of the Italian spirit.

All the material is good, some of it better than the rest. The only piece I found weak at all was the one on the bandit, Giuliano. This seemed unnecessary, though it is good reporting. And as the rest of the collection is so specifically not reportage I thought it a pity to have the tone altered, by its inclusion, even so slightly from the heights reached in the early and last sections of the book. Let me cavil at this piece and be done with it: too much is recreated from newspaper accounts of a world with which Miss Clark can thank her stars she has had little to do, the grub's world of the peasant living in an exhausted land. It takes a Garetto, a Vittorini or, on occasion, a Berto, to make you taste the dry bread of the poor, to make you understand the motivation of banditry, always very near the surface in Sicily. This recreation of the Robin Hood myth, which Miss Clark duly qualifies but still rather falls for, is out of place in the Sicilian frame of reference.

But that's enough back-of-the-hand. The rest is all praise. How she impales the succubus, the clerical horde:

The priests and monks and nuns are shocking: what is this vast population feeding at the expense of the other? So are all their expensive new houses going up on the Janiculum where they already have dozens, while the poor are still in caves and huts in the dumps, having to throw their droppings together with their garbage out the door. All those men and boys in their long skirts always seem to be walking on revolving paddles like little steam-boats. . . . Rome is their port . . . they just paddle through it, being the pensionnaires of the greatest real estate firm in Europe.

Or she gets, through her awareness of why the Romans do things, to the core of difference between a centuries-old people and our own:

You walk close to your dreams. Sometimes it seems that these pulsing crowds, with their daily and yearly rhythms established so long ago none of it has to be decided any more, with their elbows and knees and souls and buttocks touching and rubbing and everybody most pleased and agreeable when it is like that, in a bus for instance, will in another minute be naked, or will have fish tails or horses' behinds like the characters of the fountains. For the Anglo-Saxon mind, ruled by conscience and the romantic, rigid in its privacies, everything here is shocking—an endless revelation and immersion; this is the vocabulary of our sleep; and the key image is always water (italics mine).

The passage on Hadrian's villa, the Villa of the title, of course, is pure evocative mastery, pure understanding. It is as much reconstruction of the genius of the place, the brilliant, petulant, creative Emperor, as it is descriptive, atmospheric. A very high point indeed and one that can't have quotes plucked out without impairment. A few of Henry James's letters on Florence achieve this time-spanning understanding, but never could he have spread it over to the less homogeneous Roman world. (Stendhal did, though, recreating his Roman world as he sat with a friend in Paris miles away, without notes, but with subtle comprehension of the city in his pulse beat.)

A final paragraph, to show one more facet of Eleanor Clark's eclectic, observant mind:

LeCorbusier [who had just been quoted as saying "Rome has nothing to offer me"] was speaking admirably too; all that Rome offers was taken into his own great creativity long ago. What is depressing is the number of our own fine arts or architectural school graduates who are either arrogant toward the past because they are creative, or respect it because they are not. The first category is bored in Rome, the second makes even Rome boring.

But Eleanor Clark does not. Remembered corners, a flight of birds, the cats of the Pantheon under the rain, the pace of the piazza in the afternoon, these things come alive in her book. "Ecce Roma!" Yet as she herself says, Where? which Rome? who is seeing it? and at what time of day?

The lovely presentation of this book is integral to its charm. Doubleday has done a stunning but unpretentious job. The pages are handsome, the Eugene Berman drawings and jacket are evocative and right, even the end-papers, a warm Pompeian red, are chosen with taste. Physically, as well as in the head, a thoroughly distinguished job.

THE SECRET DRAMA OF MY LIFE.

By André Gide. Translated by Keene Wallis. Seven Sirens Press. $2.

THIS small volume is, so far as we can know, the last of the Gidean outrages, the final scandal of a man determined to face posterity squarely. Published last year as "Et Nunc Manet in Te," it threw a few further shadows on the serene death-mask, and provoked still another controversy. Once again the outrage lay less in the sins themselves than in the act of public confession—that a great man should choose to expose what anyone else would conceal.

Gide wrote this 10,000-word portrait of his wife shortly after her death in 1938, and to it attached the passages of his "Journal" (relating to her) which do not appear in the Pléiade edition. Its public issue was posthumous. But Gide always feared the censorship of well-meaning friends. He insured himself against it by a 1947 private edition of thirteen copies.

The major revelation (that Gide had no sexual relations with his wife) had long been assumed. Yet even now it is impossible to reconstruct the tragedy fully. We learn that Gide consulted a doctor before marrying, and was reassured that his homosexual impulses would disappear. They broke out ferociously on the honeymoon, however—and now Michel's demonic journey southward in "The Immoralist" seems closer than ever to Gide's personal history. Behind this (or related to it, at least) lay a childhood surrounded by sainted, un-fleshly women and an adolescence of spiritual communion with the frightened girl he would marry. "I am amazed today at that aberration which led me to believe that the more my love was ethereal the more it was worthy of her—that naïveté of never asking myself whether an entirely uncarnal love contented her. . . . What I fear that she could not understand is that precisely the spiritual force of my love inhibited all carnal desire." What amazes the reader, of course, is that he never asked her; that the "zone of silence" was so vast between two people who loved each other so much, and who were married for forty-three years. It covered more than sexual matters. Gide (who would ask a stranger anything) evidently could not ask his wife which of his books she had read. At best he could reason that she may have seen the last page of "Si le grain ne meurt" in the Nrf, since that last page faced the first page of a Claudel piece whose pages she had cut. Yet he insists again that he wrote everything before "Les Faux-Monnayeurs" for her, in the hope of converting her to a freer life.

The portrait of Madame Gide is—let there be no mistake—a loving portrait. But no woman could have been less suited to an adventurous and polygamous husband. The traumatic experience of discovering her mother's infidelity looms even more importantly than in "Si le grain ne meurt . . ." and "Strait is the Gate." The frightened child recedes into a conservative, masochistic, and prematurely aged woman of piety troubled by the debilitating influence of infiltrating foreigners. Only in the infirmity of age does she permit herself some relaxation of spirit. Yet how much she did or did not suffer not even this humble essay can say. To burn all of Gide's letters to her, in 1918 when he went to England with Marc Allégret, was one of the few "spoken" protests of her life. But clearly she was helped to her chronic self-destructiveness by the seeming rejection, by her husband's sexual neglect. "And this deficiency of my desires she doubtless attributed modestly to her insufficient attractiveness."

Now this is the major interest of the present volume, for those of us who reason glibly on the therapeutic value of art. "The Gambler" did not cure Dostoevsky of compulsive gambling, nor did "Adolphe" free Benjamin Constant from compulsive attachments. Yet the minuteness and clarity of Gide's fictional diagnoses ought to have been irresistible. "Strait is the Gate" (1909) dramatized exactly Madame Gide's plight. The clue to Alissa's tragedy (as Gide saw better than any of his critics) lay in the ethereal unaggressiveness of her lover Jerome. It was he who drove her to a final solitude and withdrawal, rather than an illusory God. Gide's novel, frankly based on his own romance, could not have shown more psychological understanding. Yet its author then proceeded to live the part of Jerome. It is only in this essay, thirty years later, that he recovers the insight of his fiction. He takes upon him-

"Last year's great literary find was Boswell's London Journey. This year's is Friedrich Nietzsche's My Sister and I. And of the two this second is certainly the greater."

The San Francisco Argonaut.

The Long Beach (California) Press-Telegram

"He goes back to his younger days when lust and pride ran strong in him. He grovels again in the unrepented orgies of his youth."

St. Louis Post-Dispatch

"...in between these flights of madness, his Prussian saber whirls and strikes. No sacrilege is beyond him, no insult beyond expression, no deliberate affront too great for his pen. He struggles with terrible doubts and wrestles with guilt complexes that surge from his subconscious like ugly things from the deep...but the flicking fingers of his wit are never far removed from the clenched fists of his furies." Richmond (Virginia) News

"...an absorbing story of one of the greatest tragedies of modern times. Its style is sufficient evidence of its authenticity."

San Antonio Express

"...it opens the way for startling insight into the author's private life. The incestuous relationship with his sister Elisabeth is delineated with candid accuracy."

Greensboro (N. C.) News

"He is most coherent in his descriptions of sex...he devotes the great majority of passages to sexual descriptions."

Wichita (Kansas) Eagle

"...whole libraries have been written about his work, his philosophy, his tragic medical history, and the enigma of his personal relationships...and now, fifty-one years after Nietzsche's death, there falls into our hands what may prove to be the key to the whole problem."

MY SISTER AND I

An Autobiography and a Way of Life

BY

FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE

ELISABETH FOERSTER-NIETZSCHE who drove her great brother into the refuge of a madhouse, made it impossible for him to have normal relations with other women and whose passion for her brother probably caused her husband's suicide.

My Sister and I is an autobiography. It is also much more. As one reviewer describes it, it is really the supreme adventure of our civilization focused on the lives of one man and two fascinating, reckless beautiful women. The struggle of these two women to establish domination over this man—one of the greatest of the world's philosophers—brings the whole maddening fabric of our world into glittering relief.

As is being pointed out by all the reviewers, MY SISTER AND I is the most important book discovery of our time.

self, unequivocally, the blame for his wife's progressive self-mutilation.

Thus Gide's astonishing and on the whole successful experiment in living—involving so many loves and so many loved ones who got on surprisingly well with each other—yet left its victim. For not even this widest circle could be drawn around a woman who detested any departure from convention. Had he married instead Elizabeth van Rysselberge, or her mother, Gide could perhaps have reconciled everyone—wife, mistress, mature homosexual companions, casually encountered Arab boys—not to mention the hundreds of respectable disciples and friends.

But then he would not have been the Gide we know, so capable of both childishness and grandeur. And he would have been, as he puts it, a kite without a string.

ALBERT J. GUERARD

THE DESERT YEAR. By Joseph Wood Krutch. William Sloane Associates. $3.75.

SINCE Thoreau there has been, at least in America, a long gap in the recording of natural history from the point of view that is primarily literary, though still careful of its facts. In England, the war-time series, Britain in Pictures, laid stress upon the essential literacy of its writers by mingling such professional natural historians and excellent writers as Fraser Darling and James Fisher with poets such as Geoffrey Grigson and Geoffrey Taylor. Joseph Wood Krutch is an American example of the man who is aware of the differences between various kinds of beetles or cacti, and of the vision of Wordsworth. Like all the best modern writers on natural history, he has adopted, to a greater or lesser degree, the ecological outlook which strives to see his subject as a whole, to relate each form of life to each other form—not forgetting man. This outlook, which makes "The Sea Around Us," Jacques Hawkes's "A Land," and Joseph Mitchell's brilliant New Yorker study of the bottom of New York Harbor so memorable, makes "The Desert Year" a book to be kept and reread.

What "The Desert Year" attempts to do, and is successful in accomplishing, is to record those matters of interest which occur to a sensitive observer in spending a year (or rather a sabbatical fifteen months) watching and recording. Mr. Krutch succeeds in capturing his reader's interest in the strange case of the Sonoran spadefoot toad (Scaphiopus couchii) which suddenly appeared singing after a heavy rain and then disappeared, leaving puddles full of tadpoles which dried to nothing before they had time to mature. Where did the adult toads disappear to with the passing of the rain? How did they manage to perpetuate their species? With Mr. Krutch we follow the investigation like devotees of Ellery Queen, and like him we are disappointed when none of the experts can provide an answer to either question. Maybe there is sometimes enough rain to allow the tadpoles to become little toads. Maybe the adults spend the rest of the time buried underground, like the toads (prime specimens of spontaneous generation) mentioned by John Clare and Christopher Smart, which were (and still sometimes are) reported to be found hermetically sealed in rock, despite the experiments of Frank Buckland which proved that, suffering such a fate, the toads all died. Readers can only hope that, if and when Mr. Krutch discovers more, he will send out a postscript.

On the subject of birds, Mr. Krutch is very good indeed, pointing out that the fascination which we feel for them is largely due to the fact that they are brightly colored and move quickly and that, in reality, they are not, "despite the grand mystery of migration," really very interesting creatures: "They stimulate our imaginations but there is not really anything we can learn from them. And for that reason a dead bird is simply not a bird any more. The bubble is pricked; the illusion vanished. What had interested us was not bones and feathers but an idea." Still, he becomes involved, rather despite himself, in numbering one hundred and thirty-eight birds which he has seen in his part of the Arizona desert.

This desert, despite the associations which the word has come to bear, is not barren and infertile like the Sahara or the gypsum dunes of the White Sands of New Mexico, and while perhaps not as crammed with goodies as that absurd island in "Swiss Family

Robinson," it bears whatever climate and soil will allow. Unlike the richer, damper parts of the world, no plant seems to struggle with others for existence; the struggle is only with the soil, each area supporting only what it can and trying for no more.

Mr. Krutch has certainly succeeded in making the desert appear, to one who has never known it, a real and intensely interesting place. Someday, somehow, the reader feels, I must see it for myself.

RUTHVEN TODD

THE AMERICANS AT HOME. By David Macrae. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.50.

CONSIDERING the American appetite for travelers' tales, it is strange that this book, issued in England as long ago as 1871, has only now found a local publisher. Better late than never! Dutton and Company are to be congratulated on their discovery but also scolded for failing to add a memoir of the author and an index.

David Macrae was a Scottish minister who later in life created something of a furor in his native land by expressing doubts about eternal damnation. That apparently was too harsh a doctrine for a man who, as this book shows, was an exceedingly amiable soul. Certainly, he was far more sympathetic with and friendly to the United States than most contemporary British travelers. Unlike Trollope, for instance, who merely admired Americans, Macrae genuinely liked them, which may explain why he was far more successful than that eminent Victorian in making contacts with the man in the street.

Landing in Canada in 1868, the author moved in leisurely fashion via New York and Washington south to New Orleans; thence by train and river-boat to Chicago—"the lightning city"—and back to New England where he thoroughly enjoyed hobnobbing with Longfellow, Emerson, and other notables. A keen reporter with a pleasant sense of humor, his observations still make interesting reading. But his most valuable contribution is his account of the South, then in the throes of reconstruction. He is forthright in expressing his horror of slavery and in explaining its demoralizing influence on both races and he describes with enthusiasm the efforts of the Negroes to educate themselves for freedom aided by Northern friends. But he also views sympathetically the plight of the defeated whites and the problems of readjustment with which they were grappling.

Friendly as he was, Mr. Macrae had no hesitation in expressing disapproval of American traits and institutions that he considered obnoxious. He disliked the election of judges and the patronage system; over-indulgence in pie and spitting and chewing; the prevalence of divorce; and the bad state of city streets. On the other hand, he was generous in his praise of the experimental attitude of Americans and he liked the oysters, hotels, iced water, and Henry Ward Beecher. He shared Trollope's admiration for American education but not his distaste for the railroads.

Reading this book eighty years after it was written, I found myself making notes under two headings—plus ça change and autres temps, autres mœurs. As an example of the first, take Ben Wade's comment on the Presidential campaign of 1868: "I foresee that the Republican party will take Grant up and run him in with a hurrah. The trouble is, you don't know where he stands." But times do change, as witness Macrae's observation that "American girls are nervous about their thinness, for they are constantly having themselves weighed, and every ounce of increase is hailed with delight, and talked about with the most dreadful plainness of speech."

FROM Shakespeare on, and maybe before, the Welsh have had the reputation of embodying the more repulsive aspects of humanity, but they can, look you, they always could, write poetry, even when, as fairly often, they are feeling sorriest for themselves. Six poems, four hundred or so lines, set in rather large type so the book won't look too small, is an offering I doubt many American poets could get away with as Dylan Thomas does with his latest collection, "In Country Sleep" (New Directions, $2). And I doubt any American could bring to work in its contrived, derived, or weary moments, which are to be found in Mr. Thomas's book, such a rush of resource, such lilt, such energy, such imagination to "hear the bouncing hills grow larked and greener at berry brown/fall and the dew larks sing/taller this thunderclap spring and how/more spanned with angels/ride the mansouled fiery islands!" And how, indeed!

Another recent visitor to our shores is an Englishwoman, Kathleen Raine, whose "Selected Poems" have been issued, bound in paper, by the Weekend Press, New York, price not stated on this reviewer's copy. Correct, cool, interested in dreams and angels, and all the difference in the world between this kind of English, and that kind of Welsh, poetry. Miss Raine also contributes an introduction to another collection edited by the same firm, "Poems" by Humphrey Jennings, 1907-1950. Mr. Jennings was also a painter and member of Grierson's G. P. O. film unit. A considerable portion of this collection looks more like paragraphs in prose than tightly organized or ordered verse. Both these pamphlets, handset in Goudy Old Style type and printed on Arches paper, are handsome in appearance and contain too many errata. (P. S. $2.50, I'm told.)

The firm of A. A. Knopf has re-issued in one volume, priced at $3.50, "The Man with the Blue Guitar," including "Owl's Clover" and "Ideas of Order," by Wallace Stevens. It is a little hard to keep up with all these editions. And is it heretical to remark that when Mr. Stevens is letting himself be full of high sentence he is somewhat boring? He strikes me as much happier when he is capering, or cutting up touches, and no matter if the climate of his exuberance has less sense of moisture than that of Dylan Thomas. "Axes and Songs" by Andrew Lazarus, was printed in Finland, presumably at the author's expense, and is said to be on sale at the Gotham Book Mart. The price is not stated; there are limits, I know, to the human imagination, but I do wish some of these citizens, or their publishers, would occasionally be mundane enough to confide in people who might want to buy a book or two how much they are supposed to pay. The technique of Mr. Lazarus is either very awkward, or very original, hard to say until it becomes more sure of itself. What is more certain is that this young American has some respect for the sound of the language, feeling, imagination, and some sense of music in a line.

Two Rilke items have come in: "Rainer Maria Rilke: His Last Friendship," edited by Marcel Ravel, with an Introduction by Edmond Jaloux (Philosophical Library, $2.75), and "The Life of the Virgin Mary," containing the German text with an English translation and introduction by Stephen

Spender (same firm, same price). The first volume proves what everybody knows by now: one, that Rilke's friends could gush excessively when reminiscing about him; and, two, that Rilke himself could act pretty silly when it came to the ladies. This one, Nimet Eloui Bey, judging from her picture on jacket and frontispiece, must have been (pardon the vulgarity) a real pipperoo, but oh dear! The Spender translations show Mr. Spender at his best—modest, respectful without being mawkish, in control of his line, and with an imaginative and perceptive understanding of the original. ONE of the year's outstanding events—and one of its surprises, for me—is the Schneider Quartet recordings of Haydn quartets issued by the Haydn Society. At the group's Y. M. H. A. concerts last fall I heard a lot of violin sound, little cello, and almost no viola; but the records produce the correctly balanced sounds of all four instruments. And while at the Y. the playing seemed to me lively and sensitive, now that I hear all four instruments and at close range I am aware of the extraordinary freedom in tempo and inflection with which the musicians give effect to the freedom of Haydn's lively and inventive mind in its excitingly unpredictable course, and the extraordinary way they point up the wonderful details which that mind contrives. And when I say "extraordinary" I mean it literally: no other quartet has played Haydn with such vitality—not even the old Budapest Quartet, whose recorded performance of Opus 54 No. 1 is superb in tone and phrasing, but in the usual suave style.

The works which the Haydn Society has issued so far, two on a record, are the six quartets of Opus 17, the two of Opus 77, Opus 42, and the uncompleted Opus 103. Of these Opus 77 No. 2 is one of the works in which Haydn carries to sheer incandescence the method that delights one in Opus 77 No. 1 and Opus 17 No. 6, achieves outstanding individual movements even in the others of Opus 17, and is never less than interesting elsewhere. recorded sound, Opus 17 Nos. 1 and 4, recorded in Perpignan, are a little brash; the others of Opus 17, recorded in New York, require reduction of treble; Opus 42 and Opus 77 No. 1 are edged in loud passages even with treble reduced to minimum; the first movement of Opus 103 also requires reduction of treble to minimum but then isn't bright enough.

Marvelously beautiful playing of Haydn in the usual suave style—marvelous, that is, in its refinement of blended string tone, its ensemble precision and sensitiveness, its delicacy of phrasing—is heard in the Quartetto Italiano's performance of the fine Opus 64 No. 6. And on the reverse side of the London record this playing is heard in Boccherini's lovely Quartet Opus 6 No. 1. The performances are excellently reproduced—though again not with the warmth and luster that one gets from RCA Victor recording of strings.

But also not with the ear-lacerating sharpness and the surface chatter of Columbia's reproduction of Mozart's great String Quintet K.614 played by the Budapest Quartet and Milton Katims, which spoils a performance that is better than the one on the Westminster record. On the reverse side is the superb performance of the Quintet K.516 recorded years ago when Roisman was in good form and Alexander Schneider was second violin—with a sound that is agreeable to the ear but acquires a hash of distortion as it nears the end of the side.

Excessively sharp too is Columbia's reproduction of a performance of Mozart's lovely Clarinet Quintet by the American Art Quartet and Benny Goodman—which is a pity, since the strings play well, Goodman this time phrases sensitively, and the performance is well-paced.

From Victor comes Beethoven's engaging Sonata Opus 24 for violin and piano, with unaffected but surprisingly unimpressive and not always agreeable-sounding playing by Milstein, and superlative playing by Balsam.

And finally I have given myself another chance with some of the late works of Fauré that his devotees consider his best—the Quartet Opus 121, played by the Guilet Quartet, and Sonata Opus 108 for violin and piano, played by Daniel Guilet and Gaby Casadesus, on a Polymusic record; the Sonata Opus 117 for cello and piano, played by David Soyer and Leopold Mittman, which is on another Polymusic record with the early Quartet Opus 15 for piano and strings, played by Mme. Casadesus and members of the Guilet Quartet. The performances are first-rate and beautifully reproduced; but the music I again find uninteresting.

The Sonata Opus 108, played with less refinement of tone and style by Ruth Posselt with Joseph Rezits, is also on a Festival record which offers in addition Haydn and Martinu duets for violin and cello that I don't care for, played by Miss Posselt and Samuel Mayes.

WHAT can one say about Paul Cézanne that is new? The big exhibition at the Metropolitan (through May 18) dominates everything else on the art calendar; but there are other concurrent shows by living artists which must not be overlooked. Moreover, the study of Cézanne leads inevitably to the present.

The Cézanne show is in every way the equal of the Van Gogh exhibition of two years ago. Once again the Art Institute of Chicago is co-sponsor. There are 128 oils, watercolors, and drawings. They cover the full range of Cézanne's career, including some lapses, and all the important themes. In addition to most of the best in the United States (always excepting the Barnes Foundation), other works of stature have been imported from Paris, London, Oslo, São Paulo, Johannesburg, and Zurich. They are beautifully displayed. Chronology is respected, but not slavishly. All works, irrespective of medium, have been catalogued in fairly strict temporal sequence. Thus the numbers serve as a guide to Cézanne's development. (I do not understand the displacement of numbers 54 and 76.)

What a change fifty years, or even twenty-five years, have brought! The antagonisms Cézanne aroused in his own lifetime can now be resurrected only by an effort of the mind. The paintings seem as little arguable as those of the Impressionists. Even the vaunted severity of the "classic" pictures of the eighties and nineties is delicately attenuated. Some of them (still-lifes numbers 73 and 87) are gentle, even pretty, like middle Renoirs and late Demuths. The very early and the very late works both seem more modern. Cézanne's influence, however, appears to have progressed backward across his career. The Fauves, particularly Matisse, were deeply indebted to his last works; for the Cubists, the examples of his classic equilibrium were more meaningful; and now his violent early pictures seem the most influential, at least in terms of today's and yesterday's expressionism.

But all of it has settled into the great tradition, even though this was surely the most revolutionary art since Caravaggio (if not since Masaccio). The time is therefore ripe for a vast new public to begin to understand, and the present show provides the best possible opportunity. For understanding modern art begins at the precise moment Cézanne's pears stop rolling off the table.

For this reason, I welcome the special exhibit, however elementary it may seem to the aesthetically arrogant, of charts and diagrams organized by the Art Institute of Chicago and displayed on the wall opposite three major examples of Cézanne's work. The analysis of his palette may not be new, but how many have noticed that Cézanne had a habit of arranging the folds of a tablecloth in the shape of the Mont Sainte Victoire?

I shall spare the reader the usual apostrophe to permanence and stillness (which is much overworked in the labels accompanying the exhibit mentioned above), and conclude with a few random comments. This exhibition makes it clear that Cézanne's serenity was hard won, and that it did not last through to the end. Even the Orchard (number 64, of the mid-'80's) is tenu-ously topheavy, like the early seated portraits of Cézanne's father and of Paul Alexis, both gigantic on rickety little chairs. The late Quarry of Bibémus (number 107), in my opinion the masterpiece of the whole show, owes much of its force to the holes at the base. So does the dramatic early still-life, Black and White (number 12). Notice how, in the sequence of still-lives, the center of gravity moves upward until finally the motive breaks through the top edge of the frame. Notice also the importance of dark blue and strong orange among the early pictures, how these colors pale in the middle period, and how they return at the end to darkness and nearly full strength.

Gustave Courbet once complained that "there are people who wake up at night, with a start, shouting: 'I want to judge! I must judge!'" The opinion I would offer of the work of Robert Motherwell (Kootz Gallery, through April 19) is much more tentative than that. He has, I think, a fine flair for dramatizing a big surface. Architects and ship designers please take notice. Some of the drawings for the paintings, especially for the Spanish series (one of them is now at the Whitney), seem outrageously thin. But at large scale, all is different. Black and white, or black and ochre, are the dominant chords, sometimes bound or crossed by planes of bright yellow, with and without complementary areas of a rich red violet. Motherwell can excite the eye simply by compressing ovoid shapes held in mid-air by strong vertical bands. There are too few levels of meaning—by Cézanne's standards—but those he accents come off with power. Speaking of old masters, I find Léger a closer parallel. The visitor to the Kootz Gallery may profit from comparing the big oil, Catalonia, with the drawing reproduced in the brochure: the slight differences are instructive as to how Motherwell intensified the push of forms against each other. I am disconcerted, however, to find that Granada (reproduced in Hess's "Abstract Painting," p. 136) is so nearly the same composition. But Motherwell deserves more opportunities than he has had to bring to life a plane in a modern building. Occasionally his bold black and white drawings provoke the same kind of excitement, as in Jewish Candelabra (number 18).

If papa Cézanne had not come to town there would be space to consider William Congdon's Italian landscapes (Betty Parsons Gallery, through April 19) and David Smith's dual show (Willard and Kleemann Galleries, through April 26) which I should have done with enthusiasm. Congdon demonstrates that nostalgia and romantic mystery need not be effete, as they so frequently are in Berman; Smith, that violence, when it is disciplined, spells power. Smith is not always disciplined, but doubters of his power should reserve judgment until seeing his larger works under uncrowded conditions, or better still out of doors. I think his forms do not gain much from being painted, except when the color key is held well down and there is an intrinsic demand from the point of view of clarity, as in Flight.

Despite a prejudice in favor of violence in modern art, I can and do respect the reticence and tact of James Fosburgh (Durlacher, through April 19). His smaller pictures seem to me much the best. He is in love with the old-old masters, from Vermeer through, I should think, Manet.

PEACE, WAR, & YOU

BY JEROME DAVIS

With an Introduction by CLARENCE PICKETT
AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE

PEARL BUCK says: "Your book provides the most useful handbook I have yet seen in answering the usual arguments for militarism as a means to peace and prosperity. . . . It is a compendium of inescapable facts, brilliantly assembled in telling form and ready for use. . . . This book should and must be read."

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES says: "Professor Davis has written a brilliant book, and an important one. He is equipped for such a task by scholarship, study, travel and a faith invincible in man. I can think of no work more valuable for instruction and guidance in this vast crisis of our times."

PROFESSOR HALFORD LUCCOCK OF YALE,
Columnist for the Christian Century says:

"Peace, War, and You is an impressive round-the-world cruise for the mind and heart in these days of tension and crisis. It is written with clarity and force, with an amazing amount of documentation, from a wide variety of sources. It is skillful in its analyses of the forces leading to war, and presents positive measures for averting World War III. It is interesting and eminently readable all the way through. It deserves to be read."

RABBI ABBA HILLEL SILVER of Cleveland says:

"Dr. Jerome Davis' book, Peace, War, and You, should commend itself to every lover of democracy and peace in our country. Dr. Davis points the way to constructive measures which may be employed to ease world tensions and to build constructively for freedom and peace in the world. Most helpful of all is the direct challenge to the individual citizen to assert himself and use his influence to give new direction to the foreign policy of our country. Peace, War, and You is a profoundly realistic, and, at the same time, profoundly spiritual volume."

DR. E. STANLEY JONES, world-famous Methodist leader says:

"It challenges us to rethink our attitudes on peace and war and offers a ringing challenge to get rid of war. . . . It should have our earnest attention because the world is sick nigh unto death of war."

Free Speech Wins

Red Bank, N. J.

PRIOR to last February 17, few of the 15,000 residents of this prosperous Monmouth County business center had ever heard of Dr. Theodore Brameld, professor of philosophy at New York University's College of Education. But by the time he got around to delivering his talk on the "Moral and Spiritual Values in Our Public Schools" some six weeks later, he had become Red Bank's most controversial figure in many years.

Curiously enough, what provoked the controversy was the desperate desire of the Red Bank Board of Education to avoid one. The story began late last winter, when the board invited Dr. Brameld to address a teachers' "in-service" program on February 21. But four days before the talk was scheduled to take place, five members of the nine-man board met in special session—it was a Sunday morning—and decided to cancel it. Stanley Haviland, whose term as president of the board was about to expire, explained to reporters that the board was in receipt of information to the effect that Dr. Brameld "had associated himself voluntarily, or involuntarily, with persons, organizations, and institutions regarded as anti-American." Mr. Haviland added: "The appointment with Dr. Brameld has aroused so much controversy in town it is felt for the best interest of the public that he not appear."

It turned out that the chief witness against the professor was Mrs. Henry DeLand Strack, of the neighboring borough of Little Silver, who presented to the board at its special Sunday meeting certain documentary evidence on Dr. Brameld, most of it gleaned from the 1949 Tenney report to the California legislature. The New York educator was charged, among other things, with having attended the "cultural conference" at the Waldorf-Astoria in 1949 and having been a member of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, the American League Against War and Fascism, and the Board of Directors of the Bureau for Intercultural Education.

Dr. Brameld learned of the cancellation of his speech not from the board, but from reporters. He immediately called the Red Bank school authorities to ask for a chance to state his case. He was told the authorities had tried to reach him the day before the special meeting to ask him to appear, but could not locate him. Dr. Brameld vows he was home all day.

Red Bankers learned of what had occurred from their local morning newspapers of February 18. It soon became apparent that the board's hope of avoiding "controversy" had proved abortive, to say the least. When it met that evening to install Edmund J. Canzona as president to succeed Mr. Haviland, more than seventy-five persons—most of them mad as hatters over what had happened—crowded into the meeting room in the Red Bank High School. Mr. Canzona, gallantly taking over the torch of non-freedom from his predecessor, tried to appease the objectors by insisting that "we haven't labeled anyone a Communist or a leftist; we didn't feel it proper to have a controversy."

"Well, what have you got?" asked someone in the audience.

In any case, the board refused to reconsider its decision, but it hadn't reckoned with an organization known as the Red Bank Ministerium, which is composed of fourteen clergymen and Y. M. C. A. leaders of Red Bank and its vicinity. The Ministerium issued a sharp attack on the board members:

Their action was contrary to the best interests of the church, which is surely deemed one of the bulwarks against communism. It seems an anomaly that the meeting was convened on Sunday morning at eleven o'clock—the hour at which the adherents of Christianity should be in attendance at church. . . .

The clergymen commended the board for "its zeal in its efforts to combat communism," but added: "The board stands in just condemnation for the tactics which they utilized in the cancellation of the speaker."

With the support of many independent-minded Red Bankers, the Ministerium worked on plans to hear Dr. Brameld with or without the Board of Education's approval. Katharine Elkus White, Red Bank's first woman Mayor and daughter of a former United States Ambassador to Turkey, offered the clergymen the use of Borough Hall for the Brameld talk. The offer was accepted on condition that efforts to have the educator appear on a public-school platform failed. At one stage it looked as if the Ministerium would win total victory: it got the board to agree to permit the professor to talk at the Mechanic Street School. But at the last minute a newspaper in a neighboring town headlined a story, "Board on the Spot," which said that the board was about to submit to "pressure" and reverse its decision. This made board members so angry they reversed their planned reversal and finally and irrevocably closed all school doors to Dr. Brameld.

But the doors of Borough Hall remained open, and on April 3 the New York educator appeared before a capacity crowd, while many who couldn't get into the small hall heard his speech broadcast from WJLK's local studio. In the course of his talk, Dr. Brameld said: "I am against the Russian system of education. The Russian system is not education, but indoctrination." Then, in answer to a question posed from the floor by one of his antagonists, Dr. Brameld said: "I don't know of anything of much importance in a democracy that is not controversial." Many in the audience wondered whether members of the Board of Education were listening.

The Shape of Things

THE THREAT OF SOME REPUBLICAN SENATORS to organize a "bipartisan" move to impeach the President is not likely to get far. Its only effect, especially in this election year, would be to solidify the broken ranks of the Democrats and prevent any honest discussion of Mr. Truman's seizure of the steel mills. The idea will probably fizzle out, while the steel industry and its irate defenders in Congress concentrate their heaviest fire on Secretary Sawyer's order raising steel workers' wages. But the constitutional issue itself is a real and serious one which should not be lost in the fog of self-interested, self-righteous propaganda now blanketing it. The Nation regards the President's act as an unwise use of the executive power. Justification for it would have to be found in a national emergency so extreme as to override ordinary democratic procedures. But if such an emergency existed—a claim we should certainly challenge—it should be recognized by Congress and special powers be granted the President. This has not happened; it would be hard to imagine it happening. Even the President's war powers, which expired with the signing of the Japanese peace treaty, were not broad enough to cover the seizure of industrial plants. In the light of these facts it seems to us that Mr. Truman made two serious mistakes: he exaggerated the crisis and exaggerated even more the "inherent powers" with which the Constitution has invested him. This view was strengthened by the President's suggestion that he might similarly seize newspapers or radio stations if such an act was "for the best interests of the country." Put plainly, we don't like the arbitrary exercise of executive authority even to force a just settlement of a labor dispute or to prevent a strike in steel.

MEANWHILE ELLIS R. ARNALL, DIRECTOR OF Price Stabilization, has done an excellent job of refuting the steel companies' claims and charges. In two energetic statements Mr. Arnall repeated his assertion that the companies could absorb cost increases amounting to around a billion dollars or $13.60 a ton, more than twice the amount of the recommended wage increase. Allowing a $3 price increase under the Caphart amendment, the average net profit per ton for the proposed contract period of eighteen months, under the government's wage recommendation, would come to about $17—compared to the average of $11 during "the very prosperous pre-Korean base period." Mr. Arnall flatly rejected the industry's claim that profits after taxes should be used as a basis of calculation. This, he pointed out, would require in "simple justice" that "personal taxes should be included in measuring changes in living costs, and that workers would therefore be entitled to correspondingly larger cost-of-living adjustments in their pay." (Here is a thought that may have escaped the steel bosses.) On any basis of computation the favorable situation of the companies is evident. The April Letter of the National City Bank, for example, reporting on fifty-three iron and steel companies, shows that while net profits after taxes dropped by 12 per cent from 1950 to 1951, the companies still made 12.3 per cent on their net assets last year, a loss of only 3 per cent over 1950. Moreover, steel did better in 1951 than industry as a whole; the profits of 3,409 leading corporations of all kinds averaged 11.4 per cent, as compared with 13.4 per cent in 1950. These figures should be borne in mind when listening to the outraged protests of steel men and Senators over Mr. Sawyer's wage increase and Mr. Arnall's recalcitrance on the subject of prices.

THE BASQUE DELEGATION IN NEW YORK IS to be commended for having submitted the case of the prisoners in Vitoria to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. This is an effective counter to the pro-Franco propaganda in this country which would like to convince Americans that the only enemies of the Spanish dictator are the "reds." The arrested workers of Vitoria, whose single offense was participation in the hunger-inspired strike of last spring, are for the most part Catholics. Their coming trial is already arousing strong feeling in Catholic circles inside and outside Spain. But other interesting developments have brought the Spanish issue again into the foreground. The State Department has felt itself obliged to suggest to the mayor of Madrid, a known Falangist, that he would do well to give up his official visit to New York, where various unions and anti-Franco organizations were prepared to picket and generally harass him. No doubt the department had been informed of what happened to the Spanish Ballet, whose appearance in Paris at the Théâtre Chaillot was the object of a hostile demonstration organized largely by Spanish Republicans which many Frenchmen joined. In this connection we want to endorse the action of Jacob S. Potofsky, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, who resigned as a director of the New York City Center because of the decision to send the New York City Ballet to Spain. In the cancellation of the visit of Madrid's mayor we have evidence of what organized democratic protest can accomplish.

THE OTHER DAY ELIA KAZAN, NOTED STAGE and movie director, confessed to the Un-American Activities Committee that he had been a member of the Communist Party for a short time in the '30's, and then went on to incriminate a number of his former associates, including one who was dead and could not defend himself. The next day Mr. Kazan, in a performance unique even for our unique era, paraphrased part of his testimony in a newspaper advertisement which must have put him considerably out of pocket if not out of conscience. A man must want to make moving pictures very much indeed to be willing so to degrade himself in public. Mr. Kazan cannot justify what he did on the grounds that he was saving his country from peril; all that he told happened a long time ago, and none of those he incriminated—according to his own statement—were engaged, so far as he knew, in espionage of any kind. Mr. Kazan is himself a victim, of course, of a devilish conspiracy to rob us of our integrity; we may shortly reach the point where the orgy of confessions and denunciations which characterized the Soviet spy trials will no longer mystify us, as they have done for two decades. But one would have thought that Mr. Kazan, who in his time has made a good deal of money, not to speak of many good pictures, would have found the courage to withstand the pressures on him, even if it meant being kicked out of Hollywood. After all, "The Informer" has already been filmed; even the redoubtable Mr. Kazan could hardly improve upon it.

THE MISSOURI AND THE MISSISSIPPI ARE once again making a contemptuous comment on our failure to tame them—a task certainly not beyond the capacity of the American people. The TVA has demonstrated how a great river can be brought under control and its water employed to create wealth and life instead of death and destruction. But as Richard G. Baumhoff shows in an article on page 398, appeals to false economy and the rivalries of vested interests, public and private, have prevented the application of this lesson to the Missouri Valley. Much money has been spent piecemeal fashion and often with good results: the present flood would have been still more serious if the great Fort Peck dam had not been built to hold back the swollen waters of the Milk River. But clearly nothing less than a fully integrated plan which takes into account flood control, navigation, power development, irrigation, and soil conservation will make the Missouri Valley safe and able to reach its full economic potentialities. As the President said on returning from his inspection flight over the flood area, it is time "to stop fooling around" and get action. In addition to needling Congress to provide more funds for construction and to pass flood-insurance legislation, Mr. Truman is reported as ready to adopt the Hoover Commission's proposal to take river navigation and flood control away from the Army Engineer Corps and concentrate it in the hands of the Reclamation Bureau of the Department of the Interior. This move would eliminate much costly inter-agency rivalry, but if Reclamation is to justify the added responsibilities it will have to improve on its record of recent years. In any case this reorganization will not solve the Missouri Valley problem. The need there is still for an independent authority, representative of both national and regional interests. *

NOTHING COULD BE MORE TIMELY THAN Father McCullen's statement on page 397 of this issue: "No one should be convicted of Communist sympathies on the word of a former Communist, unless proof is available to substantiate the charge." Louis Budenz, whose testimony as an informer has been given an aura of credibility by Catholic sponsorship, has provided a glimpse of the golden harvests that can be reaped these days by the voluble ex-Communists whose religious convictions do not include an overly sensitive appreciation of the Commandment about bearing false witness. In the last seven years Mr. Budenz has, by his own account, picked up loose change totaling $71,000 for various writings, lectures, and denunciations in many of which he has sought to incriminate other persons. Average annual earnings of $10,000 are not remarkable in a season of inflation; but they are large enough, all the same, to suggest that the ex-Communist who denounces his former colleagues, and falsely denounces those who were never his colleagues, often does so to his personal financial advantage. We commend to Mr. Budenz the final sentences of Father McCullen's sermon: "Every Catholic—especially the Catholic writer—should be distinguished by a love of justice and freedom and by a spirit of charity in his writings. Only in this way can we give testimony to the great truth which is ours to give to the world." *

BOLIVIA MUST BE WATCHED-ATTENTIVELY to see whether the courageous masses that won their bloody rebellion against the ruling military junta are to be loyally served by the new regime or betrayed, as so often happens in Latin America. The revolt was remarkable precisely because victory was achieved by civilians fighting in the streets after the military leaders who launched the action had given up the struggle as lost. The casualties have been estimated at more than 1,000 dead—a terrible toll for an uprising in a small country. Uncertainty about the aftermath stems from the personality and political position of Victor Paz Estenssoro, whose return to Bolivia from his Argentine exile was welcomed with disquieting shouts of "Long Live Paz Estenssoro!" and "Long Live Perón!" The new president shared power in a regime which was overthrown by another popular uprising in 1946. His relations with Perón are supposed to be friendly and his rule may well represent that mixture of dictatorship and demagogic appeal to the masses that characterize the Argentine regime. Paz Estenssoro's first act was to be the appointment of a commission to study the nationalization of tin, Bolivia's main source of wealth. The people apparently intend to see that their new president yields them the fruits of their revolution. Led by the tin miners, the Bolivian workers have united to press for nationalization not only of the mines, but of the railroads; their program also includes agrarian reform. How will Paz Estenssoro, who owes his position to these workers, treat their demands? *

OUR GOOD WISHES GO TO JUDSON KING, who has just celebrated his eightieth birthday. Few Americans have had more to do with establishing and vindicating the vital principles of our brand of democracy than Mr. King. His is one of the great names in the conservation movement; in the history of the fight to secure the initiative, referendum, and recall; and in furthering the cause of public ownership. In these times it is a pleasure to recall the fact that he was also one of the leaders in the successful fight to curb the witch-hunting propensities of Attorney-General A. Mitchell Palmer. Would that more members of the younger generation of American liberals had Mr. King's courage and energy!

Trouble for the Parties

GOVERNOR ADLAI E. STEVENSON'S decision not to seek the Democratic nomination—a decision to be regretted on all counts—gives added emphasis to the possibility that this campaign may strike many American voters as meaningless. The people can decide issues only when they are offered reasonably clear-cut choices. As long as Roosevelt's leadership dominated the Democratic Party, the people were offered a choice on vital foreign and domestic issues. In 1948 the candidacy of Henry Wallace helped to maintain the Democratic Party as a real alternative to the Republican-Dixiecrat coalition by forcing Truman to resist the Dixiecrats. But the President has since so dissipated the Roosevelt heritage that the coalition now threatens outright capture of both parties.

In the Democratic Party the pattern is clear. Today neither labor nor the liberals nor the minorities (notably Negroes) have a feasible alternative to the Democratic Party. The dominant blocs in the Democratic convention will be the two that have the greatest bargaining power: the Southern Bourbons and the city bosses most strongly influenced by Catholic power. Now that President Truman has withdrawn, the differences between these elements can be reconciled without too much trouble. Cardinal Spellman and James Byrnes are in basic agreement on foreign policy and Chairman Frank McKinney has already projected a plan by which the explosive civil-rights issue may be compromised before the convention. Not only are both blocs subject to much the same economic controls, but there is a natural affinity between the leaders. It was Senator James Eastland of Mississippi who started the clamor for concentration camps and J. Howard McGrath who authorized their construction.

The difficulties in the way of nominating a liberal at Chicago were clearly foreshadowed in McKinney's statement on April 7 in which he "warned" Governor Stevenson that no one could get to the White House unless he was "willing to work for it." Other party leaders joined the chorus of "warnings," including Robert B. La Follette, insurgent Tammany leader, who told the Governor that his testimony in the Hiss trial would be used against him if he sought the nomination. In the short interval between the President's withdrawal and Governor Stevenson's decision not to seek the nomination it had been made fairly clear that someone like Senator Paul Douglas would be a more acceptable nominee to the Southern Bourbons—Senator Russell Long of Louisiana had already proposed him—and to the cleric-advised bosses of the Northern city machines. Any candidate acceptable to the leaders of these dominant blocs would have to take a position on foreign and most domestic issues that would be hard to distinguish from the views, say, of General Eisenhower. Senator Douglas, for example, had actually proposed General Eisenhower as the Democratic nominee at a Jefferson Day dinner in Los Angeles in January. Almost to the degree, therefore, that these blocs are appeased, the Democrats will cease to offer the people a real choice on issues and candidates.

The same pressures have begun to be felt, in a somewhat different way, in the Republican Party. No matter whom the Republicans nominate, the party strategy will be to break the Solid South; and to do this the door must be kept open to the Dixiecrats. The Republicans might be tempted to try to recapture the Negro vote were it not for two considerations. Recent elections have shown that where, for example, a proposed FEPC ordinance is on the ballot for approval or rejection, the Democrats will tend to divide, whereas the Republicans will unite in opposition. In the last analysis, moreover, the Republicans cannot afford to become the champions of civil rights. Most Negroes belong to the working class and have come increasingly to identify their interests with the interests of labor as a whole. Just as the Democrats should expel the Dixiecrats but feel that they cannot afford to, so the Republicans should recapture the Negro vote but fear that the price would be too high. The Republicans have also begun to feel the pressure of Catholic power. If the Democrats are haunted by McCarran, the Republicans are worried by McCarthy. Somehow the Republicans must cut into the second-generation European-immigrant vote in the urban centers of the North, which is largely a Catholic vote, just as they must break the Solid South.

The fact that both major parties are in danger of being captured by the same forces creates an opportunity for the Democrats if they will seize it. If the Democrats want to win in November, they will try to find a candidate like Justice William O. Douglas who would challenge any nominee the Republicans might select on both foreign and domestic issues. Unfortunately Justice Douglas is not a candidate and now Governor Stevenson has taken himself out of the running. But the popular response to Senator Kefauver's engagingly direct and unconventional campaigning gives promise that, if given a clear-cut platform, he would make a strong nominee.

As though in anticipation of a Dixiecrat victory at Chicago, the Stars and Bars flutters today from army tents in Korea and rooftops all over the South; the Dixie Division marches in Confederate uniforms and schoolboys from coast to coast have succumbed to the "rebellion" by buying Confederate army caps. The Old South is on the march. The likelihood that the Bourbons can dictate conditions at the Democratic convention can no longer be dismissed as fantastic. Events have created a special opportunity for them, which they have been quick to sense and are well prepared to exploit. On the other hand, the liberal elements of the former Roosevelt coalition seem to be living in a political dream world; many of them have yet to realize that the New Deal is dead and that the Fair Deal was still-born. A new political world is emerging, with new issues, relationships, dimensions, and the voters are well ahead of the politicians of both parties in their awareness of this fact. In an editorial in our issue of April 5 (Mr. Truman Steps Aside), we pointed out that there were difficulties in the way of nominating Governor Stevenson which his backers did not sense. We have elaborated on these difficulties in this statement in the hope that the liberal elements of the Roosevelt coalition will recognize the necessity of securing unity now on a strategy and program for the Democratic convention in July.

A Priest Defends Civil Rights

BY JOHN J. McCULLEN

The following sermon was delivered on March 30 by the Reverend John McCullen of St. Ann's Roman Catholic Church, Fremont, Ohio. A graduate of the University of Notre Dame, Father McCullen has been curate at St. Ann's for the last five years. The sermon was apparently inspired by an attack on Justice William O. Douglas which appeared in a Catholic publication.

The Nation has rarely published sermons but we publish this one with genuine pleasure and also as a public service. It is an excellent and timely statement on an issue of great importance. But there is special significance in its insistence on the proposition that "Catholics should be foremost among all groups in the United States in supporting civil rights for all." Father McCullen's is doubtless a minority point of view among American Catholics; but it is in line with the tradition that includes such memorable statements as the address given in 1947 by Cardinal Stritch at the Chicago dinner in observance of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Peter Altgeld—an occasion on which Cardinal Stritch shared the program with Justice Douglas.

THE people of the United States have at last become alarmed about the menace of Communist infiltration within our borders. This awareness, which is a very good thing in itself, creates another danger. There is a real danger today that in our zeal to ferret out and expose the hidden Communist agent and spy we will adopt methods of our opponents and seem to act on the false principles of the Communists themselves. We may destroy the liberty we cherish if we try to defend it in the wrong way. We must uphold our traditional American civil rights which are the legal foundations of our liberty. We must maintain the right of all citizens to be free from unfounded and libelous attack, even those citizens with whom we disagree or whom we may suspect.

We Catholics should be foremost among all groups in the United States in supporting civil rights for all. Unfortunately many Catholic voices have been silent in that cause. Our religious belief obligates us to advocate social justice for all, and civil rights—the rights of all to a fair trial and to enjoy the freedoms guaranteed by our Constitution—are a fundamental part of social justice. Beyond this general reason there is the practical consideration that we are a minority group—in some parts of the United States a very small minority. As a minority we have a personal stake in America remaining the land of the free; if the liberties of any group are to be curtailed, we may be next on the list.

These reflections are caused by articles in Catholic newspapers and magazines and by talks given in various Catholic-sponsored forums. The tendency of these articles and lectures is to brand anyone who disagrees with the majority opinion as a Communist, or at least a Communistic sympathizer. Many of these talks and articles come directly or indirectly from ex-Communists. This is a source which should be regarded with considerable reserve. No one should be convicted of Communist sympathies on the word of a former Communist unless proof is available to substantiate the charge.

An example of unsupported charges of a serious nature was the articles in many Catholic newspapers suggesting that Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas sympathizes with communism because he has several times ruled in court in favor of Communists or alleged Communists. A more charitable explanation of the Justice's action would be that he believed everyone should have a right to a fair trial, and the right to hold the belief that is his, even if that person be suspected of communism. All of the cases in which the Justice ruled in favor of "radicals" were civil-rights cases—that is, these cases concerned the right of the accused to have a fair trial or to exercise some other civil right.

American history provides an interesting parallel to the action of Justice Douglas. John Altgeld, who was Governor of Illinois around the turn of the century, released several anarchists from prison because they had not had a fair trial. For this action the Governor was driven from public life. Today we realize that he was right, that he was a martyr to the principle that even the most unpopular individual is deserving of all the rights of a citizen.

In many civil-rights cases which came up before his death, Justice Frank Murphy, the last Catholic to sit on the supreme bench, sided with the view of Justice Douglas; both men have been outstanding advocates of civil liberty. That is not to say that these men were always right in their opinions—that is why we have nine judges on the Supreme Court rather than one. But we should not accuse these high officials of evil when there is a more just and more logical explanation for their decisions. We certainly need men with a passion for the liberties and freedom of the individual in a world where big business, big labor, and big government all tend to deprive men of their rights.

The Eighth Commandment—Thou shalt not lie—forbids us to make statements damaging to the reputation of others unless we can prove these statements. No Senator, no lecturer, no writer is exempted from that commandment. It is a cowardly and shameful thing to smear any man—and especially any public official—with charges which are unproved and unprovable. If the policy of an official has been a mistake, it should be changed; but that does not give us the right to say that the official was dishonest or disloyal. If a man in public life has been praised by the Communists—as Justice Douglas has oc-asionally been—we should check to see how often these same Communists have bitterly criticized him before we conclude that he is the friend of our enemies. Every Catholic—especially the Catholic writer—should be distinguished by a love of justice and freedom and by a spirit of charity in his writings. Only in this way can we give testimony to the great truth which is ours to give to the world.

Dam the Missouri Floods!

BY RICHARD G. BAUMHOFF

St. Louis, Missouri
STAGGERING Loss in Flood Reported—"500,000 Displaced, Great Flood Moves into the Missouri"—"Project to Curb Missouri Basin Spurred by Latest Disaster"—"Truman Inspects Flood from Air, Calls It Nation's Worst Disaster."

These are not today's headlines. They are taken from the newspapers of the third week in July, 1951. As inexorably as spring thaws follow winter snows in the Rockies where it rises, the Missouri bursts its banks and spreads desolation. And always the floods "spur" projects which never seem to get completed, and Presidential flights over the Big Muddy become almost as commonplace as his cruises on the Potomac.

Why is this situation permitted to continue year after year? Lack of money, or unwillingness to spend it, is only part of the answer. Involved also are questions of prestige and control, of states' rights vs. regional rights, of regional rights vs. federal rights, of interdepartmental jealousies, and—inevitably—the issue of public versus private electric power. The result has been that, while several large dams have been built and several more are planned, no over-all blueprint for the salvation of this one-sixth part of the nation's area has yet been agreed upon. Of committees, councils, and commissions, the Missouri Valley basin has more than enough; what it needs are more dams, levees, run-off and irrigation systems, and power plants.

At the moment, the following major bodies are involved in various types of Missouri-basin planning:

1. A new Missouri Basin Survey Commission, created by executive order of President Truman, is beginning work on a report scheduled for completion at the beginning of 1953. Meanwhile the powerful House Appropriations Committee, headed by Representative Clarence Cannon of Missouri, has been refusing to provide money to start any new basin projects until the survey commission's report is ready.

2. The moribund Regional Committee for a Missouri Valley Authority (to be modeled after the TVA), encouraged by the creation of the survey commission, is seeking money from liberal sources to renew its activities.

3. The Missouri River States Committee, comprising the governors and technical aides from the ten states of the basin region, has authorized the Council of State Governments to draft a big-scale interstate compact in the hope of providing a new type of basin management.

4. The President's old Water Resources Policy Commission recently published the final section of its report calling for legislation creating a system of fifteen river-basin commissions for the major regions of the nation, including one for the Missouri.

5. The Federal Bureau of the Budget is moving ponderously to draw up legislation calling for its own versions of basin flood-reclamation control.

6. The Missouri Basin Interagency Committee, an unofficial coordinating body comprising the governors of the ten Missouri basin states, plus representatives of the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce, the Reclamation Bureau, the Army Engineer Corps and the Federal Security Agency, has shown surprising ability, up to a point, to resolve controversies and achieve cooperation. Under its aegis, more than a billion dollars has been spent on basin projects since World War II. But the body has no official executive authority, and even some of its own members are already worrying about who shall have the right to turn the water on and off at the dams once they are built.

This amazingly complicated situation on what may be termed the blueprint level is paralleled, to some degree, on the operating level, where the agencies in the field—the Army Engineers, the Department of Agriculture and the Interior Department's Bureau of Reclamation—are fighting not only the river, but one another. Agriculture, interested primarily in soil conservation, retardation of run-offs and kindred measures, is wisely trying to achieve its program piecemeal. But it is meeting stiff opposition from the Army Engineers, who are also trying to high-jack some of the Kansas projects of the Bureau of Reclamation on the ground that they are flood-control measures and thus properly within the province of the army.

Action on the vitally needed flood control for the lower valley—hardest hit by this year's floods—has been stalled in spite of the terrific object lesson of last year's catastrophe. New irrigation in the middle and upper valley, with only a few exceptions, has failed to materialize; high costs and a population lulled by a better-than-average rainfall in the area for the last decade have discouraged progress. At the same time, demand for power along the river grows steadily; extensive steam plants will be needed, in addition to hydro-electric plants, to assure sufficient current. But on this front, the power lobby is keeping a close watch on basin activities, and the whole struggle over what shall be done about the Missouri valley is keyed, to a surprising degree, to the issue of public vs. private power.

Many of these problems were foreseen by supporters of a Missouri Valley Authority which would put essential control over basin development into the hands of the federal government. Enthusiasm for this plan was at its height in the 1940's. To ward off its adoption, Congress quietly enacted the so-called Pick-Sloan plan in 1944, a hasty amalgam of schemes worked out by the Army Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. The Pick-Sloan program, enlarged and altered, became the present interagency scheme, supporters of which denounced the MVA plan as "socialistic" and involving the creation of a "super-state." MVA backers, on the other hand, would have everyone believe that its creation would work miracles overnight. Both viewpoints, of course, are nonsense; the truth lies in between.

It is this truth, presumably, which the President's new Missouri Basin Survey Commission, now beginning its work, will seek to find. The commission is empowered to hold public hearings, study present and proposed plans and, in effect, draw up a plan of its own. It consists of five laymen, three Senators and three Representatives; its chairman is James E. Lawrence, editor of the Lincoln (Nebraska) Star, and Senator Hennings of Missouri is vice-chairman. In general, the commission is regarded as favoring MVA concepts for developing the basin.

Aside from the intrinsic difficulties of its job, the commission faces the prospect of carrying on its work during one of the most turbulent Presidential election campaigns in history, when many of the officials with whom it must deal will be preoccupied with fences rather than rivers. Moreover, it must make its report by next January 3, on the eve of the departure from the White House of the President who created it. And no one can foretell what kind of Congress and what kind of President will be in office to receive the report.

The commission's progress will be watched with keen interest by many groups, especially by the Missouri River States Committee, which from the beginning has opposed the commission as a move to foist an "authority" over the basin, and by the MVA Regional Committee, which will try to capitalize on its work.

There is growing public realization of the need for unified, regional management of the Missouri-basin program. The real issue is the authority to be granted to such an agency. Will it be a real valley organization, subject, like the TVA, to Congress, but not to the whims of Washington bureaucracy? The statement has been made repeatedly that any new device to deal with the Missouri basin must include adequate representation and official voice for the ten states of the valley. No denial of this assertion has been heard. It may be regarded as one of the fundamentals to be incorporated into whatever plan is adopted, and in this a precedent would be set for the nation.

I'd Prefer Bill Douglas

BY FRED RODELL

IT IS one of the tragedies of our time that William O. Douglas will not be the next President of the United States. The next President of the United States—or so every sign seems to point—will be Dwight D. Eisenhower. And the tragedy is high-lighted by even a quick comparison of the political characters of the General and the Justice—of the man who will likely be President and the man who ought to be.

The military man has long worn, like Joseph, a coat of many colors. Four years ago a group of left-of-Truman liberals wanted to draft him for the Democratic nomination; only a few months ago, a Democratic President offered him the succession on a platter; today, his Republicanism suddenly rampant, he is jubilantly backed by assorted G. O. P. stalwarts, some of whom, on domestic issues, are well to the right of Robert Taft. Indeed the General has been so cautiously noncommittal, even when he has been free to speak his political piece, that a recent series of newspaper articles, purporting to reveal his views, made headlines with such stuff as his support of democracy, free enterprise, and sound fiscal policy and his opposition to communism, corruption in government—and, presumably, the man-eating shark. An extremely able G. H. Q. administrator with a knack for negotiation and an engaging grin, Eisenhower has approached the White House with a crablike coyness as the hero whom nobody, not even Taft, hates and nobody really knows.

By striking contrast, the civilian government servant has long and courageously flaunted his political colors, hate them who will. There is no doubt where Justice Douglas stands on every important issue of our day. In his Supreme Court opinions—dishearteningly often in dissent—and increasingly in extracurricular writings and speeches, he has etched out a clear and militantly liberal political credo such as no other man high in public life can match.

Conservative and convention-bound critics of Douglas's forthright off-the-court expressions have accused him of subtly campaigning for the Presidency from the bench. The charge is doubly absurd. Again unlike Eisenhower, Douglas not only has flatly refused to run for the office but has sharply discouraged all admirers, politically potent and amateur alike, who have asked his tacit permission to stage a campaign in which he need take no part. More significantly still, and once more in telling contrast to the amiable General, the views which Douglas has been stating so strongly—in particular, his ringing defense of civil liberties at home against the onslaughts of the proliferating witch-hunt and his castigation of a military-minded foreign policy that would try to stop communism with guns (and dollars) alone—are precisely the views that no elective office-seeker in his right mind would utter in the face of the conform-or-else anti-Communist atmosphere of the times.

Yet if American liberals had to choose today the two most crucial issues on which to stand and be counted, as a matter of fighting principle and to hell with political expediency, it would be hard to get away from the exact pair Douglas has chosen: the decline of freedom at home and the dependence on naked power abroad. Moreover, Douglas is the only man of national stature who has spoken out boldly, officially, and ex-officio against either of these deepening dangers, much less both.

Thus, a recent darling of the down-the-line Trumanites, the clean and correct and slightly sterile Governor Stevenson, is so undeviating a devotee of the Administration's foreign policy and is so much more concerned, on the domestic front, about inflation and Washington bureaucracy than about the Bill of Rights that he might also be called, in his orthodox internationalism-plus-efficient-conservatism, a Democratic Dewey. The coon-capped Senator Kefauver, who hopes to sidle into the White House on a record of being opposed to corruption and crime, is soft on civil liberties as befits a border-state candidate and has yet to peep in mildest protest against our might-makes-right philosophy overseas. Senator Kerr, Senator Russell, Senator Douglas, Senator X—all of them blindly follow the Truman-Acheson foreign policy or worse; not one of them has talked up for freedom of speech and thought against what Justice Douglas calls "the black silence of fear" that overhangs the nation.

Next to these men with their mild, safe brands of party-line liberalism, the Justice looms up like a giant. For thirteen years now, on the Supreme Court, he has teamed with Justice Black to uphold the highest Holmes-

FRED RODELL is professor of Law at Yale University. While sharing Mr. Rodell's enthusiasm for Justice Douglas, we should like to make it clear that the views expressed in this article about Governor Stevenson and Senator Kefauver are not those of the Editors of The Nation and also that we do not accept his evaluation of Sidney Hillman or the role that Hillman played in 1944 (see: The Battle of Chicago by Freda Kirchwey, The Nation, July 29, 1944).

Brandeis tradition of progressive judicial statesmanship. Unlike a few of his brethren, he has not lost in the easy security of the bench his strong sense of outrage at injustice.

He is frankly sympathetic to labor, to consumers, to farmers, to small business men, to small investors, and he would read and build the law, wherever possible, in their behalf; he is frankly suspicious of powerful individuals and corporate colossi who would use the law to circumvent regulation, to escape taxes, to further in myriad ways the advantage of the economically strong over the economically weak. Like Justice Brandeis, to whose seat he succeeded—and who remarked at the time, "I wanted you to be here in my place"—Douglas has been the court's top financial expert, unfooled by even the fanciest attempts at dollars-and-cents skulduggery. Impatient with petty legalisms and fusty generalities, his no-nonsense opinions, in majority or dissent, invariably reveal "an instinct for the jugular."

Of late, Douglas's judicial fire has been turned more and more frequently and forcefully against the narrowing, in the name of "national security," of the First (and Fourteenth) Amendment's freedoms. His scornful dissent in the Dennis case last term—against the Smith-act conviction of the eleven Communists whom he dubbed "miserable merchants of unwanted ideas"—ranks with the great freedom-of-speech dissents of the past. His shocked protest against the court's recent benedictions of guilt-by-association, in upholding New York's infamous Feinberg law, is as eloquent a defense of academic freedom as has ever been penned.

It is undoubtedly because his (and Justice Black's) judicial battle to save our civil liberties is a losing legal cause today—thanks to the unconcern mixed with cowardice of the Truman-Vinson court—that Douglas has carried his fight to a wider front. Through articles and speeches he has made himself the nation's foremost spokesman against "loyalty" laws, "loyalty" oaths, "loyalty" checks, "loyalty" programs, and all the apparatus which inevitably equates a frightened and stereotyped orthodoxy of thought with genuine loyalty. His faith in our fundamental freedoms is matched by his contempt for our native Communists, whose supposed threat to the nation he rates as absurd.

But no man in public life understands so well as

Douglas the true threat of communism in other parts of the world. ("Bullets," he has said, "stop armies but they do not kill ideas.") His interest in Asia long predates the rather sudden concern of our policy-makers with that continent during the past decade. He was, for instance, one of the original backers of James Yen's mass-education movement for China, and he still hopes to see it restored and spread throughout the whole of Asia, and Africa as well. He has spent his past three summers in rugged trips through the Near and Far East, getting down to the grass-roots, talking to the people as few foreigners have ever done. Out of these trips have come two books (one as yet unpublished) and articles with such titles as Why We Are Losing Asia.

Here again Douglas has become the nation's foremost advocate of a dynamic instead of a static foreign policy—of an approach that would actively steer the world's underprivileged masses toward democracy, rather than resting content with attempted "containment" of communism. Almost two years before President Truman announced his Point Four plan, Douglas was publicly urging the export, throughout the world, of American technical skills and know-how, and American backing for health and education and land-reform programs—"to help other peoples to help themselves." Today, having seen on the spot how Point Four assistance, like Marshall Plan money, is too regularly restricted to ruling cliques and rarely trickles down to the people, Douglas is strong for what he calls Point Five.

Point Five would be active United States encouragement and support of revolution by the Eastern masses against their ancient landlords. Point Five would line up the United States, in the spirit of '76, in the camp of the peoples who are ripe and ready to throw off the economic subjugation of centuries. The seductive appeal of communism to such people, as Douglas knows first-hand, is its promise, however false, of land to own and no rent to pay and more food to eat. Such an appeal, says Douglas, can never be effectively countered by the military might, however necessary, and the dollar diplomacy, however free-handed, and the talk of democracy, however eloquent, on which the Truman-Acheson foreign policy stakes its all.

It is this sort of informed realism plus bold idealism that sets Douglas far apart from the crowd-pleasing, me-tooing Eisenhowers and Stevensons and Kefauvers, and that has given Douglas, throughout his career, the mark of greatness.

WHEN he went to the Supreme Court in 1939 at the age of forty—the youngest Justice in more than a century—Douglas had quite a career behind him. Born in Minnesota, the son of a poor, itinerant Presbyterian preacher; reared in the state of Washington, where he helped support his widowed mother while working his way through school and college with a rag-tag succession of jobs that ranged from newsboy to berry-picker to window-washer to sheep-herder; graduated from Columbia Law School (after riding East on a freight-car to get there) number two in a class that included, much farther down in the rankings, a certain Thomas E. Dewey; rejecting the lure of a promising and lucrative Wall Street law practice to enter teaching—Douglas, aged thirty-two, his own LL.B. barely five years old, was named Sterling Professor of Law at Yale.

But Yale and teaching could not hold for long, despite Robert M. Hutchins's description of him as "the nation's outstanding law teacher," the intellectual dynamo that Douglas was—and is. He was soon dividing his time between his classes and an exhaustive investigation of corporate reorganizations for the new-born SEC—two normally full-time jobs. The brilliance of his eventual report to the SEC led President Roosevelt to appoint him a Commissioner; the tough-minded expertness of his work as Commissioner brought him elevation to the SEC chairmanship; the executive skill and courage he displayed as chairman, as in bringing the New York Stock Exchange to heel (he was rated by many as the New Deal's finest administrator), was rewarded by appointment to the Supreme Court—all this within the space of less than three years.

That Douglas's meteoric career could reach its zenith on the Supreme Court—that he would remain a Justice for twenty-five or thirty years and then retire—is something that nobody who knew the man believed, with the possible exception of Douglas himself. Yet events ever since have pointed precisely that way. When F. D. R. sounded him out for the vice-presidential nomination in 1940, Douglas made it clear he wanted to stay in his new judicial job, and Henry Wallace got the nod by default.

In 1944, a Roosevelt who may well have sensed he was close to death named Douglas first as his chosen running-mate and presumable successor in the famous note he sent to the Chicago convention; but Hannegan and Hillman and Flynn, three bosses who feared Douglas's incorruptible independence, contrived—with the help of Douglas's own abstention from the arena—to put across F. D. R.'s second choice instead. The bosses were not afraid of Harry Truman.

In 1948 it was Truman himself, impressed by the spontaneous show of strength for Douglas at Philadelphia, who begged the Justice to accept the other spot on the Democratic ticket. Nor was Douglas's firm refusal based, as has been reported, on a why-bother feeling that Truman could not win; rather, it was founded on a conviction that he could serve both the country and the cause of liberalism better on the court than in the Throttlebottom job of presiding officer of the Senate.

Thus Justice Douglas, three times in a row, could have made himself the Democratic heir apparent had he so much as lifted an assenting finger in his own behalf. That finger remains unlifted still, even though the available prize this year is first, not second, place on the party ticket.

And if the Democratic nomination for President goes to somebody like Stevenson or Kefauver, or to some other comparatively inoffensive comparative second-rater, the Presidency will probably go to the equally inoffensive General Eisenhower. Meanwhile, the man who has never failed or hesitated to put principle above politics, who has spoken out in strong and splendid solitude on the big issues of our time, whose insight and courage and indigenous American liberalism are unmatched in public life today, will remain, for at least another four years, Mr. Justice Douglas.

Germany: Not Uniforms, But Unity

BY CAROLUS

Bonn, Germany

ON NOVEMBER 3, 1950, the Soviet Union sent its war-time allies a diplomatic note calling for a Big Four conference; on the agenda was a peace treaty with Germany. Moscow laid down two cardinal conditions for this treaty: permanent demilitarization of Germany, and renunciation of the Atlantic defense pact. Failure to agree on these two points brought the rupture of the subsequent Paris negotiations.

On March 10 the Western powers again were the recipients of a note from the East calling for a four-power conference on the question of a peace treaty with Germany. But this time the conditions were different: first, a unified, free Germany was to be permitted a national army for defense purposes; second, this armed and unified Germany was to be prohibited from joining a military alliance directed against any nation that fought Germany during World War II. The phrasing was different but the Soviet aim remained unchanged: to prevent Germany's participation in NATO.

What was the West's answer to Soviet Russia's main conditions? Like the U. S. S. R., the Western powers affirm their desire to see a free and unified Germany created even before a peace treaty is concluded. But in sharp opposition to Moscow, they regard a German national army as a step away from peace. In Western eyes a reconstituted German army would herald the rebirth of German militarism and constitute a threat to the envisioned European defense community, set up to deter aggression and maintain peace. On the issue of NATO, the West says, in direct contradiction to Moscow, that a unified Germany must have the right, before or after conclusion of a peace treaty, to join any grouping that adheres to the principles of the United Nations.

How does the average German react to this question-and-answer game between East and West?

Germany's man-in-the-street derides the obvious dishonesty, the blatant hypocrisy of both notes. Hard hit in war and post-war days, he shudders at the deadly game played by East and West with himself as the pawn and world peace in the balance. He opposes a new militarism, no matter how disguised. He doesn't want to see new barracks and war ministries no matter what they are called or what flags flutter from their rooftops. He will do anything rather than have Germany become another Korea.

The day before the Soviet note of March 10, the West German Communists' propaganda against Western defense plans still had a chance. The day after the note, the selfsame Communists were the laughingstock of all Germany. For Moscow's sudden concession to German militarist pride came as a shocking reversal after its record of intense opposition to militarization. West Germany's Communists are no longer a political factor. They have become a sacrificial offering of Moscow and few people doubt that the same fate awaits the Communist-run East German Socialist Unity Party should Moscow's tactics demand a compromise with the West. A unified Germany and a single German government can be obtained only through free, all-German elections, and free elections mean the end of the Socialist Unity Party.

But apart from the effect of the Soviet policy reversal on both German and French Communists, it cannot be denied that many Germans see in the Soviet note a chance for peaceful unification. They regard it as a significant development that could point the way to Germany's neutralization on the Swiss or Swedish model.

In view of this attitude, the West's negative answer caused widespread disappointment. West Germany's most notable political journal, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, mirrors public opinion in its March 29 comment: "Germany must obligate itself not to enter into military alliances; this indeed is a Russian bull's-eye. . . . Western diplomacy has failed in its answer by not dealing adequately with this decisive proposal. Was it correct to close the door precisely here? The Western note seems to have been written by a military rather than a diplomatic pen."

A publication as pro-Western in its estimates of the German situation as the Swiss National Zeitung in Basel had this to say on the Western note: "The answer of the West did not turn out as hoped and expected by the majority of the German people and even perhaps of the Cabinet in Bonn. This is obvious in the reactions of the West German press. One gets the impression that the Western note is tantamount to a rejection of the Russian proposals."

IT WAS not only the press and the people who were disappointed at the West's answer. Federal Chancellor Konrad Adenauer was hard put to heal rifts within his government and the conservative ruling parties. He finally managed to do so in a dramatic parliamentary debate only because the bourgeois parties were held together by their class interest against concerted attacks of the Social Democratic opposition. The threat of a future all-German government under Social Democratic leadership was enough to overrule the better judgment of Adenauer's rebellious adherents. The Socialist opposition this time had a well-founded case; it asked for the resignation of State Secretary Walter Hallstein, who in Washington had labeled the Soviet note "uninteresting" and spoke of the West's integration of Europe "all the way to the Urals." Although the Chancellor in open session reprimanded his first lieutenant for "erroneous verbal thrusts," he backed his general position. And what else could he do? After all, only a few days after Hallstein's appearance in Washington Adenauer himself said that Germany had a mission to perform in the "renaissance of Eastern Europe."

The foreign-policy debate forced by the Social Democrats was marked by eloquent appeals to Adenauer, the government parties, and the Western powers. The Big Four conference proposed by Moscow probably offers the last chance for German unity and world peace, opposition deputies urged. Don't slam the door in the face of the Soviet Union by any move toward rearmament and integration with the West; these are moves designed to kill Moscow's interest in further negotiations and concessions. Don't force the Soviet Union into a final No. Germany's status, they said, can be determined only by discussions between East and West.

But Adenauer wants to see remilitarization and Western integration a fait accompli, for he believes that German unity can be obtained only through Western strength. In his eyes, peace depends on the deployment of NATO troops along the Elbe River.

When a second Soviet note was delivered a fortnight ago, again opening the way to all-German elections under four-power supervision, Adenauer's reaction was, in effect: We must act even faster now. He was referring to negotiations that are proceeding with the three Western High Commissioners on a contractual agreement which is to replace the current occupation statute. Talks on the new agreement are being rushed almost frantically. Western Germany has to be "integrated" with the West and a military alliance safely concluded before the current East-West question-and-answer game is completed.

An authoritarian regime like that of Bonn is not concerned with what the majority thinks. Bonn does not care what the people are saying about rearmament; it is not troubled by its lack of a parliamentary majority on the integration issue. The Chancellor and his clique govern with the consent and backing of the High Commissioners. Therein lies their future, therein the source of their power. From the Petersberg—official residence of the High Commissioners—flow their profits and privileges. They are not likely to offend the Western guarantors of their preeminence.

Even the conservative Catholic organ Süddeutsche Zeitung wrote on April 4:

Chancellor Adenauer was never before as Western in his views, as self-assured and certain of victory as he is now in his determined pursuit of the goal of integration for the federal republic. Because of this, his statements on the desirability of German unification can be dismissed as nothing more than tactical moves. . . . His main worry is not even the possible reaction of the German public—he is concerned only with the result of the coming elections for the Presidency of the United States. His dominant thought: Eisenhower.

The Swiss also are uneasy. The National Zeitung warns:

The Western answer to the Soviet note shows clearly that the West rejects armed or unarmed neutrality for a unified Germany. The note insists that a reunited Germany must have free choice to join groupings like the European army and the Atlantic pact. The Western powers are thus demanding an unconditional Soviet surrender on the question of Germany.

Strife in the Textile Union

BY RALPH LOWENSTEIN

WHEN delegates to the biennial convention of the Textile Workers Union of America (C. I. O.) meet in Cleveland on April 28, they will have an opportunity to vote an end to one of the longest, but least clearly defined, struggles for power ever to plague an American labor union. The T. W. U. A., still reeling from the effects of the unsuccessful strikes in Southern factories last year, has been riven by the prolonged fight between its own top administrators.

Just what are the issues that divide its president, Emil Rieve, and its executive vice-president, George Baldanzi? Both men are avowed anti-Communists; both have held their present positions since 1939; and both have been on the C. I. O.'s Executive Board for the past thirteen years.

Baldanzi, a former Pennsylvania coal miner and union organizer, says he is trying to bring "democratization" to a union that too long has been under the "dictatorial" thumb of Rieve and his "hand-picked" twenty-man Executive Council. Rieve partisans, however, charge that Baldanzi is a "lone wolf" who has always made his own decisions without consulting Rieve or the council. They further contend that Baldanzi's attacks, coming at a time when thousands of Southern union members are working without contracts, sabotage unity in the T. W. U. A.

MR. LOWENSTEIN, a native of Virginia, is a free-lance writer who is now studying at the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism.

If "democracy" is Baldanzi's main cause for attacking the union administration, he has some further explaining to do. He did not urge democracy until after his open split with Rieve had developed. Previously he had favored a strongly centralized union.

Probably the issue of democracy is an effect rather than a cause of Baldanzi's clash with Rieve. "Democratization," for the executive vice-president, is another word for decentralization. In a union where the power is stacked against him, decentralization is the most important issue that Baldanzi can raise. Not only is "democracy" an effective fighting slogan, but decentralization would ensure the jobs of the officials who support Baldanzi.

The T. W. U. A. is highly centralized. Unlike most of the C. I. O.'s international unions, its three top executives and twenty vice-presidents, who compose the Executive Council, are elected by delegates to the biennial conventions, not by popular vote of the rank and file. The vice-presidents serve without pay, but most of them have been appointed by Rieve to union jobs as regional, state or industry directors. Therefore, Rieve can relieve any member of the Executive Council from his wage-earning post, although he cannot dismiss him from his elected position on the council. This is the ground for Baldanzi's charge that the council is "hand-picked."

Rieve claims that centralization is necessary to organize efficiently the more than 500,000 unorganized textile workers in the South. If the T. W. U. A. could add these to its present membership of more than 400,000, it could rival the C. I. O.'s giant United Auto Workers and United Steelworkers in size and power.

Some explain the Rieve-Baldanzi split as a struggle between youth and age (Baldanzi is forty-five; Rieve is fifty-nine) for leadership of the T. W. U. A., but many high union officials say that a rift between men of their temperaments was inevitable. Both Rieve and Baldanzi are strong personalities. Rieve is the in-fighter, the man who, as union president, can pull the influential strings; Baldanzi is the emotional platform speaker who can sway the crowd.

Since the union's 1950 convention in Boston, where their smoldering conflict burst into flame, the two men have been at loggerheads. At Boston, Rieve publicly supported Baldanzi's rival for the position of executive vice-president. In the four-hour debate that preceded the secret balloting, Rieve and Baldanzi supporters hurled accusations at one another. Rieve bluntly told the 2,000 delegates that he could no longer work with his executive vice-president. William Pollock, secretary-treasurer, and fourteen members of the Executive Council sided with Rieve. Baldanzi told the delegates that if he were reelected a new unity in the T. W. U. A.'s administration would be achieved because it would be the wish of the membership.

The delegates reelected Baldanzi by a ten-to-seven ratio, Rieve by a unanimous vote.

After the election, the two leaders promised to try to work together and "reestablish the team." Their efforts were short-lived. Within a few months an irrevocable split developed. Rieve, Pollock, and sixteen vice-presidents were lined up on one side; Baldanzi and the other four council members were on the other. The conflict was further high-lighted in March, 1951, when Rieve fired Samuel Baron, the T. W. U. A.'s Canadian director and one of Baldanzi's chief supporters.

Rieve charged the Canadian director with attacking the union administration in the press at a moment when crucial contract negotiations were under way. Baldanzi, supporting Baron, counter-charged that Rieve was "purging" the union of Baldanzi supporters.

Last July, 400 Baldanzi followers held a two-day convention in New York City and pledged more than $100,000 to finance their revolt against Rieve and to make the T. W. U. A. more "democratic." The caucus set up a seventy-man committee, called the "Pre-Convention Committee for a Democratic T. W. U. A.," and established a five-man steering committee headed by Baldanzi.

In line with Baldanzi's call for democratization, the caucus demanded that (1) the Executive Council be made the supreme governing body of the union in fact as well as theory, and (2) all representatives be elected by the membership. Since July both sides have been consolidating their forces for an all-out fight at Cleveland.

The major piece of legislation to come before the convention delegates is a constitutional amendment subjecting state and area directors, who will continue to be appointed by the president, to biennial votes of "disapproval" by the membership in their districts.

Although this is essentially the same amendment that Baldanzi proposed at the 1950 convention, he now opposes it on the ground that the "situation has changed." The Baldanzi group advocates, instead, the election of local, state, and regional directors by secret ballot of the district membership—a proposal that the Executive Council previously rejected.

Even though both men draw support from all geographical sections of the textile industry, the fact that Baldanzi has a powerful following in the South indicates that their differences may go beyond personalities. Baldanzi's long experience as an organizational director in the South explains some of his support there. Many Southern union officials say that Rieve, accustomed to dealing with situations among more experienced labor in the North, has never understood the peculiar problems of organization and negotiation in the large Southern factories.

Despite the fact that Baldanzi approved of the union's decision to strike the Southern mills, Southern officials tend to blame Rieve for the reversals the T. W. U. A. suffered. (The timing was poor, for the workers struck when the mills had one of the largest inventories in their history.) They say that Rieve, realizing his power was waning in the South, took personal charge of the strike and did not call for Baldanzi's aid. Mill employers did not know many of the union negotiators that Rieve brought down and got along badly with them.

AS THE delegates set out for Cleveland, the big question mark is Baldanzi. Will he oppose Rieve for the presidency of the T. W. U. A.? Although he has committed himself to a fight against the Rieve forces, Baldanzi has never run for the top union position. Since a man can be a candidate for only one position, he would be taking an "all or nothing" gamble if he ran for the post.

Rieve's supporters hope he takes the risk. They are confident that the president, who has been elected by unanimous votes at all six union conventions, could defeat him.

If either antagonist wins a clear victory at the convention, officials on both sides believe that heads will roll in the ensuing union reorganization. If neither wins a decisive victory, the frustrating situation whereby chief administrators spend as much time in internecine warfare as on union duties will continue, and one of the great unions of the country—and the labor movement as a whole—will suffer thereby.

Heat without Light

BLOOD, OIL, AND SAND. By Ray Brock. The World Publishing Company. $3.50.

THE dramatic collapse of British hegemony in the Middle East and the spread of the solvent of Arab nationalism to the French-controlled territories of the southern Mediterranean littoral have posed problems for American policymakers every whit as cogent as those of the Far East. The scope and complexity of American political, economic, and military involvement in the area have increased to the point of requiring an urgent but clear and cool-headed appraisal of American interests, which often parallel but sometimes conflict with those of other external powers longer established in the region.

New American bases projected or already in existence from Morocco to Saudi Arabia, an American battle-fleet in the Levant, American military aid to Turkey, American support for the establishment of Israel, American Point Four missions, American intervention in the British-Iranian oil dispute, all conspicuously illustrate a piecemeal and erratic entry forced by events into this crucial center of affairs. Many of these measures, seemingly unplanned and incoherent, spring from the general policy of containment of the Soviet Union by strategic and economic means. A conflict between contradictory military and civilian policies is in the making and is likely to become acute. How far can the United States go in support of Arab nationalism, say in Tunis, without undermining French confidence? Which is to have priority—the military build-up or the creation of social and economic conditions which will effectively bar the road to Communist expansion?

The rapid growth of American commitments in Western Europe and Eastern Asia has led to a natural reluctance to undertake initiatives in other quarters. Winston Churchill's appeal for the dispatch of token American forces to Suez had a chilly reception in Washington last January. But in the absence of a sustained and consistent American policy in the Middle East the chances are that further initiatives will be undertaken as events dictate them.

At the present time a reasoned, dispassionate survey and critique of American interests in the Middle East would be an invaluable contribution toward the formulation of a national policy for the region. Unhappily Mr. Brock, in other respects an experienced foreign correspondent who knows the Middle East at first-hand, brings little clarity to his subject. "Blood, Oil, and Sand" is a heated and lurid oversize pamphlet that hastily scans the Middle East and the Moslem world with a lengthy excursion into the Balkans in general and Yugoslavia in particular.

Mr. Brock has for long been deeply emotionally involved in the fate of Mihailovich, whom the Allies jettisoned during the war in favor of Tito and his partisans. It is highly questionable whether this ample digression has any bearing at all on the problems of the Middle East which the author attempts to appraise. For Mr. Brock Mihailovich is Europe's Chiang Kai-shek, betrayed and abandoned by his former allies. The parallel will convey some idea of the tone and temper of his book.

"Blood, Oil, and Sand" is a notable example of the literature of Armageddon which in its current form often makes the outside world wonder where their nightmares are likely to lead some American publicists. Its apocalyptic theme is the inevitability of war with Russia in the Middle East timed to break out more likely than not during 1952. "War with Russia," Mr. Brock observes in one of his gloomiest passages, "is the ineluctable fate of the West, now that United States power and influence in the Middle East have been so seriously undermined."

"Harp Gelorum?" ("Is war coming?") a group of trusting Turkish laborers asked their pessimistic foreign visitor during his stay in Ankara. Mr. Brock nodded slowly, which is about the only thing he does at that pace in the course of his helter-skelter travels. At times the speed of his journey and writing leads him into some strange bypaths.

He aspires a former British proconsul in Egypt as "Ghorst," pre-dates the Islamic invasion of India to 200 B. C., only 800-odd years before the rise of the Prophet, and, most curious blunder of all, which seriously undermines the reader's faith in his claim to be regarded as an "expert" on his subject, refers to Mohammed Zahir Shah as "Pakistan's king." The Afghans may have something to say about that.

After illiteracies of this kind it is difficult to take Mr. Brock seriously. The steps he envisages for a clarification of American foreign policy as the result of review by a joint Congressional subcommittee ("Subcommittee of what?" the reader sighs) are thoroughly and perhaps purposely confused. Mr. Brock asks for an examination of "the issue of Palestine," "American intrusion in and mishandling of the Iranian oil crisis," "the open scandal of continued arms and financial disbursements to the Communist regime of Marshal Tito," "a prompt investigation of the USIS" (United States Information Services). Mr. Brock does not indicate whether any of these investigations could be adequately concluded before the war, which he appears to anticipate with Cassandra-like relish, breaks out.

Mr. Brock finds no shortage of windmills at which to tilt. They include "pressure groups, lobbies, and special interests, at home and abroad" like "Zionist organizations, the Arab League, oil companies, Bulgarian and Croatian irredentists" (!) and naturally the long-suffering State Department. In the Middle East everyone is out of step except Mr. Brock.

JACK WINOCOUR

The Complete Actor

HENRY IRVING: THE ACTOR AND HIS WORLD. By His Grandson Laurence Irving. The Macmillan Company. $10.

IN AN amiable mood Dr. Johnson once maintained that, all things considered, David Garrick was a remarkably modest man. Most celebrities "have their applause at a distance; but Garrick had it dashed in his face, sounded in his ears, and went home every night with the plaudits of a thousand in his cranium." The penalty of course is that no actor can be really famous after his death and that what he leaves behind him is, at best, merely a legend. For all we can know, Garrick might seem ridiculous to us; it is hard to imagine that Salvini would not have seemed absurd playing Othello with a mustache; and though there are many who at least think that they remember what Irving was like, even they, accustomed by now to different methods, might get a shock if they saw him. I would give a good deal to hear Nell Gwyn delivering an epilogue by Dryden but I am not sure that I would think her especially good.

Here nevertheless is pretty much all that remains of Henry Irving, collected by his grandson into an extremely solid and able book of more than seven hundred pages. Here are the facts; here are the opinions, favorable and unfavorable, of his contemporaries; here are the photographs which show how he dressed and stood. According to the author, there also survives a single wax phonograph cylinder from which the ghost of a voice can still be coaxed, but it would probably not tell much since even the best modern discs give a very inadequate idea of what an actor on the stage is like. From the book we can learn that Irving acted and was famous; we can get very little idea why he was famous or whether, by our standards, he ought to have been. This is not to say that the book is not very interesting to read. It is. But inevitably it is an account of a reputation not of an achievement.

Unlike Garrick, Irving did not gain the heights at a single leap and stay there unchallenged through a long career. But like Garrick he seems to have been born only to be an actor and his career followed a standard pattern. Born John Brodribb—no wonder he changed his name—he had the usual strict non-conformist parents, the usual brief education, and the usual youthful love for declamation. As an adolescent he was put as clerk into the office of a firm of East India merchants, found time to take lessons in elocution, and saved enough from his salary to patronize that odd Victorian institution familiar to readers of Dickens, the public theater where amateurs paid for the privilege of acting roles—so much for Hamlet, a good deal less for Laertes, etc. By the time he reached eighteen he had a job in a provincial company, in due time made his London debut, in due time became his own manager, in due time found in Ellen Terry his perfect leading lady, in due time became the official interpreter of The Bard, and in due time also reached that ultimate goal of the English actor, a knighthood. These seven ages of the player are a typical as the seven ages of man and Irving interpreted each role with classic propriety.

Even in his heyday there were some dissenters. A few thought his pronunciation affected, his postures too actory. A few commented unfavorably on his obvious delight in melodrama and his great success in "The Bells" and "Eugene Aram." Mr. Ruskin embarrassingly insisted upon protesting to the public that his approval of Irving's Shylock was not as unqualified as it had been made to appear. But these dissenting voices were not important and it was only after he had lived into a new age that his claim to greatness was seriously questioned. The dreadful shadow of Ibsen and Ibsenism fell upon him. Irving, his methods, and the plays he acted in were perfect targets for the impudence of Shaw and all the proponents of the New Drama and the New Theater. Understandably enough the eminent survivor from a past age wrote Shaw a letter which said in effect, will you please lay off me? And to add insult to injury, Shaw was at the same time undermining him with Ellen Terry. At this distance we can perhaps say that what Shaw stood for was not as wholly right or what Irving stood for as wholly wrong as the advanced thinkers thought. But their day was coming and his was passing.

In a sense the present biography—which is certainly one of the most thorough and balanced ever written of an actor—is also unpretentious since it makes no attempt to be "brilliant," but its very thoroughness and competence emphasize the fact that its subject seems to have been completely undistinguished and uninteresting except as an actor. Like many eminent in his profession he was not much concerned with anything except that profession and was without other intellectual interests. In his early days he liked smoking and drinking and eating with other professionals. He was not very happily married and women seem to have played little part in his life. Once he had got above the lowest rungs of his ladder his chief ambition outside the theater seems to have been to become an Eminent Victorian—to know other famous men, to be elected to the right clubs, to be accepted into that Good Society to which in that day only the greatest and most indubitably respectable actors could possibly aspire. Ellen Terry had more than a touch of the bohemian in her character; Irving was careful to do nothing which could raise an eyebrow. Two caricatures by Max Beerbohm are titled, respectively, "Henry Irving: Man of Distinction" and "Bernard Shaw: Man of Destiny" and that no doubt hit the nail on the head. If, as seems to be the case, this biography really gives a complete portrait one can only say that Irving hardly had a personality. What he did have was a career.

Masefield Looks Back

SO LONG TO LEARN. By John Masefield. The Macmillan Company. $3.

IT SHOULD be made clear at the outset that, in "So Long to Learn," Mr. Masefield has not concerned himself much with the purely physical events of his life, dealt with in other books, but rather with the emotional effect of some of these experiences as well as with the impact of various personalities upon his own poetic development. The English Poet Laureate has ripened mellowly, like a fine Worcestershire apple, and there is enough of a bite left in the flavor of the juice to make the taste a memorable one. One could never accuse him of resembling one of these glowing red Washington State apples which turns out to be stuffed with pink and cloying cotton-wadding. While he displays rather a surprising tolerance of his juniors, born perhaps of an inner conviction of his own essential rightness, he does not kowtow as if seeking their plaudits. Bluntly, he claims, "It is not possible to persuade the living that the late Victorian time was in all intellectual ways immeasurably ahead of any time that has succeeded. Those who knew that time, know the truth about it, and are the first to admit its defects. Those who did not know the time seem incapable of perceiving anything else. . . . It would startle the young of today to know what enormous appetite for thought Victorian London shewed; what dozens of papers fostered delight in writing, what pages of comment upon thought came daily, what fervour this or that movement caused, what excellence was being achieved." This comes as a much needed reminder that the period was not all one of greenery-yallery young men walking down Piccadilly with a poppy or a lily in their medieval hands.

But "So Long to Learn" is much more than a mere reminder that we should be careful how we pigeonhole our literary history. Mr. Masefield casts his memory back nearly to the day when, almost seventy-four years ago, he was born in Herefordshire, and tries to recall the little things, as well as the large, which have gone to the making of a poet.

Intermingled with the memories of the world which must have appeared to him "apparelled in celestial light," and which are recaptured with a startling clarity, are the stories, of Roundheads and Cavaliers, of Robin Hood, and of St. Katherine Audley of Ledbury, which became a part of him and determined him to be a story-teller. After the legends passed by word of mouth there came the penny-dreadfuls and the more expensive, though not less bloodthirsty, serials, which led the boy and youth to Mallory and a copy of the Welsh "Mabinogion," from which he took the Triad which helped him as a kind of motto: "The three foundations of judgment:—Bold Design, Constant Practice, and Frequent Mistakes." Then, in contact with his contemporaries and elders, we get a smattering of memories, not of the personal or physical impact of such a writer as W. B. Yeats but of his effect upon an impressionable young man. Mr. Masefield remains throughout stressful of the fact that poetry makes its greatest impression when read, and the recent success of such a poet as Dylan Thomas in this country would seem to show that the great public bears him out.

Whatever one's opinion of the poems of John Masefield, it cannot be denied that his book is an important document of the process that goes to turn a small boy, interested in stories and the world around him, into a poet and spinner of stories. Nor can the book fail to deserve its place on the shelf alongside the more treasured autobiographies of our time, such as W. Graham Robertson's "Those Were the Days," as a picture of a man whom one would like to have known, to have watched develop.

RUTHVEN TODD

Books in Brief

LAUGHING TO KEEP FROM CRYING. By Langston Hughes. Holt. $2.75. When Mr. Hughes is good, he is very very good, and when he is bad he is either insincere or superficial. Both extremes are represented in his latest collection of stories and sketches about Negro life, ranging from Shanghai to Havana. At his best, Mr. Hughes manages the nice feat of dragging out into the open a number of unpleasant truths about racial discrimination and presenting them in a playful and extremely engaging manner.

NAKED TO MINE ENEMIES. By Susan Yorke. Harcourt, Brace. $3. With her second novel Susan Yorke succeeds beyond all expectations in dissipating the favorable impression created by her first, "The Widow." This one tells the story of an incredible cad as he is seen by three women, his sister and two of his many mistresses. They are fascinated by his life, particularly by his rutting in Argentinian high society, and so is the author, for reasons that are never made clear—but it is hardly likely that many readers will be.

THE TUNNEL. By Eric Williams. Coward-McCann. $3. In "The Wooden Horse" Eric Williams described the escape of two English officers from a German prison camp. In "The Tunnel" he recounts their preceding experiences as prisoners of war. The author has a knack for lively, vivid narrative but the material of the new book is of a much lower order of interest, dealing, as it does, with the everyday life of a prison camp, whereas its predecessor told the success story of a single episode which had the unity and tension of a first-rate thriller.

in this movie probably thought the camera-wielder was a stray citizen having trouble with the lock of a small black case that could contain anything from a piccolo to a tiny machine gun. For dramatic action, the film deals with one of the toughest slum areas extant: an uptown neighborhood where the adults look like badly repaired Humpty Dumpties who have lived a thousand years in some subway restroom, and where the kids have a wild gypsy charm and evidently spend most of their day savagely spoofing the dress and manners of their elders. The movie, to be shown around the 16-millimeter circuit, has been beautifully edited (by Miss Levitt) into a somber study of the American figure, from childhood to old age, growing stiffer, uglier, and lonelier with the passage of years.

Let me say that changing one's identity and acting like a spy, or a private eye, are more a part of the American make-up than I'd ever imagined before seeing this picture. This not only holds for Levitt, Inc., who had to disguise their role of film-makers to get the naked truth, but also goes for the slum people who are being photographed. The film is mostly concerned with kids who are trying to lose themselves in fake adulthood by wearing their parents' clothes and aping grown-ups' expressions; even the comparatively few adults (at a war-time bond rally) go in for disguises—Legionnaire uniforms, etc.—and seem afraid to be themselves. The chief sensation is of people zestfully involved in making themselves ugly and surrealistic, as though everything Goya's lithographs indicated about the human race had come true. This mood is established right off in a wonderful shot of a Negro tot mashing her tongue and face out of shape against a windowpane. This private bit of facemaking is followed soon by a shot of a fat man leaping up and down and chortling with glee at the sight of a neighborhood kid carrying another one on his shoulders, solemnly impersonating a new two-bodied grown-up. And this scene gives way to a macabre game of gypsy kids making like maniacs by clubbing each other with flour-filled stockings swiped from their mudders.

MY LIST of top pictures made in the last five years ("Red River," "He Walks by Night," "Act of Violence") has now been expanded to include a titleless documentary of street life in Spanish Harlem, shot entirely with a 16-millimeter sneak camera by Janice Loeb, Helen Levitt, and James Agee. The technique of documenting life in the raw with a concealed camera has often been tried out, in Hollywood and in experimental films, but never with much success until this small masterwork turned up. One problem was finding a camera either small enough to be hidden or made in such a way that it could be focused directly on the scene without being held to the operator's eye. The "Film Documents" group used an old model Cine-Kodak which records the action at a right angle to the operator who gazes into his scene-finder much as was done with the old-fashioned "Brownie." rector should study this picture if he wants to see really stealthy, queer-looking, odd-acting, foreboding people. Even the kids, whose antics make their elders look like a lost tribe of frozen zombies, act a bit like spies from the underground. Enigmatic and distrustful, a small boy watches the little colored girl (mentioned above) smear her features on the window; an older smart-alecky one slyly bats a flour stocking against the back of a teen-aged princess—the Mary Pickford of the neighborhood—carefully watching her every move to see if she's getting erotically excited. It is this very watchfulness which makes one part of the picture so brilliant: these kids must jeweler's-eye everything, and when the camera man (Agee) reveals himself, the space in front of the camera fills up with every kid in the neighborhood staring at the now bared camera like one Huge Eye.

To see what these kids will be like when they grow up, all we have to do is look at the shots of their parents. The watchfulness of youth has now become a total preoccupation—an evil-faced pimp, a Grant Wood spinster, a blowsy Irish dame picking at her teeth, are all forever staring at the world as though it were a dangerous, puzzling place filled with hidden traps. The great American outdoors, once a wide-open prairie for adventurers, is here, in one shrunken pocket of New York City, a place of possible terror to people who spend their time looking at it with 100-per-cent distrust.

"High Noon." A deftly fouled-up Western, starring Gary Cooper as a disillusioned marshal enforcing law and order in Hadleyville where everyone else is happily barricaded within his own avarice and cowardice. Carl Foreman's attempt to do an original cowboy script consists in starting the story at 10:40 a.m., ending it just after noon, and limiting the dramatic action to one situation: Gary Cooper walking silently and alone down the deserted streets looking for volunteer deputies. The contrived result: a movie which does take you into every part of the town and features Cooper's beautiful rolling gait, but which reveals that someone spent too much time over the drawing board conceiving dramatic camera shots to cover up the lack of story. Moral: the Kramer gang ("Champion," "The Men") is making too many films for its own good.

"The Marrying Kind." The story behind a sad little divorce suit told by the cut-back method, with the director (Cukor) using a sneak camera without putting any heart or belief into it. Cukor is a fine technician who has lately been imagining himself as an American Rossellini. The actors make Anna Magnani seem soft-spoken and even-tempered. Every camera set-up indoors shows you a person in a bathrobe, brassiere, or long underwear, poking his or her behind into the camera lens to prove that this is a candid movie. And there is the uncomfortable spectacle of Judy Holliday, a cautious and intelligent highbrow, squeezing herself into the dumb role of a Bronx yenta.

"The Fighter." Herbert Kline's romantic fight drama about an unpolished Mexican bolo-puncher, who earns five dollars a day as a sparring partner and works feverishly at night for the revolutionary cause of Zapata and Villa. An inept mixture of politics and hokum, set in the Rio Grande towns of 1910, which look as unreal as the backdrops on the old Keith circuit. Conte, the silky Italian star of bare-chest films, is a Mexican fizzle.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE New York City Opera Company, which has repeatedly undertaken to produce works that one would have thought beyond its resources and powers and has carried them off with sufficient, even when not complete, success, has now achieved its most remarkable feat of that kind with Alban Berg's "Wozzeck." After the performance I could agree with Virgil Thomson about the inadequacy of the single set and the inconsistency of the naturalistic staging with the expressionistic music; but during the performance I was not aware of them. Scenery and stage direction have been the weaknesses of almost all the City Center opera productions; by now I treat them as mere token frameworks on which are hung the musical performances that are usually very good; and in this instance too it was the performance of the formidable score that was the remarkable achievement. It was not a performance of the caliber and force of the New York Philharmonic's a year ago, and it was not without flaws—such as the excessive volume of sound that Rosenstock produced with the orchestra, which often made it impossible to hear the singers; or Patricia Neway's forced and strident high notes. But Marko Rothmüller's singing was effective, even without the beauty and varied expressive coloring of Mack Harrell's a year ago; the other singers were good; the orchestra had the competence required by its difficult task; and Rosenstock too proved able to produce a performance in which the music had a compelling expressive power undiminished for me by what I saw on the stage.

The other new opera produced by the company was Menotti's "Amahl and the Night Visitors." The mail has just brought me a sumptuous brochure from N. B. C. about the television premiere of the work, in which I read quotations not only of Toscanini telling Menotti "I think it is the best opera you have ever done," but of experts like Philip Hamburger writing "Musically, 'Amahl' struck me as being Menotti's finest work," and John Crosby pronouncing Menotti "a magnificent composer" and speaking of the "rare melodic sweetness" of the music—to say nothing of some gaudier products of other professional word-slingers. After all this dare I say that I listened to "Amahl," as I have listened to Menotti's other operas, with incredulous amazement—finding it difficult to believe I was really hearing these sugary, trashy tunes, that they could even have occurred to anyone operating as a serious composer today, that he could not have been too embarrassed by the mere thought of them to let anyone else hear them, and that other people could have considered them worth publishing to the world. At one time I would have felt the same incredulous amazement as I read the critical estimates I have quoted; but now I think I can account for them: once again

Menotti has used a dramatic idea whose development has so powerfully engaged the interest and emotions of his audience as to mislead even its professional members into thinking their interest and emotions were being powerfully engaged by the music. Moreover, his dramatic gifts don't stop with choice of subject, but extend to every detail of staging—which is to say that the audience's emotions have been engaged, and its musical judgment confused, by young Chet Allen. But one would expect the professional's ear to be proof against this sleight-of-hand.

Two friends have expressed to me their anger at the misrepresentation of the Sadler's Wells Theater Ballet to the American public; and one of them told me of seeing people walk out after the first piece and others besides himself and his family leave after the second; but my own depressing experience at the three performances I attended was to see everything, good and bad, indiscriminately applauded and cheered—from which I conclude that most of the American public didn't even know it had been fooled. The fact nevertheless is that this company is not even comparable in competence or achievement with the one that was here before, and that one wouldn't suspect from looking at it that it had even been trained in the same school. The leading dancers have a lot of raw technique which they haven't yet learned to use with the elegance that was the outstanding characteristic of the older company; some of the lesser dancers and the corps haven't even sufficient technique; and all this makes for poor performance of classical ballets. Elaine Fifeild, for example, is a vivacious, pert soubrette who can carry off the lively episodes of "Coppelia" successfully, but can do nothing in the great adagios beyond executing the movements; and her performance in "Swan Lake," together with the insipid choreography and the lifeless dancing of the corps, made this unquestionably the worst in my experience.

What the company danced well was its modern ballets; and of those I saw I liked best some early works of Frederick Ashton—the simple "Capriol Suite" (1930), the more richly textured "Rendezvous" (1933), and his comic masterpiece, "Façade" (1931). His divertissements to music of Act 2 of "The Nutcracker"—with the exception of the amusing Chinese dance—I cared less for. As for John Cranko, I liked best his comedy "Pineapple Poll," and least his compulsion to daring explicitness. As April."

This is a convenient point at which to speak briefly of the remaining two new works presented by the New York City Ballet. Ashton's "Picnic at Tintagel" I found uninteresting in invention except for a few details—the movements of the caretaker (Robert Barnett), the exquisite first part of the pas de deux of the lovers (Diana Adams and Jacques d'Amboise), before Ashton yields to his compulsion to daring explicitness. As for Tudor's "La Gloire," if even John Martin found it "impossible to report very happily upon it," I can dispense with comment altogether.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Was It a Witch Hunt . . .

Dear Sirs: Since you devoted so much space in the February 9 Nation to Mary Mostert's emotional account of the Memphis "witch hunt" against the Distributive, Processing, and Office Workers' Union, will you devote a little more to a few unadorned facts?

1. The D. P. O. was formed in October, 1950, through the fusion of the Food, Tobacco, and Agricultural Workers' Union and the United Office and Professional Workers' Union, both expelled from the C. I. O. for following the Communist Party line, with a number of New York department-store locals which seceded from the C. I. O.'s Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Union in 1948.

2. The head of the old F. T. A., now active in the D. P. O., is Donald Henderson, a long-time Communist who publicly resigned from the party on August 13, 1949, in order to comply with the Taft-Hartley law.

3. The leaders of the old department-store locals and now of the D. P. O. are Arthur Osman, president, and David Livingston, vice-president. On March 1, 1941, during the Hitler-Stalin pact, Osman wrote in the magazine New Voices that "President Roosevelt . . . is now sending your sons to war"; the following July 29, after Russia had been invaded, he did an about-face and exhorted the union's members to be "ready to lay down their lives so that Hitler . . . will be crushed." Livingston, according to the Daily Worker of October 18, 1943, was chairman of the meeting at which the Young Communist League reorganized as American Youth for Democracy. . . .

I think these facts suggest that the Memphis hearings may not have been so much of a "witch hunt" after all.
New York LAWRENCE SMITH

. . . Or Wasn't It?

Dear Sirs: I'm afraid Mr. Smith missed the point of my letter, which was not to prove that the D. P. O. was not Communist-dominated but simply to draw attention to the fact that the committee was denying the D. P. O. a fair and impartial hearing. Witnesses were denied legal counsel, and Negro witnesses were insulted. Senator Eastland made the hearings into a sounding board for his preconceived ideas about the D. P. O.

The fact that 1,400 members of the D. P. O. were threatened with "indictment" was an obvious attempt to intimidate them. There was nothing to indict them for. Not once was anyone accused of breaking a law. Senator Eastland, at the end of the hearings, promised to seek laws curbing "groups like the D. P. O.," but even if he had carried out his threat, constitutional provisions against ex-post-facto laws would prevent prosecution of the D. P. O. for past activities.

Mr. Smith points out that the leaders of the D. P. O. asked its members to "lay down their lives" to stop Hitler, after Russia entered the war. But what does this mean? Some people in this country changed their mind about Hitler's intentions after Poland was invaded, some after Czechoslovakia, some after Russia. It seems a bit ridiculous to condemn a man for a matter of timing.

It appears to me that since the D. P. O. won control of the two Memphis plants by a democratic, N. L. R. B.-controlled election, and since they were not accused of breaking any existing law, the hearings were, to say the least, a little silly. We may question the judgment of the 1,400 members of the D. P. O., but under a democratic system we have to accept it.

However, the important question is not the political affiliations of one small, relatively unimportant union but the precedent the Eastland subcommittee and others have been setting. In the hysterical times in which we live few of us realize the extent of the dictatorial power Congressional committees have assumed and the dangerous example they set. Once we allow Congress absolute power to "make or break" without regard for procedural safeguards, all our rights may be destroyed.

Memphis, Tenn. MARY MOSTERT

WHY I BELIEVE

all real liberals should be for TAFT

IN THE light of present events and changing comparative values how should we measure the stature of Robert A. Taft?

As a reader of The Nation for more than twenty-five years, and having been part of many liberal movements long before they found acceptance, I believe we should expand our perspective and reexamine the views of the present day Taft.

Much of the objection to Taft is an inheritance of former days for reasons which, by today's values, are petty and inapplicable. The opposition stems largely from unprincipled politicians, war mongers, and so-called labor leaders. They see the chaos their policies have created. In envy or in malice they have joined together to down a better man. First they say that Taft can't win. His wonderful showing in New Hampshire followed by his victories in other states show how weak their claim is. The results prove that Taft's vote is not a negative one, but an unswerving vote by a worried people. The results also deflate the Eisenhower myth of vote getting indispensability. By the way, what does Eisenhower stand for? Does anybody know? A man who has been in the military thirty years keeping his mouth shut and walking on eggs doesn't figure to change overnight into an able and courageous political leader. Some say he will blossom out after victory and will surprise us all. I truly hope that this will be the case, but let's be sensible. Why rely on a blind long shot in the Presidential derby when you can have a "man-of-war" running for you for the same price? Many who voted for Eisenhower in the primary are only carpet-bagger Republicans on loan from and will return to the Democratic fold in the fall, but the vote for Taft will stay Republican when it counts.

To vote for an Eisenhower or MacArthur or any all-out professional soldier flies in the face of American tradition. Staff-officer generals just cannot think of civilians in terms of equality, let alone superiority. Their ingrained extravagance and ignorance of the civilian is too much for a free people. Eisenhower himself decried the desirability of a military man for President, including himself. Although he is among the best of the lot, yet he figures to tighten the military noose around the neck of the American people. We often fail to see where we are going until after arrival, and then, it is too late. We are headed in the direction of making the military top dogs never to be unseated. Crisis, inflation, sacrifice, and war will become traditional to the American way of life, like apple pie. This condition is already here, with the possible exception that maybe Taft can stop and somewhat reverse the process. This to me is the main issue. There are other substantial issues, too, which Taft alone shows a willingness to tackle.

The Truth About the Taft-Hartley Law

The false hue and cry that Taft-Hartley is a slave-labor law is one of the big lies of all times. This act is the greatest boon to freedom since Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation. I have heard many discussions of the act by liberals, politicians, and labor leaders. Not one, including Senator Douglas and Mr. Goldberg, Counsel for the C. I. O., analyzed the law in detail. The reason is they don't dare. The acts that result in slave labor today are unions with their closed shops, their jurisdictional strikes, their unreasonable secondary boycotts, their lack of democratic process, their strong-arm lifetime elections to office, their feather-bedding, their limiting the number of workers, their misuse of union funds, and their exemption of judicial review over many of their arbitrary acts. The heart of the Taft-Hartley law is the union shop and against the closed shop. All other parts are secondary. The union shop guarantees to everybody the right to work without fawning before or bribing a labor boss which unfortunately has been all too much the practice. There is something wrong with the law, and that is, it does not go far enough. It should also be extended to every bottleneck and restraint in business, the trades, and the professions. I have never heard a politician or liberal who had the nerve to state that the American people have no right to a job in any chosen field, and that the labor leaders had a right to say who works and where. Labor leaders want that right and would have it but for the Taft-Hartley Law. I speak with some special experience on the subject. For years I was a special attorney for the Chicago Federation of Labor and Labor's Radio Station WCFL when Ed Neckels was secretary and John Fitzpatrick was president. During this time I handled court litigation of considerable importance. I also represented labor before the Illinois Appellate Court. I volunteered my services for free because labor needed help. As it became rich, powerful, and arrogant, some leaders showed an increasing contempt for the worker and the American people. All labor leaders were not like that, but many dared not talk. There is more support among the rank and file of labor and in their intelligent leaders for this law than the ruling labor bureaucracy has awakened to.

Inflation is Confiscation Without Compensation

On the problem of inflation it is impossible to find language descriptive enough to fit the crime. Inflation has dealt a more mortal and lasting blow than did Pearl Harbor. Inflation is nothing but outright robbery. It is cannibalism in the economic field. It is a combination of aggressive and speculative elements to devour the aged, young, frugal, white-collared, and unorganized groups. If inflation to enrich and empower the speculator, the military, and the bureaucracy is right, then so were Hitler and Stalin who did the same. Those in this country who so gleefully join in robbing one group through inflation, will yet be the victims of being robbed in turn by other groups which are a-coming.

Taft has a respect for constitutional law. To some peace holds more terror than war, but not for Taft. He lacks the itch for war especially the illegal kind we now have. He would not treat the constitutional limitations as another scrap of paper. Taft does not figure to follow the primrose path of perpetual war for perpetual peace and prosperity resulting in perpetuity in office. I press his case on liberals because as a class they have no vested interest to foster. Historically, they were identified with the right and wrong by conviction. Liberals carry a tremendous influence. Today all too many are prisoners of their own prejudices, prior vested thoughts; and some new-found fat.

Taft stands out as the one most indispensable man, without a competitor on the American scene. These views are not political puffs; they are not the results of huckster exaggerations. I sincerely believe I understate the man's worth. Taft is not everything each one of us wants, but let's be rewarded, that in his honesty there is hope, in his frankness there is confidence, in his modesty there is comfort, in his native courage there is leadership and in peace there is life.

All comments from readers are of course welcomed.

Cedars of Lebanon

Los Angeles

THE first in a series of full-page advertisements published January 23 in the Hollywood trade papers announced, with a dignity rarely matched in the bombastic movieland press, the beginning of the fund-raising campaign for the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital. Under the legend, "Keep This Door Open," the hospital was likened to "the sheltering groves of cedars of ancient Lebanon," where a helping hand, peace, and comfort awaited the sick and troubled "no matter whence they came, over what road they traveled."

But the doors which, according to the advertisement, were "open wide to the sick, regardless of ability to pay and irrespective of race or creed," have been closed for political reasons to three staff doctors since the beginning of the year.

The chairman of the board of trustees, Ben R. Meyer, who is also president of the Union Bank and Trust Company, is credited with instigating the removal of the three prominent doctors. At least no one else is willing to claim the honor, and the influence of "Uncle Ben"—as he is called in banking circles—over the hospital trustees is such that the institution is frequently referred to as "Mr. Meyer's hospital."

All three of the banned physicians were recently involved in publicity which "Uncle Ben" would certainly regard as unfavorable. Dr. Murray Abowitz, a specialist in internal medicine and former head of the Cedars arthritis clinic, was front-page news last fall when he appeared as an "unfriendly witness" at the House Un-American Activities subcommittee hearings in Los Angeles; Dr. Alexander Pennes, a radiologist, was also mentioned in testimony at that time and has been subpoenaed for a future hearing in Los Angeles; and Dr. Richard W. Lippman, founder of the kidney-disease clinic and a Guggenheim Fellow, briefly made the news columns when he confirmed the diagnosis of a prison doctor attending a defendant in the current trial of fifteen Communist leaders. Since his dismissal Dr. Lippman has been honored by the United States Public Health Service, which awarded him a $12,000 grant for two years' research in his special field, and by his colleagues, who elected him chairman of the Southern California chapter of the Society for Experimental Biology and Medicine.

The three men had participated in a vigorous and successful fight against the Burns-Tenney bills introduced in the state legislature last year to extend loyalty oaths to dozens of professions licensed by the state. They had protested also the issuance of subpoenas to doctors and lawyers summoned by the House committee and were on record against other invasions of personal freedom.

At the end of last year—with the House committee headed back to Los Angeles and the Cedars building-fund campaign in prospect—the three doctors were simply not reappointed. Hospital authorities insisted that the action was "routine." They said that staff members were dropped every year for a variety of reasons which, out of solicitude for the doctors concerned, were never revealed or made the subject of hearings. Any grievance, they announced, could be taken up with the County Medical Association. In February, after a joint lay-medical committee recommended approval of the "routine" action of the trustees, the hospital's Medical Executive Committee endorsed it as "legal."

Patients, community leaders, organizations of many kinds, and the generally conservative Anglo-Jewish press have entered a vehement protest based, in many instances, not on a defense of the trio's politics, but on the irrelevance of a doctor's political opinions to his right to practice his profession. But the hospital has remained firm. Board members refused to accept registered mail from the dismissed physicians, ignored all pleas for a hearing, and failed to answer requests for factual information.

While continuing to deny that political motives exist, the hospital authorities are showing just how political a medical institution can become. At a meeting called by two of the institution's most eminent physicians, about 200 staff members heard the ousted trio present their case, and agreed to press the medical executive committee for a staff hearing. The next day a doctor who had spoken on behalf of the dismissed doctors was severely rebuked by the chief of staff. Another sympathetic doctor, refused a bed for a patient, was reminded that his first "loyalty" should be to the hospital. A recently promoted staff member explained he could not sign the doctors' petition for reinstatement for fear of his appointment being canceled. Others expressed fear of reprisals and intimidation, either in denial of bed privileges for their patients or dismissal from the staff.

The hospital's devotion to its mission was underscored when Dr. Lippman, summoned for consultations on two cases by attending physicians, was refused admittance to the patients' rooms. It is impossible, of course, to know whether Dr. Lippman might have saved the patients; the fact is that they died.

The Los Angeles Jewish Community Council, representing more than sixty member agencies, some of which directly support the Cedars of Lebanon clinical program, has attempted a reconciliation between the dismissed doctors and the hospital. Since February 21 a committee of eight leading citizens, charged with investigating the facts of the eviction, has diligently applied itself to its serious task. It is the only group which has succeeded in meeting with the hospital's lay and medical executives, which is no small accomplishment in itself.

Last week the Community Council recommended that the trustees grant the three doctors a hearing. In the face of the hospital's previous insistence that the County Medical Association offered adequate grievance procedure, the recommendation has been hailed as a significant victory by supporters of the ousted trio.

As the Cedars experiment in political anesthesia may drag on through many more months of debate and possible court action, the Community Council might meanwhile get from the trustees an indication of the extent to which political standards will guide future admittances to the hospital. Will the "sick and troubled" be the next victims?

PREMIER DE GASPERI'S UNDISPUTED SKILL IN political maneuver is being put to a severe test by the approaching provincial and municipal elections in central and southern Italy. His position is much more difficult than in last summer's vote in the north, which gave the Christian Democrats the full benefit of an amended electoral law aimed, as in France, at cutting down the representation of the Left. There the rival group on the Right, the neo-fascist Italian Social Movement, was not a real competitor and De Gasperi's party could easily absorb its votes and obtain the two-thirds majority of the councils insured under the new law. In the south and center, on the contrary, he finds himself without allies on the Right and facing a strong Communist-Left-Socialist coalition. De Gasperi could not ally himself with the extreme Right without provoking a storm in his own party ranks. In any case, the neo-Fascists, whose strength has increased in accordance with the general trend in Europe, want to demonstrate their power as a separate party. So De Gasperi was forced to try to patch up the coalition of Christian Democrats, Republicans, Liberals, and right-wing Socialists, but the effort collapsed as the result of Republican and Socialist opposition. Now the government party faces an electoral battle on two fronts, without effective allies, against the obstacle of public disappointment over De Gasperi's failure on Trieste and his equally embarrassing failure to produce the $680,000,000 he was supposed to have brought back from Washington.

A PERCEPTIVE AND COURAGEOUS ADDRESS on the State of the Church was presented last week at the opening session of the quadrennial general conference of the Methodist Church, meeting in San Francisco. Most noteworthy is the manner in which the seventy bishops, who gave their unanimous approval to the document, relate foreign and domestic issues. "It is not Russia," reads the statement, "that is our real enemy but the evils in modern society which Russia falsely offers to eradicate." Emphatic in its renunciation of communism, the message boldly asserts that "our real problem turns out to be not communism but revolution"; everywhere humanity is in revolt against poverty, famine, and exploitation. And the right conclusion is unhesitatingly drawn: a policy of military containment is "morally fallacious" and should be rejected. The message then points out the domestic consequences of this policy: "concerted and often vicious efforts to regiment thought and curb freedom of speech" in politics, education, and religion. Not at all intimidated by a recent report of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the message contains an unapologetic defense of the Methodist Federation for Social Action and takes to task those who seek to declare "out of bounds" any Methodist, layman or minister, who dares to think independently on issues concerning the current social and economic order. Delivered by Bishop Paul B. Kern of Nashville, the message should encourage all those who resent current efforts to restrict traditional American freedoms.

BRITAIN'S ANNUAL ECONOMIC SURVEY WAS originated by the Labor Government as an important part of the machinery of planning. Its purpose was to assess total national resources and to budget their distribution. In the beginning, perhaps, the blueprints were too detailed and too rigid, making insufficient allowance for changing conditions. Now the first Tory contribution, the work of reluctant converts to planning, goes to the other extreme, being designed to do no more than explain the facts of the economic situation as a "background" to consideration of government policies. A final section does, however, set forth an attenuated balance sheet showing that even if the "hope" of a $700,000,000 increase in national output is realized, total resources available for personal consumption and investment will decline by a similar figure owing to increased government expenditure on defense, larger exports, and diminished imports. Since total personal consumption is expected to remain at the 1951 level, there must be a cut of $700,000,000 in investment. The survey states that this cut will be divided between fixed capital and inventories but provides no detailed information about the industries that will be affected. Again, while properly putting great emphasis on Britain's need for redressing its trade balance, the survey is surprisingly vague about ways and means. As the London Daily Mirror of April 23 comments: "The survey admits that exports will be

THE APPOINTMENT OF GAEL SULLIVAN AS Kefauver's campaign manager lends added interest to the Tennessean's vigorous try for the Democratic Presidential nomination. Mr. Sullivan brings to the undertaking a sure knowledge of how political machines are run—indispensable to the chances of any would-be nominee—and much besides. It is an open secret that he broke with Mr. Truman and resigned as acting chairman of the Democratic National Committee because of his preference for Justice William O. Douglas as the 1948 candidate. Four years later Justice Douglas still represents Mr. Sullivan's ideal choice for the Presidency. Imaginative, dynamic, a strong civil libertarian committed by temperament and conviction to the Roosevelt concepts, Gael Sullivan has taken a leave of absence from his post as Executive Director of Theater Owners of America to back Kefauver in a fight for the return of the country to democratic principles and practices. If, together, they will work out a program that offers a real challenge to the Republicans, they have a unique opportunity to rally behind them the independent vote. The basic danger today is that, given little to choose between the platforms of the parties, people will decide not to use their franchise at all.

SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS, WHO DIED LAST week after a long and characteristically courageous struggle against a combination of painful maladies, brought to British politics one of the finest minds of the generation. Superficial observers, indeed, were sometimes so impressed by his mental capacity that they saw him as a kind of mechanical brain, efficient but soulless. Actually, the scope of his intellect and the clarity of his thought were matched by an unshakable integrity and a passionate concern for social justice. Cripps had, it is true, a full share of British reserve: he was not an easy man to know. Yet beneath the rather frosty exterior there was real warmth, a fact attested by his popularity in his constituency—a Bristol working-class district—and the kind of devotion he won from the very able group of M.P.'s and civil servants he gathered about him at the Treasury. If Cripps never commanded the easy affection of the crowd, he did gain an unusual measure of public respect. When he became Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1947, the British recovery effort was faltering. He took vigorous steps to speed up production and exports while warding off inflation by the austerity measures which will always be associated with his name. Such measures were bound to be unpopular. Nevertheless, Cripps's sincerity, together with his lucid expositions of economic necessities, carried conviction and he won an amazing degree of cooperation. Trade unionists in particular responded to his appeals for restraint in wage demands because they realized that his policies were genuinely designed to achieve equality of sacrifice and that his aim was to strengthen the economy so it could bear the weight of the welfare state. His strength failed before he could complete the task, but the foundations he laid are likely to prove a durable monument to his ideals.

ENGLEWOOD, NEW JERSEY, CONTINUES TO be "our town in turmoil" (see The Nation, June 16, 1951). Mary McLeod Bethune, president emeritus of Bethune-Cookman College, president of the National Council of Negro Women, vice-president of the N. A. A. C. P. and the Urban League, was scheduled to speak in the local junior high school at a meeting sponsored by the women's auxiliary of the Henry Douglas Post of the American Legion. In response to protests filed by the Englewood Anti-Communist League, the Board of Education notified the sponsors that permission to hold the meeting would be revoked unless within forty-eight hours Mrs. Bethune refuted the charge that she had been a member of several "front" organizations. The sponsors "indefinitely postponed" the meeting, and Mrs. Bethune spoke in a local church instead. Of the current batch of free-speech incidents, this is perhaps, the most significant. Ever since 1947, the chief minority-defense organizations have insisted on differentiating between "civil rights" and "civil liberties." In an editorial on Rights and Liberties (July 22, 1950), we pointed to this distinction as unrealistic and dangerous. Mrs. Bethune's concern for "civil rights" has precipitated still another "civil liberties" issue. Will the important minority-defense organizations now join with the American Civil Liberties Union in an effort to induce Englewood's Board of Education to rescind, as utterly un-American, a policy of automatically banning speakers whose names have been listed in the index of the various state and federal committees investigating so-called un-American activities? This is the crux of the matter.

THIS YEAR THE UNITED NATIONS WAS MADE the major target of the 61st Continental Congress of the D. A. R. With virtually no debate, the 5,000 beribboned delegates demanded that Congress keep tight pursestrings on all specialized agencies of the United Nations; called for an investigation of the affront to the Stars and Stripes implicit in the hoisting at Atlantic Fleet Headquarters of "an international flag"; reiterated their opposition to any effort to bring about even partial world government through the United Nations; charged that the safety of the United States was endangered by "the futile policy of appeasement by the United Nations in Korea"; and denounced the use of UNESCO booklets in the public schools. The delegates cheered to the echo violent denunciations of the United Nations by Senator William E. Jenner and Representative John T. Wood, to whom the U. N. Charter is a "crime perpetrated against us by a coterie composed of out-and-out minions of Soviet Russia, pro-British Fabian Socialists, Rhodes Scholars, and just plain traitors to America." D. A. R. resolutions are traditionally ritualistic; but this year's batch is alarming evidence of the growth of the campaign, launched a year or so ago in the know-nothing press, to "get the U. S. out of the U. N. and the U. N. out of the U. S." A portion of the $20,000 appropriated to carry on its campaign against subversive activities might well be used by the D. A. R. to find out who is subverting its own policies and by what means. Mrs. Roosevelt's comment is also to the point: "I know that many fine people are members of the D. A. R. . . . but I believe that we are living in an era too dangerous for any group . . . to pass resolutions without careful study."

GENERAL HOYT S. VANDENBERG, AIR FORCE Chief of Staff, has dismissed the "sitdown strike" of reserve officers at Randolph and Mather Air Bases as "a tempest in a teapot." Nevertheless, there is reason to suppose that the Pentagon is seriously disturbed by this development which involves several hundred men, many of them with distinguished combat records, who have asked to be relieved from flying duties. The trouble seems to have varied roots—nervous wives, reductions in "hazard pay," a high accident rate (eight B-29's have crashed at Randolph since August, 1950). But there also appears to be tension between the regular officers in charge of the Air Training Program and the reservists, some of whom complain that they are shipped off to Korea while "incompetent" regulars, many of whom have never gone overseas, enjoy safe jobs at home. For the air force to yield to the "strikers" would, as Vandenberg has said, be unfair to those on duty in Korea. Moreover, no military organization can tolerate flat refusal to obey orders. On the other hand, an unwilling pilot can hardly inspire confidence in the crew for whose lives he is responsible. Immediately, the air force is trying to stop the rot by severe measures. One officer was sentenced to two years' imprisonment after the prosecutor told the court martial: "If you don't sentence this man there will be a general exodus from the service." It is doubtful whether such steps will check an obvious deterioration in morale and the air force will be well advised to supplement them with a sympathetic inquiry into grievances. Unless it does so, it may find its whole expansion program threatened by lack of pilots.

THE BAN AGAINST THE BUILDING OF NEW television stations that has been in force for the past three and a half years (see The Nation, February 16, 1952) has finally been lifted by the Federal Communications Commission. The order provides for the opening of 2,053 new stations in 1,291 communities and sets aside 242 channels—an increase of 33 over the figure tentatively established in 1951—for the exclusive use of non-commercial, educational interests. Commissioner Frieda B. Hennock, who played a key role in the fight to reserve channels for educational television, filed a partial dissent on the ground that the number of outlets reserved for educational use is inadequate. No educational channels, she points out, have been reserved for about one-fourth of the metropolitan communities, including Youngstown, Ohio, with a population of 325,000. On the other hand, the Joint Committee on Educational Television, representing seven national educational groups, is apparently satisfied with the order. Actually, because 162 of the channels cannot be picked up on Very High Frequency sets, which make up all but a small fraction of the 17 million instruments now in use, the number of channels allocated for educational purposes will be reduced to a third until Ultra High Frequency owners can afford a converter or a VHF set. All things considered, however, the number of outlets reserved for educational use is probably as large as could be expected at this time. It is now up to the educators to take advantage of the opportunity to acquire TV outlets. If the 242 channels reserved for educational use are not allocated within the year, the pressure to reclassify them for commercial use will be very great indeed.

LAST YEAR UNIVERSITY OF CINCINNATI students decided to hold a mock political convention—without consulting Senator Taft. An emissary from the Taft forces immediately notified the student committee, and the administration, that the convention would be "political dynamite" unless some assurance could be given in advance that the Senator would receive a sizable majority in the popularity poll. The students explained, with patience and tact, that although Republican conventions might be fixed in this way, mock student conventions could not be so easily manipulated. The unidentified politician thereupon declared that he would speak to Ben Tate, treasurer of the Taft campaign, who is a member of the board of directors of the university. Later the administration announced that the value of the convention would not justify the amount of time and work it would require. For nearly a year the student committee loyally acquiesced to the president's request that they should not explain why the convention had been abandoned. But William Smart, retiring president of the campus Y. M. C. A. group, recently decided to tell the student body what had happened. "All year," he said, "this question has bothered me. . . . After much consideration I felt an open statement should be made. . . . This sort of thing should not have happened. Maybe it can be prevented in the future. . . . It is up to the students to prepare for this fight for democracy right now." Senator Taft, we feel sure, was not aware of what happened a year ago; but he should find some way, even at this late date, of making his position clear—as by requesting that the students be given a chance to express their preferences in a campus poll.

IT IS NO LONGER NEWS THAT BOOKS BY Protestants criticizing the Catholic Church for its more worldly activities are handled gingerly by editors, who subscribe to a distressing degree to the Hollywood cult of NOA, or Not Offending Anybody—its negative sound is all too appropriate. One might expect that they would be braver about a book by a Catholic criticizing the church on the same grounds, namely Thomas Sugrue's "A Catholic Speaks His Mind on America's Religious Conflict," especially since it criticizes Protestants as well. But No—or rather NOA. Both the Herald Tribune Books and the New York Times Book Review not only gave the book to Catholics for review—in itself unexceptionable—but selected reviewers who seemed more concerned with Mr. Sugrue's subjective state of mind than with the objective issues his book was obviously designed to raise. Mr. Sugrue himself was referring to these two reviews, among others, when in a rather bitter speech the other day he said, "They had to eject me from the group in the eyes of that group." Certainly the reviews we have cited were designed to ground his criticisms, not to confront them or further their discussion.

A Time to Bargain

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

ONE can safely assume that the swift rise of military power in the West was responsible for Moscow's latest proposals for the unification of Germany. It may have been responsible, too, for the sudden crisis in the truce talks at Panmunjom. Moscow undoubtedly fears above everything else the creation of an integrated, armed, Atlantic coalition embracing Western Germany. To prevent this by every available means would appear to be the chief object of Soviet diplomacy, justifying in their eyes even such extreme expedients as support for a German national army; justifying also, perhaps, the risk of a revived and expanded war in Korea to divert American material, men, and attention from Europe to Asia. Secretary Acheson's description of the Soviet offers on Germany as "apples of discord" thrown among the Allies therefore was apt. But when he and President Truman and other Western leaders go on to argue that because the Kremlin is doing its best to delay and obstruct Allied military plans its offers are "phony," their logic goes haywire and their own intentions become suspect. Under what circumstances, we wonder, is an offer more likely to be genuine than when made under pressure of well-founded fear? And what is all this Western integration and rearmament about if not to stimulate proposals for the negotiated settlement of outstanding issues?

The real Western objection to the Moscow offers is not that they are phony but that they are almost certainly sincere—that Russia, in order to demolish the grand strategy of the Atlantic alliance, is actually ready to permit the reunion of Germany under a freely elected central authority. And this is something that the West will not tolerate for it would mean shifting the whole emphasis of Atlantic policy from military containment to diplomatic negotiation. For such a change, the American leaders of the Western coalition are not ready.

But since they are none the less committed to the principle of German unity, they cannot be frank in their comments on, or answers to, the Russian notes. They must pretend to favor what they actually oppose and limit themselves to detailed objections which, under the circumstances, are without interest or validity. And this is most unfortunate, for if the Allied leaders were not trapped in their own contradictions they could say some pertinent things about the proper means of securing free elections and also about Moscow's dangerous plan to revive German military power. As it is, their words carry a false echo and their position has been seriously undermined, as Moscow obviously intended. The results are apparent both to Bonn and the Atlantic alliance itself.

In Germany the anti-Adenauer elements, increasing in number and influence, have been given new proof that integration in the NATO structure will end the prospect of German unity for the foreseeable future. In Western Europe as a whole, fear of armed Russian attack has largely disappeared; even top Allied military leaders discount an early invasion. So the view that every Moscow overture must be automatically rebuffed—never popular among our allies—and the further view that Germany's inclusion in the defense system is an overriding necessity have suffered severe deflation. Europeans are more and more inclined to believe that Moscow is ready to pay a real price in return for real concessions. Even assuming the Kremlin's purposes to be unalterably hostile, if it has resigned itself to achieving them through political and social struggle rather than atom war most Europeans would gladly gamble on the chance of defeating them the same way. And meanwhile an easing of tension would permit economic improvements and a consequently firmer political fabric.

While Mr. Acheson signals full speed ahead in the talks with Bonn, so that the Contractual Agreement can be signed by May 15, complications multiply. The new strength of the opposition, even in his own party, drove Chancellor Adenauer to point out last week that the agreement would be subject to change if unification were to be achieved—a statement that revived every French doubt about the security of a German alliance. The collapse of Paris-Bonn negotiations on the Saar further threatened the whole relationship, in spite of frantic intervention by Britain and the United States. And in the Pentagon, as this week began, anxious talks were going on in an effort to prevent a showdown at Panmunjom which might mean the renewal of active fighting—with consequences beyond calculation.

THERE is only one sane answer to this series of events, and it must come from Washington. America should accept the logic of its power and its professed philosophy. If the President and Secretary honestly regard the defense program as an instrument to force Moscow into making concessions rather than threats, they should treat the German-unity proposals as a victory, a step along the road we say we want to go. They should agree to negotiate—which is to say, bargain—on Germany, knowing they have high cards and need not be outmaneuvered. They should keep their fingers crossed but shed their inferiority complex. They should never find the moment inopportune for talk; what they might lose in the momentum of war preparation they would gain in the equally vital asset of human confidence. To go on rejecting every new chance of contact or conciliation is to create an impression unjustly favorable to Moscow, spreading the Kremlin's gospel that the United States wants to overthrow Soviet power, rather than merely to check it, and by military and economic might to dominate the world.

An election year is a poor time to ask for common sense. Any hint that the Administration intended to examine Russian offers soberly or to initiate peace moves itself would certainly be seized by the jingo lunatics and turned to their own destructive ends. But we continue to believe that such people are few, though well heeled and able to make much trouble in proportion to their numbers. We believe the mood of the ordinary citizens of this country—each with one vote—is better expressed by the Methodist declaration quoted on page 413. If any real break in the world deadlock could be brought about between now and November, the power of the McCarthyite fringe would vanish overnight and the men responsible would be hailed as peacemakers, not appeasers.

The Moscow Trade Conference

BY JOHN BOYD-ORR

[Lord Boyd-Orr, former head of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization and a Nobel Peace Prize winner in 1949, played a leading role at the International Economic Conference in Moscow as a member of the British delegation. His story, written exclusively for The Nation, was dispatched from Moscow on the day after the conference closed.]

Moscow, April 13

THERE are two different views on the origin of the International Economic Conference which closed here yesterday. According to one, it was promoted by a Communist-dominated Peace Council as an instrument of propaganda. In support of this view are the facts that the council did propose such a conference and that Moscow was chosen as its site. According to the other view, the conference was promoted primarily by economists with no political ax to grind. Supporting this is the fact that the initiating committee, which met at Copenhagen, refused to permit Peace Council representatives to participate in organizing the conference and that the Rules of Procedure, as finally adopted, forbade any reference to the relative merits of different economic and political systems (a prohibition which was rigidly enforced). As for the choice of Moscow as the site, the initiating committee explains that Russia was the only country which guaranteed visas to delegates from all countries.

The conference was attended by 470 delegates. The British delegation of thirty-two consisted of about half a dozen members of Parliament, another half-dozen academic economists from Oxford, Cambridge, Birmingham, and Glasgow universities, two or three representatives of trade unions, about a dozen business men, and three or four people accompanying delegates. So far as I could make out, the delegations from other Western countries comprised a similar mixture of economists and business men. Politically they were also mixed, though the British delegation had no Communists. The French, for instance, included De Gaullists, Radicals, and Communists. The delegates from the Communist countries were either representatives of official trade organizations or university professors of economics. The leader of the Russian delegation is chairman of the Moscow Chamber of Commerce.

The speeches at the plenary and in the various panels were non-political, dealing mainly with economic conditions in the country of the speaker—the extent of unemployment and the reasons for it, shortages of raw materials or the lack of orders for export, inflation and the rising cost of living, the goods which the country could export and the goods which it wished to import.

A good deal of business was done. The meetings had to be adjourned for two days to leave the business men free to make their deals. The British delegation made agreements for the export of goods, mainly textiles and footwear, to the extent of £16,000,000 ($44,800,000) against the import of goods of approximately equal value consisting mainly of food, livestock feed, glassware, and other consumer goods. Other transactions of about an equal amount were discussed, but on the last day of the conference agreement had not been reached on prices or was delayed because samples were not available. The biggest British transactions were with Russia and China.

If the direct contact of business men and representatives of trade organizations had the same result with other delegations as it had with the British, the conference must have substantially increased international trade. All transactions were negotiated within the existing framework of political and economic restrictions so that nothing should prevent their successful completion.

The export of goods, especially textiles, from Britain will help to reduce the rising unemployment which has been causing alarm to manufacturing firms and trade unions, and the imports will help to prevent the deterior-

A British Reaction

Many interpretations of the [Moscow trade] conference are possible. It can be seen as an attempt to drive a wedge between the United States and her allies, or as a means of organizing fairly large business deals that might otherwise have encountered technical difficulties. It is possible also to see in it a gesture of conciliation. Within the U. S. S. R., as in other countries, there are many different strands of policy; and at the same time as the most violent propaganda is launched against the United States and her allies a more constructive effort may be made to improve relations by expanding trade. The conference could easily have been used to pass resolutions against strategic trade restrictions, and such resolutions might have found vociferous supporters in the west. . . . The fact that no such resolution was put was some indication that the object of the conference was not to score a point or to sow dissension but to keep open the road to a better understanding.—The Times of London.

ration in the food position which has been causing discontent among housewives. If similar benefits are obtained for the other participants, the conference will have helped both business and the standard of living.

The political significance of the conference is difficult to assess. Though politics did not enter into the discussions, the fact that delegates from more than forty countries met in Moscow is a political factor of some importance. Further, the conversations not only between delegates outside the conference but also with Russian citizens in the subways, in the shops, and in the hotels, when one could find a Russian interpreter, offered some opportunity to correct the wrong impression most of the people seemed to have about conditions in Britain and America. On the other hand, delegates from Western countries got a better idea of life in Russia. Such direct contact of people from countries with different cultures and historical backgrounds should help to bring about a better understanding. I suggested to the leader of the Russian delegation that his government should adjust the present absurd rate of exchange of four rubles to the dollar to twenty, and offer visas to 100,000 British and American visitors, and send an equal number of Russians to Western countries to see for themselves.

The conference resolved to set up a permanent committee to make arrangements for another meeting next year to be held in a country willing to give visas to all delegates. India was suggested by some. The expenses of the committee are to be met by voluntary contributions, the largest being expected from firms which have done most business. It also resolved to ask the General Assembly of the United Nations to convene a conference of government-appointed business men and economists, with the addition of private citizens, for a free discussion of how to bring about a rapidly expanding universal economy which could deal with the greatly increased industrial potential of the world. [According to France Presse, the permanent committee includes Paul Bastid, former French Minister of Commerce and for many years editor of the ultra-conservative Paris daily, L'Aurore; Felipe Florencia Freyre of Argentina; Jack Perry, director of a British textile firm, and Oliver Vickery, San Francisco industrialist.]

The general impression of the British delegates is that the conference succeeded far beyond their expectations. Some of the business done might eventually have passed through normal channels but other transactions would never have taken place without the direct meeting and bargaining of representatives of business firms and organizations. The contacts established are being maintained and extended so that the trade done at the conference itself may be only the first fruits of expanding international trade, which is good for business and good for the people of all countries.

President Truman is reported to have said some time ago that if we of the West could discuss with the Russians our mutual interest in agriculture it would be easier to discuss some of the other questions which divide us. But it is difficult for discussions on business to take place at government level without politics entering in. The success of this conference suggests that if in all countries the politicians who deal with foreign affairs were given a well-earned long holiday, and business men were given more freedom to develop international trade on business lines, the resulting increase in economic prosperity and rise in the standard of living throughout the world would help to lessen the present dangerous political tension.

Knight of the Crescent

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

IF TRAGEDY had not cast its shadow over everything connected with the Spain of today, one could enjoy the spectacle of Generalissimo Dictator Franco stepping onto the world stage costumed as the Knight of the Crescent. For this newly emerged friend of the Arabs spent most of his military career slaughtering Moors, in training for his later occupation of slaughtering Spaniards.

It was in 1921, when the military disaster of Melilla had led the commanding general Fernandez Silvestre to blow his brains out, that the "Tercio Extranjero" was created—a kind of Spanish Foreign Legion which attracted to its ranks the toughest sort of adventurers from every country. Major Franco was chosen to head the Tercio. Throughout the following years of struggle against Abd-el Krim, the fierce chieftain of the bellicose tribe of the Beniurriagel who had proclaimed himself Sultan, Franco became notorious for his barbaric cruelty. Abd-el Krim himself was hardly a model military leader and the freedom of such Spanish war prisoners as escaped death had to be "bought" in a famous transaction carried out by the Basque banker Echevarrieta on behalf of the Spanish government. But the Spanish atrocities in Morocco, in large part the work of Franco's legion, were denounced by the Arabs in horrifying postcards showing the heads of Moors being carried on the bayonets of the soldiers of "El Tercio." They were denounced with equal bitterness by courageous Spaniards, both in Parliament and in memorable writings such as the open letter to the King by the great Miguel de Unamuno. In fact the chief motive behind the coup d'état which established General Primo de Rivera as dictator in 1923 was to prevent the discussion by Parliament of General Picasso's sensational report exposing—with severe damage to Alfonso's reputation—the shame of the Moroccan campaign. The fact that this report was written by an active general shows that the army as a whole did not identify itself with the behavior of officers like Franco.

As the result of the coup, the King won eight years' respite only to fall, together with his dynasty, in 1931. Franco, on the contrary, was spared by a soft Republican regime, even though in October, 1934, he had brought Moorish troops to Asturias to smash the miners' revolt. Now he emerges as the "friend of Islam" and is accepted as such by Arab politicians—although there must be some Moslems who still recall the day Franco insulted all Islam by riding his horse into the mosque of Xauen.

SEVERAL events during the last United Nations Assembly confirmed the trend inaugurated by the 1949 visit to Spain of the late King Abdullah of Jordan. There was the interview with the Secretary General of the Arab League, Azzam Pasha, in the falangist paper El Pueblo, which stressed the fact that "the Arab countries and Spain together hold the greater part of the Mediterranean coast" and that consequently Spain was an important factor in any project looking toward a Mediterranean Pact. And it was in the course of a lavish reception at the Franco Embassy in Paris for the Arab delegates that French diplomats discovered, not without concern, the seriousness with which Franco took his role as mediator between the Moslem world and the West.

When it became evident at the NATO conference in Lisbon that, in spite of secret promises of American support for a tighter integration of Spain into the Atlantic community the doors of NATO remained firmly closed to the Spanish regime—mainly because of the opposition of France and the Scandinavian countries—Franco's plans to cement and exploit Arab-Spanish friendship were pushed ahead with all possible speed. The diplomacy of Madrid, which had previously concentrated on gaining acceptance of Spain as a permanent Western ally and not simply an auxiliary aid in the anti-Russian strategy, was now directed by a single thought—to increase its bargaining power with Washington.

This became essential for several reasons. One of these was Madrid's preoccupation with the morale of the army. No matter what tales are told to Americans by their various services in Spain, the truth is that disaffection in the army is mounting. One of the most effective weapons of the opposition is the argument that Franco is ready to sell the country to the United States for the hundreds of millions of dollars needed to repair the damage done to Spain's economy by his regime's incompetence and corruption. The army has lately proved very sensitive to that suggestion. Generals who after thirteen years are tired of having Franco as absolute master, generals who have failed to enrich themselves like the big estraperlistas in uniform, honorable officers who put Spain first, not to mention the great number of Republicans serving as simple conscripts—all these constitute a menace to the regime if the army comes to regard the arrangements with America as a mercenary deal compromising the sovereignty of Spain rather than as an alliance between equals.

It is true that Franco's prestige—and consequently his price—had been inflated by the attentions showered upon him by over-generous Americans. Those innumerable pilgrimages of Senators, Representatives, generals, admirals, and newspaper editors to the Palacio del Pardo had persuaded the Spanish dictator that the United States considered him its most valuable potential ally. This belief was reinforced by all the talk in the American press about Spanish divisions and bases, widely reproduced in the falangist press. Today Franco doubtless considers himself the most important European chieftain in the crusade against communism. But in order to maintain that role, his claims had to be substantiated by something more than pure bluff. For this purpose he depended upon two cards—Portugal and the Arab world.

At their joint meeting on the Spanish-Portuguese border on April 14, the two dictators, Francisco Franco and Oliveira Salazar, stated "their perfect agreement" as to the proper concept of Western policy. Taking as their point of departure "the strategic unity of the Iberian Peninsula," the lines were laid down for "a common defensive action within the general framework of the Western defense." In plain words this meant: If you want Portugal and the Azores, you must also take Franco. Madrid also requested and obtained Lisbon's support for a revision of the status of Tangier, aimed at giving back to Spain the control of that strategic international city which Franco seized by force during World War II to embarrass the Allies and please Hitler. Franco's agents, according to French intelligence, had been actively involved in the anti-French riots of March 30, which gave Madrid its pretext for raising the Tangier issue in direct defiance of the agreement on the policing and administration of the city made after the war by the United States, Britain, France, and the Soviet Union.

But a still higher card in Franco's hand is his plan to become mediator in the Western effort to integrate the Arab states into the Atlantic strategy through a Mediterranean pact. Before his meeting with Salazar, Franco had already dispatched his Foreign Minister, Martin Artajo, on a mission to the six countries, Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, Saudi-Arabia, and Egypt. Under the Iberian Pact Franco was in any case obligated to consult Portugal before making any new international arrangements, but he gladly used the occasion of his meeting with Salazar to underline before the world his mission to bring Moslems and Christians into a holy brotherhood against the Russians.

For that a consistent effort to attract the feudal Arab leaders and politicians had to be launched. Franco missed no opportunity of assuring the Arabs of his support when the day should come for wiping out the state of Israel; at the same time he identified himself with their anti-French moves in North Africa. He also had the problem of his own Morocco. Thanks to the collaboration of opportunist leaders like Abd-el Khalek Torres and Benalua, a surprising calm reigns in Spanish Morocco at the very moment when French diplomacy is losing its head in Tunisia and the rest of North Africa. A wide variety of "political parties" have suddenly been authorized in Spanish Morocco, while in Spain itself not a single party except the Falange is tolerated: freedom for the colonies and slavery for the master race! Of course the whole thing is a farce. The walls that since the fifteenth century have surrounded Melilla, separating the city with its military Spanish aristocracy from the miserable lands on which the Arabs vegetate, are as impenetrable as ever. They will fall only on the day an enlightened Spanish Republic recognizes the march of time in Africa. But Franco's pretense of democracy in Morocco serves the dictator's present purposes.

When Martin Artajo returns from his Arabian trip, which has been hailed as a triumph in the Cairo press, Franco will turn to the Americans and say, "Now that we have tightened our bonds with Portugal and made Spain and the Arab world one, what have you to offer? Only through me can your dreams of a Mediterranean pact be realized; only through me can Islam be kept out of the clutches of communism. Agreement can be had on my terms—take them or leave them." This may turn out to be the most audacious blackmail operation since the war.

Perón Through in '52?

BY FERMIN GONZALEZ

Buenos Aires
THERE are no Gallup polls in Argentina but even the most cursory survey of public opinion in Buenos Aires today would reveal that many Argentines are convinced that a military coup will overthrow Juan Perón before the end of this year.

The credibility of this prediction must be judged in the light of Argentina's history and of the crisis, deepening from day to day, which now has the country in its grip.

Argentina enacted its democratic constitution in 1853 and for seventy-seven years was ruled by a succession of constitutional civilian regimes. But in 1930 the Conservative Party, which had been out of power since 1916, sought military help to overthrow the government of Hipólito Yrigoyen, leader of the centrist Unión Cívica Radical, whose program for nationalizing oil had the support of the people. The putsch was engineered by General Uriburu with the support of the Right and of several American oil companies. A group of students and writers said at the time: "The coup is tantamount to making the army the judge of elections and governments." Certainly the event marked the end of normal constitutional government. The army has since been the decisive element in the role played by the conservative political factions in Argentina.

A second military coup occurred in 1943. It was supported by avowed Fascist groups and by Hitler's agents in Latin America who were determined to prevent Argentina from lining up with the Allies against the Axis powers. One of the most active plotters was Colonel Juan Domingo Perón, who had spent several years in Italy and had personally witnessed many of the Axis blitzkrieg triumphs. Thus Perón's rise to power was the result of a combination of international Nazi-Fascist intrigue and the plotting of some of the same imperialist and reactionary factions which had maneuvered the Uriburu coup thirteen years earlier. The roots of Argentina's troubles go much deeper than the present dictatorship.

When Germany's defeat deprived Perón of the continued international backing he had expected, he put forward a domestic program, modeled on Fascist lines, designed to win him the support of the industrial bourgeoisie and the urban and rural proletariat. His Five Year Plan, announced in 1946, had the following over-all objectives: the mechanization of agriculture to increase production; the establishment of the government as the sole exporter of agricultural products, the profits from this foreign trade to be used to promote domestic industry through the increase of fuel production, the building of hydroelectric plants, the improvement of transport, and the purchase from abroad of raw materials and machinery.

Here was a program which, if honestly and efficiently executed, could have meant a genuine progressive revolution. Everything favored Perón: in 1946 Argentina was still a rich and solvent country. It was one of the world's greatest exporters of meat and grain, ranking first in corn, linseed and chilled beef, second in mutton, and third in wool. At war's end, Argentina's gold and foreign-exchange reserves amounted to $1,700,000,000; Perón himself boasted that there were not enough safes in Buenos Aires to hold all the government's gold. The country's light industry had developed enormously since 1935; it was producing foodstuffs, textiles, leather goods, glassware, and hundreds of other consumer items. Between 1935 and 1941 the number of industrial concerns had risen from 40,000 to 58,000.

What has happened since the Five Year Plan was proclaimed?

TODAY not a cent remains of Argentina's $1,700,000,000 gold and foreign-exchange reserves. The huge sum has been dissipated in buying arms, in the expropriation of the British-owned railways under conditions which netted the foreign shareholders $600,000,000 for material not worth half that amount, and—above all—in graft which has gone to line the pockets of the ruling clique. Most of this graft was skimmed off the prices paid the United States, Britain, and Canada for surplus war material.

None of the plan's principal features have been executed. Not a single hydroelectric plant has been built; industrial machinery has not been renewed; the railroads have not been modernized; fuel production has not been increased. As for agriculture, the country which less than six years ago was one of the world's great exporters of grain and beef is now going meatless two days a week while white bread has disappeared altogether. In 1908 Argentina's cultivated area amounted to 19,000,000 hectares (approximately 47,000,000 acres); today it totals barely 16,000,000 hectares (about 40,000,000 acres). Perón has "encouraged" Argentine agriculture to the extent that this year and next the export surplus of grain will be practically nothing and that of meat very small. This can mean the economic ruin of the country in a very short time.

The effects of Argentina's industrial stagnation are apparent in the closing of numerous factories because of lack of fuel and machinery. Electric power is rationed; unemployment has increased by 30,000 since 1950; the cost of living is five to six times higher than it was in 1946. There are long lines before stores selling bread, meat, butter, wine, potatoes, and fuel, on which speculators are making enormous sums. Small business is being strangled by the imposition of government controls.

So far Perón has managed to ward off major trouble through inflation. Paper money has been printed at a mad rate to cover government expenses and maintain labor support through nominal wage increases. Currency in circulation, amounting to two billion pesos in 1943, rose to fourteen billion pesos in 1951—an increase of 66 per cent in eight years.

The outlook for the immediate future is indeed grim. The increase in real wages has not been sufficient for the workers to maintain their living standards and unemployment continues to rise; these facts spell widespread labor unrest. Argentina's foreign-exchange position is deteriorating steadily. Not only have its foreign reserves disappeared, but the normally favorable trade balance has turned into a deficit which last year amounted to more than $33,000,000.

There can be only one explanation for the situation in which Argentina finds itself today: the incompetence and corruption of the Perón regime. Agriculture was sacrificed for an uneconomical and chaotic industrialization plan; foreign exchange and public funds were wasted on military installations and obsolete armaments bought at prices which left wide margins for graft. The high-wage inflationist policy drew farmers and agricultural workers to the cities—a situation which the government is now trying to remedy through measures that fail to strike at the heart of the agricultural problem. Despite repeated promises, Perón has not touched the latifundia, the immense properties of the wealthy landowners who are the government's staunchest supporters. Instead he is telling the people: "Eat less and produce more."

Many Argentines wonder whether this slogan applies also to some of the people most intimate with the Peróns. Juan Duarte, the dictator's brother-in-law, gives sumptuous parties at which he boasts that he is "the wealthiest bachelor in the world." Actress friends of Eva Perón have been granted monopolies on certain foodstuffs and other scarce products: Tita Merello, an actress, is Argentina's only authorized importer of Chinese tea. Juana Larrauri, a radio singer, is a National Senator for Entre Rios province who organizes armed assaults on meetings of opposition political parties. Eva

Juan Perón

Perón's Social Welfare Fund has become internationally notorious. Employers and workers are forced to contribute to it an estimated million pesos daily (more than $72,000); Mrs. Perón accounts to no one for what she spends.

The atmosphere of corruption and ignorance emanating from the government pervades almost all aspects of public life. At the universities, Peronista professors automatically pass all pro-Perón students; in primary schools, teachers are obliged to praise Perón in the classrooms. The courts have been "purged" to the point where many judges seek daily instructions on the handling of cases from the provincial government or the chief of police.

The opposition no longer enjoys civil rights. Thousands of military men, politicians, students, and workers are today in jail because they disagree with the regime. The horrible tortures inflicted upon political and military prisoners are common knowledge [see Perón Turns to Torture in The Nation of April 19]. Among these victims are two former editors of La Prensa who refused to continue writing for the paper after it was expropriated by the government. Two army officers, Colonel Suarez and Lieutenant Demichelli, have recently undergone torture, and people still talk about the case of Aguirre, a workman, who died in excruciating pain in the hands of the sadistic police. Women have been thrown into jail for protesting against high prices and the long queues in front of food stores.

Police terror will undoubtedly grow as popular unrest continues to mount. And as Perón feels his position increasingly threatened, he is pinning his hopes on two possibilities: American help in exchange for the alignment of Argentina with the anti-Communist front, and the outbreak of a new war which would enable him to repress even more ruthlessly his domestic opposition and at the same time ease his financial situation by boosting export prices. Perón himself has been mentioning these possibilities in articles for the newspaper Democracia which he writes under the pseudonym "Descartes."

To many Argentine nationalists, Perón's dallying with the "Yanquis" comes as a great shock. All these years he has been attacking "Yanqui imperialism" and denouncing large American concerns. The record shows that not even in this has he been sincere. In 1940 there were only fifty-four American factories; today there are more than 100. Morgan interests control almost all the country's power plants. Foreign oil companies which in 1947 earned a little more than $1,000,00 in profits, earned sixteen times as much in 1949. Standard Oil, which lost three-quarters of a million dollars in 1945, had profits of more than $2,500,000 in 1949.

BUT Perón cannot count on America to save him financially, nor can he count on a third world war. The dark days of his dictatorship are numbered. The vast majority of the army is determined to get rid of him in order to salvage what remains of its prestige, and soon one of the many plots being hatched against him will succeed.

In the light of this prospect, the democratic and liberal parties have a great responsibility. Many among their leaders feel that it will be enough to get rid of the Peróns; they look forward with equanimity to the return of a conservative civilian government or even of a mild military regime. But others realize that Argentina's profound crisis can be resolved only through organic and progressive reforms which have popular support. There are some democratic leaders who share with Perón the notion that only war and/or American help can save the country. These conservatives will attempt to shoulder aside all progressive groups such as the so-called Radical Intransigente, which now controls the old moderate party of Hipólito Yrigoyen. This group, led by Balbin and Frondizi, polled more than 2,000,000 votes in the last national election; in effect, it represented the opposition as a whole. Youthful and vigorous, it stands for nationalistic and democratic measures designed to help the masses. Functioning along similar lines are workers' groups and political organizations which include many former Peronistas who have become disillusioned with their hero.

A rightist military coup, carried out with the help of conservative forces, would merely prolong the political crisis. A young Argentine writer sums up the situation this way: "Neither today with Perón, nor yesterday with the conservatives, but tomorrow with the popular progressive forces." The next few months may determine which road Argentina will follow.

Certainly our program in Europe seems to me far more likely to produce war with Russia than anything we have done in the East. I am only asking for the same policy in the Far East as in Europe.—From "A Foreign Policy for Americans," by Senator Robert Taft.

Relative to a recent letter in your column it has been interesting to note that numerous times though the weather has been stormy the day General MacArthur has addressed the public there seems to be a parting of the clouds and a beam of light just before and continuing until he has finished his speech. . . . This has happened so many times in various parts of the country that it would almost seem prophetic.—From a reader's letter to the Los Angeles Examiner.

Trouble in Textiles

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

BETWEEN February and March 300,000 hitherto idle workers found jobs, reducing the total number of unemployed to 1,804,000—2.9 per cent of the civilian labor force. A year earlier the total was 343,000, or half a percentage point greater; yet then there was an acknowledged boom while today we hear much uneasy talk about recession. Clearly this talk is exaggerated but nevertheless there are some exceedingly soft spots in the economy, particularly in those sections that cater directly to consumers, and the softest of these are the textile and apparel industries.

The women's-wear section, while not without troubles, is still relatively prosperous, but in men's wear and most branches of the textile industry there is serious unemployment. Moreover, as "spreading the work" is traditional in these trades, thousands of operatives are on short-time, necessitating drastic cuts in their family budgets. In January, according to the March issue of the Federal Reserve Bulletin, employment in textile-mill products and apparel and other finished textiles totaled 2,138,000 compared to an average of 2,608,000 in 1950. Average weekly hours worked in textile-mill products were 38.7 against 40.6 a year earlier, and 36.1 in apparel and other finished textiles against 39.9.

However, these figures tell only part of the story, for conditions in the industry are by no means uniform. Certain sections—those producing the newer synthetics and manufacturing rayon cord for tires—are still busy. Geographically, too, the weight of the slump has fallen unevenly. The South, although it is feeling the depression, is considerably better off than New England and the Middle Atlantic states, as is shown by the following table, taken from an exhibit presented to the Surplus Manpower Committee by the Textile Workers Union of America (C. I. O.).

TEXTILE MILL EMPLOYMENT

	Employment	Av. weekly manhours

New England	—13.9	—19.2
Middle Atlantic	—16.4	—18.9
South	— 3.5	— 7.7

A little more than a year ago the always mercurial textile and allied industries were on top of the world. Order books were full; mills and shops were working overtime; prices and profits were rising steeply. Today the industry is plunged in gloom and everyone in it is asking, "What hit us?" There is general agreement that textiles are suffering from an acute case of indigestion, the aftermath of a bout of speculative indulgence which followed the outbreak of the Korean war. But in their present sad and sober state, manufacturers, merchants, and union officials are wondering whether their pains spring partly from a more organic disease.

Before attempting to answer these questions we must review the events of the past twenty-two months. Immediately following the outbreak of the Korean war, the textile market was stimulated by the rush of consumers to stock up on goods of all kinds from sugar to sheets. In this buying splurge government agencies were well to the fore and in the case of wool at least they bear a major responsibility for the subsequent wild gyrations in prices. Instead of attempting to cover their requirements quietly, they announced grandiose stockpiling plans just before the Australian wool auctions opened in September, 1950, and again during the Christmas holidays. Naturally these plans to corral and sterilize a major fraction of the world's wool supplies spurred buyers everywhere to anticipate their own requirements and gave commodity speculators a field day. Prices mounted steadily until just before Easter, 1951, when Washington pulled the plug by announcing suspension of both stockpile purchases and current procurement. As a result auction prices retreated even more rapidly than they had advanced and by the end of last September had fallen below their pre-Korean level.

During the second half of 1950 quotations for finished textiles followed the inflationary trend of raw materials. The rise in prices was, in fact, steeper than during the period following the price-control bonfire of 1946. Between June and December the advance in cotton goods averaged 32 per cent and that in woolens and worsteds 33 per cent. However, when the Chinese intervened in Korea, starting a new war scare, consumers again overran the stores.

With both military and civilian demands soaring, the textile industry went into high gear. Output of broadwoven fabrics jumped from an annual rate of 12.4 billion linear yards in the second quarter of 1950 to 13.7 billion in the fourth quarter and 14.6 billion in the first quarter of 1951—an all-time record. Huge profits were reaped and leading textile concerns played a prominent role in the bull market.

It was too good to last. Defense procurement authorities, finding their appropriations depleted by high prices, cut back orders. Fear of general war subsided and with the establishment of price ceilings shoppers lost some of their terror of inflation and began to notice that store shelves and racks were amply supplied. At the same time the mounting cost of food and shelter, together with higher tax bills, induced them to reexamine their budgets and postpone the satisfaction of less urgent desires. In the spring of 1951 retail sales of clothing and furnishing fabrics began to sag and before long inventory trouble was a universal complaint in the textile world.

Manufacturers, however, were loath to reduce profit margins so, instead of cutting prices in an effort to stimulate demand, they curtailed operations. By September the Federal Reserve index of textile production (1935-39=100) had fallen to 165, a drop of thirty-two points from October, 1950, and nine points below the pre-Korean level. Thus the first brunt of the depression fell on the workers, 180,000 of whom, or 14 per cent, were released between February and November, 1951. Hundreds of thousands of others went on short-time. Stockholders did better. According to the April Letter of the National City Bank of New York, eight woolen concerns actually increased their earnings in 1951 by 11 per cent while thirty-seven cotton companies aggregated $92,812,000, only about $150,000 less than in 1950. Rayon and clothing groups did not fare so well but were still able to show a handsome return on their net assets.

In spite of cutbacks in production, reducing inventories proved a slow business and prices began to give ground. By the beginning of this year, cotton and woolen fabrics had lost more than half their post-Korean gains while the price index for synthetics was actually lower than in April, 1950. Further reductions have occurred in the past three months and there have been reports that both yarn and cloth were being "dumped" on the market below cost. On April 7, the Wall Street Journal noted that in New York cotton fabrics were selling at from 15 to 35 per cent below OPS ceilings and woolens and worsteds at one-third or more lower. Some men's suits price-fixed last year at $75 are now ticketed at $60. It remains to be seen whether this new policy of lower prices, which is being backed by strong retail promotion, will attract enough customers to put the industry back on its feet.

When adversity strikes the Northern textile manufacturer he is apt to kid himself into believing that what his business needs is sunshine and cheap labor, and his thoughts turn southward. Every crisis has increased the South's share in the industry, and the present one is likely to prove no exception. In a speech on January 17, Francis W. White, president of the giant American Woolen Company, declared that Southern cloth could be sold from 30 to 50 cents a yard below New England prices and hinted that, unless Northern mill workers worked harder and the union stopped "restricting" the use of machinery, the company would join the Southern trek in a big way.

The idealization of the South by Northern mill owners rests partly on fact and partly on myth. Wages are somewhat lower and labor, as one textile man put it to me, is "more complaisant." But growing industrialization is mopping up the South's surplus labor and encouraging unionization, so that differences in wage costs and labor attitudes are unlikely to prove permanent. Even under present conditions most comparisons between Northern and Southern labor efficiency lack validity. The average Northern operative, for instance, works in an obsolete, multi-storied, industrial fortress where a smooth flow of production is impossible and handling costs are absurdly high. In the South the typical plant is newer and better designed and houses far more modern equipment. However, quality grades of cloth, both wool and cotton, are still produced mainly in the North and the per-capita "value added by labor" there is higher than below the Mason-Dixon Line.

One Southern advantage that the Northeast cannot match at present is the lower average cost of power, which is said to provide a differential in favor of Southern woolen and worsted mills of as much as two cents a yard. For this the South can thank, in part, the TVA, a fact that ought to stir the Northern states to agitate more vigorously for development of the power potentialities of the St. Lawrence and the Connecticut.

In the present tug-of-war between North and South, the latter is being given an important assist by government, national and local. A large percentage of service contracts for both cloth and clothing has been awarded to Southern plants—an important factor contributing to Northern depression. Both the Textile Workers Union and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers have protested this situation and proposed that the present system of open bidding be replaced by preferential negotiation of contracts with plants in distressed areas. In addition, the Clothing Workers are demanding stricter enforcement of "quality clauses." They charge that established concerns are being by-passed in favor of fly-by-night firms which bid at such low prices that they can only make a profit by chiseling on quality or evading wage-and-hour laws.

Naturally proposals to channel more contracts to Northern mills have encountered strenuous Southern opposition. "I am not going to preside here over the liquidation of the textile industry in the South," Senator Maybank (S. C.), chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, declared recently. And he went on to accuse mobilization officials of "trying to keep alive a dying industry in one section when it cannot meet competition from another part."

This denunciation of "sectional favoritism" has its ironic aspects when we consider the success of Southern legislators in obtaining government support for such commodities as raw cotton. And their pose as defenders of free competition shows not a little gall in view of the way Southern state and local governments have been subsidizing industrial plants, mainly in the textile and clothing fields.

Introducing legislation to check this practice, Representative George M. Rhodes (Pa.) pointed out to the House on February 25 that eight Southern states allow some kind of tax exemption. Not content with this form of bribery, Mississippi supplements it with a plan enabling city and county authorities to sell tax-exempt bonds and use the proceeds to build plants which are then leased cheaply to industrial concerns. Mr. Rhodes was able to give particulars of no less than twenty-five such bond issues, aggregating many millions of dollars, which have been approved since the beginning of 1951. Two of the largest of them will benefit Textron, a large textile combine which has recently closed down several of its New England plants.

This "Southern socialism" gives the North a legitimate grievance. It is a form of government intervention that is as insidiously divisive as would be the erection of tariff barriers by the several states. If long continued it seems bound to lead to retaliatory action by the North and the development of sectional economic warfare with grave consequences not only for textiles but for all industry.

[Next week Keith Hutchison will discuss some of the long-term problems of the textile industry at home and abroad.]

The Crusading Kefauver

BY CHARLES BARTLETT

SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER is a man who talks slowly but moves fast and his Presidential candidacy became virtually inevitable last November 6 when Rudolph Halley, the intense young attorney of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee, was elected president of the New York City Council by a surprising margin of 160,000 votes.

Halley's victory, sprung from the fragile catapult of New York's Liberal Party and unforeseen by the most seasoned observers, was a striking manifestation of the popular sentiment for the work of the crime committee. It brought Kefauver face to face with a chance at the Presidency, a challenge which had goaded him for many years.

Although Kefauver's friends concede that his present position as a prime contender for the Democratic nomination is due in large part to the crime investigation, they maintain that the kleig lights and publicity merely served to hasten a development that was inevitable. As far back as the fall of 1949 his Tennessee supporters were talking seriously of boosting him for the Presidency and in 1940, when he was just a freshman Congressman, Senator McKellar said, "I believe the time will come when he will be one of the great leaders in the state."

To Kefauver himself an ambition for the Presidency comes as one of the most natural things in the world. Leadership is in his blood and throughout his life he has been president, editor, or captain of almost every organization and group with which he has been associated. Asked recently why he aspired to the Presidency, the Tennessean replied, "I suppose it is just a natural desire on the part of every boy to want to be President."

This unflagging ambition is the most striking thing about Kefauver. A man of oxlike strength, he appears always to be driving himself relentlessly and to be subordinating every personal interest to the pursuit of greater recognition. His philosophy is the philosophy of those inspirational poems which urge dedication, courage, and perseverance as the keys to great success. Most American boys read this poetry but Kefauver seems to have lived by its precepts. At no time in his life has he been content to sit back and rest on his laurels.

The mystery of Estes Kefauver is the contrast between the powerful drive of his ambition and the elusiveness of his personality. Although a man of good will, he has apparently never felt the need of the easy give and take that for most of us makes up daily living.

Kefauver's strongest point is his genius for assimilation. He is a master at getting experts to advise him. His own mental processes are devoid of emotionalism, prejudice, and indirection. Those nearest to him say they have never seen him either angry or excited. He is a man who trusts his own instincts.

The effect that the Tennessee Senator has upon the people who meet him, see him on television, or hear him at rallies is more reassuring than inspiring. His long, honest face, enormous size, and country-boy manner bespeak good faith and sincerity. His words, attuned to the same bulldog optimism which pervades his life, are full of hope and a passion for reform. He has dignity, an impressive presence, and the appearance of great gentleness. The slight awkwardness of his stance strengthens this concept of a homespun and rather noble human being. His impromptu talks are badly organized and give the impression of trying too hard to indorse everything that is good. More often than not they are boring. His audiences are seldom enthusiastic, but the election records in Tennessee and in the various state primaries show that they go home liking him.

If "Kefauver at long range" is one of the greatest assets of his present campaign, "Kefauver at short range" is one of his greatest handicaps. His lack of small talk and his disposition to sink into a shell of contemplation in the midst of lively conversation have cost him the support of many important political leaders. One such calls it "mysticism"; others term it "aloofness."

Probably no one in the world can claim to be an intimate friend and confidant of Kefauver. He is a man who keeps himself to himself and although he will listen to advice from every quarter, he insists that the final decision be his own. These are unpopular characteristics to party bosses whose stock-in-trade must be an easy intimacy with the officials they help elect. And they do not make him persuasive to his personality-conscious colleagues in Congress or to Washington reporters.

Perhaps because of his coonskin hat there is a mistaken belief that Kefauver was cradled in a log cabin by Indian-shooting parents. The unusual family name causes further misconceptions. The facts are that the Kefauvers were French Huguenots who settled in Frederick, Maryland, before the Revolution; that both of the Senator's grandfathers were graduates of the University of Virginia and eminent professional men, and that Kefauver's father and he himself were born on one of the finest estates in east Tennessee. His father, Robert Cooke Kefauver, has been for many years a leader in the political and economic life of Madisonville, Tennessee, a small but venerable town in the foothills of the Smoky Mountains, and his mother came from a distinguished Southern family.

Estes Kefauver, born forty-nine years ago, was an exceptionally strong and extremely active youngster of average intelligence. He had an inherent capacity for leadership and although he was described on his arrival at the University of Tennessee as the "countriest-looking" boy who ever came there, as a sophomore he was voted the outstanding member of his class. By his senior year he was in charge of almost every extra-curricular activity on the campus. His marks, perhaps reflecting these preoccupations, were only fair.

After graduation, his father offered to pay his expenses to the Yale Law School. But the boy preferred to be on his own and succeeded in getting a scholarship. He came home in 1927 and practiced law in a cousin's firm in Chattanooga. In 1935 he married Nancy Pigott, a Scottish redhead who had the imagination and vivid personality that he lacked. She is a portrait painter who has never been able to get her husband to sit still long enough for painting. The Kefauvers have four children.

It is ironic that the most flashy and least thorough of the many reform movements that Kefauver has headed should have brought him his greatest reward. His entire success in politics has been achieved through his advocacy of reforms.

As a young lawyer in Chattanooga in the thirties, he worked for reform of the city and county government and for county planning. On the basis of these efforts and of an anti-poll-tax platform he ran in 1938 for the state Senate. In the only loss of his political career he was beaten by sixty votes by a veteran politician. Undaunted, he demanded reform in the state government and was invited into the Governor's Cabinet in 1939 to reorganize the finance and taxation department.

He took leave of his law office, then netting him close to $30,000 a year, to accept this post but had been in Nashville for only four months when the Congressman from Chattanooga died and he was offered a chance to run for his seat. He went to Congress in the fall of 1939 and by 1947 had collaborated on a scholarly and detailed master plan for a sweeping reformation of that august body. Practically none of his proposed changes has been adopted, but the volume, entitled "Twentieth Century Congress," is used as a textbook at a number of educational institutions.

When he was elected to the Senate in 1949 Kefauver embarked on a program of reform that included equal rights for women, home rule for the District of Columbia, establishment of a world calendar, revision of the military-justice code, and extension of the Atlantic Pact. He was forced to abandon his crusade for the distaff side when his colleagues amended his bill into a form that he felt would penalize women rather than help them. He pressed home rule for the District of Columbia through the Senate twice, both times over the bitter opposition of Southern Senators who saw in the proposal an end to segregation in the District. The revision of the military-justice code occupied two years of detailed work and Kefauver piloted it into law. The Atlantic Union proposal, a basic plank in his 1948 race for the Senate, involved the convocation of an exploratory convention of the Atlantic Pact countries to examine the possibilities of a closer federation. Although Kefauver and such sponsors of the plan as former Justice Owen Roberts and Clarence Streit have been able to align some twenty-eight Senators and one hundred and ten Representatives on their side, the project has never been seriously considered by the State Department.

IT WAS against this background of activity that Kefauver was approached late in 1949 by some reformers who wanted him to launch a probe into the crime syndicates. He shied away at first because it was not the type of technical, non-vindictive reform in which he was experienced. Thoroughly naive about the ways of the underworld, he took some time to decide that such a probe would really be a matter of public interest. The picture of a mild-mannered man poking reservedly and with dignity into something that he abhorred but did not quite comprehend won him the cheers of the nation, but the crime investigation was certainly not his most deserving reform effort.

Another irony of the present situation is the fact that Kefauver, who has several times risked his political position in Tennessee to stand with the leadership of the party, should now be cast in the role of a Democratic "irregular." He was the only member of the Tennessee delegation at the convention in 1944 to urge indorsement of Franklin D. Roosevelt before the party's civil-rights platform had been written, and he was the only member of that delegation in the vice-presidential balloting to urge that Tennessee's twenty-four votes be cast for Harry S. Truman.

He has been considerably less of a battler of party bosses than his current reputation would indicate. He was elected to Congress with the amiable support of the bosses in Chattanooga and Polk County. When he started running for the Senate, he resolutely declined to make Boss Crump a campaign issue until the Memphis leader lambasted him in newspaper advertisements throughout the state. It was in answer to Crump's charge that he was a 'coon fiddling with communism that he donned his coonskin hat and declared, "I may be a pet 'coon but I ain't Mr. Crump's pet 'coon."

His Congressional voting record has been highly regular and on several occasions in the Senate he has stood for the views of the Administration against the opposition of the majority leader. The most daring of these votes was the one he cast in opposition to the McCarran internal-security bill in 1950. Saying he could not "stomach" the measure, he declined to join the liberals who had accepted the Lucas compromise as an excuse for supporting the bill. He was the only Southerner among the seven Senators who stood against it except Frank Graham of North Carolina, whose political career had already been terminated in a spring primary. President Truman vetoed the bill, but it was passed over the veto. Kefauver also opposed the Kerr natural-gas bill in 1950 (which was also vetoed by the President). He has fought hard for anti-monopoly measures. On F. E. P. C., he said recently that he would support any civil-rights program adopted by the Democratic Party.

During his nine years in the House he voted with the Democratic leadership 403 times out of 471 roll-call votes. In the Senate he has voted with the Democratic majority approximately 91 per cent of the time.

The most serious charge leveled by those who now dub him an "irregular" is that he declined to protect the Democratic Party in the fall of 1950 when it was clear that his crime committee could exert an explosive influence on the elections. Kefauver was asked to keep the committee out of Chicago until after the election; he refused on the ground that any gesture that smacked of partisan politics would destroy the committee's work. The fact that there has never been a claim of partisanship from any respectable source is high tribute to the impartiality with which he conducted the probe.

Kefauver and President Truman have had a friendly but not close relationship for a number of years. They have remained outwardly amicable despite numerous signs from the White House that the Tennessean fell from favor as the result of the crime investigation. Kefauver has scrupulously abstained, even in the heat of the New Hampshire primary, from attacks on the President and his hope is clearly that Mr. Truman, who has declared that the Democratic Party should have the strongest possible contender in the coming campaign, will refrain from opposing his candidacy.

There is little in the record or in Kefauver's campaign talks thus far to show that if he were elected President his program would differ much from that of the present Administration. He has been a constant liberal, an internationalist, and something of a crusader. He is committed to the concept that the federal government should endeavor to correct the ills that beset the populace while at the same time exerting as little control as possible over their personal lives. Although there is nothing in his voting record to establish him as an advocate of government economy, his recent campaign speeches heartily indorse a balanced budget. Since he has been either a lawyer or in Congress all of his adult life, there is no true gauge of his capabilities as an administrator, but in the affairs of his own office he has shown himself to favor the delegation of power that is now an essential function of the Presidency. Labor leaders contributed heavily to his campaign in 1948 but there is no evidence that Kefauver has ever been dominated by them or any other group.

One of Kefauver's copybook maxims is that opportunity is "not a gift but the reward of preparation and tireless research." His Tennessee friends have long regarded him as one of the luckiest men alive, as a person who seems always to get the right break at the right time. Whether luck is actually fate or "preparation and tireless research," it is certainly an indispensable qualification for a President in these trying times.

Miracles in Rome

Rome
COMPARED with France, Italy seems a happier country. France cannot make up its mind whether it lost or won the war; Italy has no doubt about having lost it. Nor has Italy any illusions about being a Great Power; it has cheerfully renounced all colonial ambitions and feels no envy of the French in Tunisia and Indo-China. After a useless and ruinous war which few Italians wanted, Italy today is poorer and wiser; and if some middle-aged housewives think back on fascism merely as "the time when things were normal—and didn't cost so much," only a handful of Italians would like to try the Fascist experiment all over again.

To me, the most striking thing about Italy, compared with France, is the better humor and calmer mood, and the greater spirit of mutual tolerance. The extreme Left has accepted as inevitable that there should be, for many years to come, a large clerical Right and Center in Italy; similarly the Demo-Christians (though not the extreme Right) find it natural that there should be a very large extreme Left. So below the surface of the genuine class struggle there is a kind of modus vivendi between the main political forces. The feeling that "we are all Italians"—Communists included—is deep-seated, and it is considered one of the virtues of the De Gasperi regime to have encouraged this attitude. Personal relations between De Gasperi and Nenni are excellent, and the Nenni Socialists, acting as buffer between the Communists and the government parties, receive great credit even from business men and industrialists for the relative social peace that exists here today. There is much less hysteria in Italy about either Russia or America than in most European countries, and that also helps.

I had a long talk with Signor Saragat, one of the leaders of the Italian Social Democrats (right-wing Socialists), who can count on barely two million votes compared with the Demo-Christians' twelve million and the four and one-half million each that the Communists and Nenni Socialists received in 1948. I asked Saragat why social democracy was so weak in Italy and whether he considered the Nenni Socialists very different from the Communists. He said:

The social and economic structure of Italy makes it historically inevitable that socialism should be extremist. There is no use talking social democracy in the British sense to millions of unemployed and millions of landless peasants and slum-dwellers who think of change not in terms of social reform but of revolution. This does not mean that Nenni is in the pocket of the Communists even though he considers it tactically correct to do nothing to weaken the extreme Left, half of which is represented by the Communists, who have great drive, a demagogic appeal for the poor, and an infernal amount of money. As for social democracy, it has little chance in explosive central Italy or in southern Italy; only in northern Italy, with its relatively high living standards, its industrialization, and its greater political culture, has it any chance at all.

To expect more than this from Italian social democracy, Saragat added with an air of discouragement, is to be politically illiterate. "You're not in England, damn it," he said. "You are in one of the poorest countries in Europe!"

ONE need not go outside Rome to see Italy's poverty. In the matter of housing, this city is somewhat better off than Naples, but much worse off than many other Italian cities. Its relative immunity from bombing brought in hundreds of thousands of refugees during the war, and the glamour of the capital has since attracted many others. From a pre-war population of 1,200,000, Rome has grown to 1,600,000. Counting museums, palaces, government offices, and everything else, there is one room here for every two persons, which means that in most homes more than two people live in one room. Many luxury flats have been built, but there is little new low-cost housing. So some people live in caves and others in the borgate—those suburban Hoovervilles familiar to anyone who has seen the film "Miracle in Milan." About one-tenth of Rome's population lives in these borgate, and to me the real miracle is how people can live in such conditions and yet keep their dignity and humor. Some of the women are even house-proud!

One Sunday night I visited three borgate, one of them on municipal land that abutted the untouchable vegetable gardens of some prince. The houses were mostly shacks built during the war for bombed-out people; but this was a relatively prosperous place, with electric lights in the tiny stone hovels and five water pumps. The sanitation was extremely primitive, and the place stank in summer, but in cooler weather it wasn't so bad. Some families had improved their hovels to the point where they were willing to sell them for a half-million lire (about $1,000).

The next borgata, set up "by private initiative" alongside the ruins of an old aqueduct, was a different story. The people here were "squatters"—unemployed from the south and Romans who couldn't afford city rents. The shacks were of brick, tile, and tin (much of it stolen); there was a single pump for the entire community and only candles and oil lamps for lighting. Yet these pitiful huts were clean. A Roman worker with five children invited me to his home for a glass of wine; there were flowers on the table. He could be happy here, he said, except for the fact the building society which owned the land had started an eviction process against the whole community, intending to build apartments renting at 40,000 lire a month. The borgata people had countered with an offer to pay 3,000 lire monthly as ground rent, but the offer had not been accepted. My host told me that he and his neighbors would not yield even if the law suit went against them; the police would have to evict them, and they would fight the police, just as in "Miracle in Milan." But they were under no illusion that they could save their homes.

But the real nightmare was the borgata Cordiana, built by Mussolini to "clear the paupers out of Rome." Here were mostly unemployed with large families (six or seven children were not unusual), living on a dole sufficient only to provide the very minimum subsistence—if that. I entered a hovel one evening. It was clean and there was no smell of cooking: there was nothing to cook and nothing to cook with. The family of eight lived on bread and a few vegetables; four of the children were asleep in a big bed. Then a strange figure appeared—a tall woman with an aquiline nose, tidy white hair, and an incongruously smart jacket. She had lost three of her eight children in the war; she was hard and bitter, and cursed De Gasperi. She took me to her own home, where three of her grandchildren were asleep in the communal bed. A picture of the Madonna hung on one wall; on the other, a portrait of Lenin. She roughly awoke one of the children, a boy of six, by tugging at his bare feet, screaming: "How can he go to school if he has no shoes? . . . And do you know about tuberculosis in the borgate? The government says only 3 per cent of us have it—I tell you, there's 40 per cent at least!"

She led me to another ill-lit hovel, with large pictures of Marx and Nenni and small pictures of Lenin and Stalin on the walls. Here some of the villagers gathered and talked of the hospital four miles away, and of the single doctor available to the 13,000 people of the community, who came for nothing if you were employed and insured but charged 600 lira if you were unemployed and therefore not insured. It was simpler for the unemployed to die! And the priest got plenty of things from America but he wouldn't give a child a pair of shoes if the parents weren't churchgoers or if he thought they were Communists or Socialists.

The villagers pointed out that their youngsters had no opportunity to train for jobs—if they couldn't earn anything, they stole; and some of the girls and women, with the consent of their menfolk, went to Rome to make money as prostitutes. One could hardly blame them. The villagers said that the Socialist "head-quarters"—that was the room in which we were now sitting—was the social center for the community, and that the Socialists and Communists were "the only friends of the poor." It was only during election time, they said, that the grand ladies came in cars to distribute food parcels and olive oil and clothes. . . .

But it would be unfair to dwell exclusively on this aspect of Italy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Bevan States His Case

IN PLACE OF FEAR. By Aneurin Bevan. Simon and Schuster. $3.

IN DECEMBER, 1950, the London Economist welcomed the disappearance at last of "a certain tendency . . . to take Mr. Aneurin Bevan seriously." "He is not the statesman," it said, "but the sorcerer's apprentice." In its slim issue of March 22, 1952, the Economist devoted no less than four separate articles to Bevan and his views. And its editor had recently returned from a lecture trip to the United States, where he mouthed the same criticisms of Britain's rearmament program that Bevan had expressed a year ago. Also on March 22, Britain's most popular picture magazine carried a long essay on "Bevan the Man." A host of other publications devoted column after column of rationed space to a politician whose party is not governing Britain and who would not himself hold office if it were. Across the Atlantic, Bevan had lately stalked through the pages of the Saturday Evening Post, billed as "The One Man Churchill Fears" and winning far more praise than that journal usually accords to left-wingers of any nationality.

The tendency which the Economist found so deplorable has clearly reappeared. With the publication of his "political testament," Aneurin Bevan is bidding to be taken more seriously than ever. His less responsible critics, both British and American, will be confounded. Seldom in either country has an active politician produced a more restrained or impersonal testament. It is free not only of the "personal bitterness" so often ascribed to Bevan, but also of any reference whatever to the conflict going on in the Labor Party. Clement Attlee, for instance, is never mentioned; even his successor is only briefly chided for "a marked illiteracy about all things economic"—an elementary observation from which Mr. Churchill would be among the last to dissent.

No, Mr. Bevan is honestly trying to sell his ideas rather than his personality. Many of them will prove immensely attractive, even outside the ranks of his Socialist followers and even outside Britain. Others will be rejected out of hand. And some—some of the cardinal points in Bevan's program—are left hanging, so vague and obscure that no final judgment will be possible.

His best-known contention, which prompted his resignation from Attlee's Cabinet last year, is that present Western rearmament expenditure is needlessly and dangerously large. It is needlessly large, he believes, because Russia has no intention of direct aggression. Bevan dwells on the comparative figures for Western and Soviet steel production, implying that the result of a new war is as obvious to the men in the Kremlin as it is to himself. And if they contemplated aggression, he asks, why did they wait until North Atlantic rearmament became a formidable reality?

Both the inspiration and the timing of the Western program are cogently questioned. The decision, he says, was made in near panic after the early losses in Korea eighteen months ago. As for the contention that 1953 will be the critical year in the East-West power balance:

In no discussion have I heard the slightest justification for that date. It appears to bear the same relationship to scientific prediction as astrology . . . to astronomy.

As for the size of the respective national-defense budgets:

Military experts have no easier task than to advise their government on the level of defense expenditure. All they have to do is to advise a larger sum than they know their government is prepared to concede and they are quite safe. . . . The real burden of anxiety falls on the civilian Ministers who have to set the general needs of the national economy against the clamor of the military experts.

In normal times this passage would commend itself to American Congressmen as well as to European Socialists. But it does confer upon Bevan a responsibility which he shirks. Just how much should America and Britain spend on rearmament, and how does he arrive at his figures? These questions are not answered, nor have they been in any of Bevan's speeches.

The book does advance one positive recommendation:

Suppose we fix a date—towards which we should at once begin to work—when a definite percentage of what we are now spending on arms shall be set aside for the peaceful development of backward parts of the world.

Such a declaration, he believes, would electrify Asian opinion as did Britain's naming of a date for its withdrawal from India and Pakistan. The West's task is to accommodate Eastern revolutions in a general pattern of world co-operation, its goal "the defeat of hunger in the most literal sense."

Most of the book, however, is devoted to Bevan's rationale as a British Socialist. If many of his arguments are old and tired, they have seldom been better stated in the past twenty years. To his generation of young miners in the coal valleys of South Wales, "society presented itself . . . as an arena of conflicting social forces and not as a plexus of individual striving." It follows rather naturally that "in so far as I can be said to have had a political training at all, it has been in Marxism." Yet, for all its acceptance of Marxist analysis, Bevan's collectivist philosophy is motivated by an almost passionate concern for the individual. It recalls the Christian Socialism of his friend Sir Stafford Cripps, and conforms to that generally empirical philosophy of the British Labor movement which so vexes its Continental friends. Capitalism, he says, failed in the one function by which any social system must be judged. It failed to produce a tolerable home and a reputable order of values for the individual man and woman. . . . Efficiency was its final arbiter—as though loving, laughing, eating, the deep serenity of a happy home, the warmth of friends, the astringent revelation of new beauty, and the earth tug of local roots will ever yield to such a test.

His socialism is not necessarily for export to North America:

It is possible that in the United States of America the argument still holds good that private economic adventure offers the best means for the development of industrial techniques.

Even in the case of Britain, Bevan's remedies are less impressive than his diagnosis. Government savings bonds, and many social-welfare benefits, would be tied to the cost-of-living index and rise accordingly. Recognizing an upper limit to direct taxation, he would raise a large part of the national revenue from the profits of nationalized industries. The number of such industries would be greatly increased, though Bevan does not list his candidates for state ownership. Neither does he analyze with any clarity the disappointments experienced by Labor in its past enterprises. He remarks that nationalization is only a step toward socialization, but does not illumine the path ahead. "Industrial democracy" is defined about as precisely here as it has been in high-toned Conservative Party pamphlets.

There is a chapter on the neglected problem of raw materials, and an excellent one on the British National Health Service. Here Mr. Bevan is in serene and familiar territory, able to claim that the Service "has now become a part of the texture of our national life. No political party would survive that tried to destroy it." And no better answer to critics of the British plan has ever appeared.

"In Place of Fear" is entirely free from the small-minded anti-Americanism to which some Laborites are susceptible, and from the general intemperance of expression which ruins some of Bevan's speeches. To those Britons and Americans who think of him as a demagogic careerist, it will come as a revelation. In a period characterized by the intellectual poverty of its political leadership, Bevan stands immense.

But those who have glimpsed already beyond his fascinating, turbulent exterior will, in many cases, find disappointments. This is not "Socialism up-to-date"; perhaps it is not intended to be. The central challenge to British Labor in the present decade, far more important than differences of degree over rearmament, is the question, "Where are you going, and why?" Here and there, in the pages of Mr. Bevan's book, is part of an answer. But the question is not wholly answered, or even wholly posed.

PAUL NIVEN

The "Shtetl"

LIFE IS WITH PEOPLE. By Mark Zborowski and Elizabeth Herzog. International Universities Press. $5.

IF THIS is anthropology, let's have more of it. Such, at any rate, is the unqualified enthusiasm of one reviewer upon reading this superb study of the shtetl, the Jewish East European "Little-Town" now destroyed as an entity. This reconstruction of a vanished way of life manages to evoke its mood as well as describe its mores. The book is a triumph of art and a substantial scientific work, though perhaps the scientist would resent the distinction. Only in fiction of a high order does the atmosphere of the shtetl become as poignantly vivid as in "Life Is With People." This has been achieved without sacrificing clarity of structure or accuracy of detail.

In her foreword, Margaret Mead states that the book is an attempt to bring anthropological disciplines to the task of recording "something of the form and content, the texture and beauty" of Jewish life in the small towns of Eastern Europe before their final annihilation by Hitler. The realization that a rich contemporary culture on the verge of dissolution was being disregarded by anthropologists came to Ruth Benedict and Margaret Mead in the course of World War II. Originally, they had discounted the existence of a specific Jewish culture: a Polish Jew was a Pole who was Jewish by religion. In the course of their work, they began to speculate on the possibility of making a systematic study of the "Jewish cultural element which distinguished the perception of a Hungarian or Polish Jew from a Hungarian or a Pole whose antecedents were Christian." The project was undertaken as part of the Columbia University Research in Contemporary Cultures. Using the techniques of anthropology, the scientists reached the, for them, revolutionary conclusion that they were dealing "with a living whole, that the Eastern European Jews had in fact a living culture, which was essentially all of a piece. . . . We realized this with growing excitement, for while all anthropologists have the experience of working out the essential form of the cultures which they study, we seldom have the experience of discovering the existence of a whole at which we had not guessed."

Since some Jews still vociferously denounce the concept of a "Jewish culture" as the evil invention of chauvinistic Zionists, the conclusion reached by a group of scientists with no ideological axe to grind is potential dynamite. I don't know in what measure those associated with the Columbia project anticipate the detonations which their academic delight in their discovery will probably set off in such circles as the Council for Judaism, whose recent conference was energetically devoted to issuing formidable blasts against the very theses the anthropologists innocently propound. Most Jewish readers, however, are not likely to be startled by the news that the Jews of Eastern Europe had a specific culture marked by the characteristics of a culture: "a language, a religion, a set of values, a specific constellation of social mechanisms and institutions, and the feeling of its members that they belong to one group." Nor need one limit the finding to the Jews of Eastern Europe. The history of all Jewish communities since the dis-

Her eyes drink the delicate horizon moving behind the song.
Deep sink the skies, a well of voices. Her sleep is the vessel of summer
That climbing music requires the hidden music at rest.

Her body is utterly given to the light, surrendered in perfect abandon
To the heaven above her shadow, still as her first-born day.
Softly the wind runs over her. Circling the meadow, her hooves
Rest in a race of daisies, halted where butterflies stand.

Do not pass her too close. It is easy to break the circle
And lose that indolent fullness rounded under the ray Falling on light-eared grasses your footstep must not yet wake.
It is easy to darken the sun of her unborn foal at play.

VERNON WATKINS

persion illustrates the validity of the criterion used.

Much that is told of the shtetl, a term denoting the life of the inhabitants rather than the town, might be true of orthodox Jews anywhere. The authors know this. The virtue of their account consists in its concentration on an artistically coherent unit. This enables them to transform the book from an informative study to a creative depiction of an informing spirit. Much more, of course, than religious customs is examined. The sociology of the shtetl, the role of women, the values of the shtetl, such as its devotion to learning or its attitude to philanthropy, are studied both as expressions of Jewish tradition and as reactions to a particular environment. The result, consequently, is more than an analysis of Judaism; it becomes rather a synthesis of the constituents of "Jewishness," its outward manifestations and inner implications.

The authors have not been guilty of artificially isolating the shtetl. They describe an "island culture" within an "ocean culture," a minority constantly affected by the majority and often subject to it: the relationship, for instance, of the shtetl Jew to the village peasant, the "Goy" who mysteriously turns into a murderous "pogromchik" overnight and just as suddenly reverts to the role of friendly neighbor. The recurrent terror at the heart of the shtetl is as much a part of its climate as its piety or ingenuity.

"Life Is With People" is not only a memorial to something which in its completeness and purity is gone. It provides an understanding of what remains. Distillations of the culture whose essence was in the shtetl are to be found wherever Jewish communities continue to exist. The differences are superficial; the likenesses often profound. The raw dread of the cowering child in a pogrom and the muffled sensitiveness of an American Jew before the blow of discrimination are part of a related experience. In the Bronx, in Israel, or in Mexico City, no matter how great the local variations, fundamental resemblances in attitudes and values appear. Yet the authors note that the only area in which concerted action among Jews may be expected is that of relief. The reaction to the Hitler catastrophe certainly demonstrated this. But the very

The Next America

PROPHECY AND FAITH

A penetrating analysis of the social forces at work in our society, with an accent on the positive. "A great book, a timely book, an eminently readable book. Third in the series of appraisals of America begun by Lord Bryce in his American Commonwealth and followed by Herbert Croly's Promise of American Life, Lyman Bryson's book comes nearest of all to the real and the ideal America."

The College And The Community

A CRITICAL STUDY OF HIGHER EDUCATION

"A profound diagnosis of the evils of our unstable urban civilization, a powerful attack upon impersonal, anonymous mass-education, and a practical guide to educational reconstruction." —MELVIN RADER, University of Washington. Outspoken in its criticism of the cleavage between the college and its community, this book is undoubtedly the most devastating appraisal of higher education to come from any responsible source in recent years. $3.50

"A thought-provoking book by the 'educational knight errant,' one of the great pedagogical reformers of our time. To some it will be an informed introduction to the changes that foundations have wrought on the American educational front. It will produce violent disagreements in some professional quarters and perhaps a pause for stock-taking."

nature of the response indicates an awareness of a common fate not only in the past but in the present and future. The knowledge that "what happens to Israel happens to Mr. Israel" springs not only from an alert and well-functioning defense mechanism but from a responsiveness to visions and hopes held in common as well as fears. All this "Life Is With People" helps one to perceive—magnificently. If I may be permitted one sour note, why should a book composed with such felicity and grace be afflicted with a cute title and equally cute chapter headings?

MARIE SYRKIN

Hindemith on Music

A COMPOSER'S WORLD. By Paul Hindemith. Harvard University Press. $3.75.

THIS book tells us what one of our great composers thinks about, what his mind is like. And meeting Paul Hindemith's spirited and learned mind is a real pleasure, not only for the intellectual stimulation it offers, but even more for the infectious enjoyment it takes in its own operation, in finding rational explanations, in "philosophizing." Less pleasant though is a recurrent fondness for forcing these meditations together into systems. Again and again, though you are enjoying the brisk intellectual work-out, you wish that Hindemith wouldn't take himself so hard. The sheer range of his thinking, from metaphysics to economics, asks for a lighter touch. Hindemith would be more tactful to try for a tone of easy suggestiveness when he writes as a layman.

In the fields where he has the authority of an expert, as it happens, he shows a becoming modesty. In music history his learning is relaxed and imaginative without loss of precision. His educational theories work with what is, for the most part, a sensibly practical ideal of musical culture, and we are willingly convinced. But in psychology, ethics, aesthetics, he is no more an expert than we should expect a practicing composer to be, and here the systematizing gets to be frankly disturbing. The first four chapters of this book are so many constricted thinking boxes, strong in rigor and self-assurance, weak in insight and authority. What we learn about "perceiving music intellectually" is what we already know, in spite of the illusion of new precision in words like "coconstruction." The third chapter advances lively (though, to this reviewer, dubious) speculations about the way music touches the emotions, but Hindemith's truculent, "let's-have-no-nonsense-here" attitude toward the emotions reminds one unhappily of the village atheist on the subject of God. And this provincial realism jabs with the highly unrealistic over-estimation of music that goes along with it. A serious claim is made that music can touch an infinitely larger range of emotions than the other arts, that its "tempo of consecutive emotions is unbelievably fast." (To cite Shakespeare seems adequate refutation.) There are distinctions between the arts, to be sure, but these don't seem helpful ones; they seem, in fact, defensively boastful. Nor does Hindemith's brusque contempt for less philosophical colleagues seem entirely modest when his own philosophizing yields so dim an illumination.

Again, in the first chapter where Hindemith speaks of converting the musical experience into moral power, you would like some concrete, perhaps personal suggestions about how this might happen. But out come all the tired old metaphors about the power of music. You hear about a "fermenting" quality that turns "our souls to everything noble, superhuman, and ideal"; about music the "catalytic agent" (chemistry's great gift to the tonguetied humanities). Lacking more energetic guesswork about this mysterious process of conversion, Hindemith's loftiness sounds sanctimonious.

The great virtue of the book, and of Hindemith's whole intellectual position, lies in his conception of the ideal musical culture. The health of the body musical, for him, depends on there being a large group, not of passive listeners, but of active amateurs, with professional musicians moving among them as friendly and immediately useful guides and teachers. Hindemith simply wants more people who listen to music to play and sing it too, and with an everyday unpretentiousness—not a new idea, but uncommonly well argued here. The aim is, by linking music once more to modest and intimate social events, to reestablish it as one of the natural bents of the mind, as one of the things a human being does as a part of his nature. Hindemith's picture of this sort of culture in the Renaissance is attractive, and his projection of it into the realizable present is inviting and seems practical. What the listener is promised is a more active pleasure in the musical experience, and a pleasure that comes easily and every day.

The plan is a good one, but what seems its very best feature is something Hindemith is too much of a systematizer to be interested in: the possibility that if music comes to be an active part of our everyday life, we will be able to distinguish more subtly between different kinds of musical experiences, to respond more variously to them, and finally to come to masterpieces with a greater excitement. Hindemith, however, in his eagerness to sell us family part-singing, seems frankly hostile to the more intense musical experiences, even to masterpieces, particularly to anything that smacks of glamour or of the special occasion. All these he has systematized into the present sad degeneration of our musical life, along with Muzak, Hollywood, Bach transcriptions for the Lewisohn Stadium, and the virtuoso's egotism—all must go. But to the realist the loss of Toscanini, Flagstad, and Mathis der Maler is too great a price to pay even for more madrigals.

ROBERT E. GARIS

WILKIE COLLINS. By Kenneth Robinson. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

THE farther away we get from him, the more clearly we can see that the poor Victorian, whose mere inanities and pomposities we have been so zealous to expose, was a deeply split man whom we need to understand more than we need to indict. The most desperately self-made effigy on record, he represents the final attempt to hold onto the image of man which began with the Renaissance and crystallized by 1700: the image in which the conscious, rational faculties are not only dominant, but self-sufficient and potentially exclusive. The full flower of this point of view, as far as its manifestation in English literature is concerned, was Samuel Johnson. The first reaction to it was what now appears to have been the shrewdly functional madness of Christopher Smart (how else, except under the cover of dementia, could he have written anything but his prize poems?). But by the nineteenth century every real poet, from Coleridge to Beddoes, and Swinburne to Lear, knew the truth: that man does not live by Awareness alone, that at best he is a biped, and advances stepwise, by consciousness and unconsciousness, by living and being-lived.

At the same time that he believed in the Crystal Palace and endorsed Tennyson's singsong ideal of "household happiness, gracious children, debtless competence, golden mean," the Victorian man on the street knew this too. He wouldn't acknowledge it, of course, but he was haunted by the most harrowing sense of the demoniac that Western man had known for five hundred years. What else could have impelled him to surround himself with such implacably material extremes as he did? Look at his furniture. Look at his tombstones. Look at his wife's clothes. Look at his reading matter. Plenty of pap, yes; his anxiety needed as much furbelowed assurance as possible. But beyond this, look at his compulsive fascination for the terrible, the unfathomable, the ghoulis, the mysterious. As Chesterton pointed out, the two most popular story tellers of their day, Dickens and Wilkie Collins, combined "a modern and Cockney and even commonplace opinion about things with a huge elemental sympathy with strange oracles and spirits and old night. . . . There were no two men in mid-Victorian England more typical of its rationality and dull reform; and there were no two men who could touch them at a ghost story." Of the two, Dickens, with the more ramifying, personal genius, makes the less pure case. But after reading Kenneth Robinson's new biography, we can safely call Collins the true, the model Victorian.

To begin with, he was neurotically industrious. He never missed a deadline in his life, and when he was dying and handed over his current serial to Walter Besant to be finished, his notes had worked the plot out to its minutest details. He left almost thirty long novels, and dozens of plays and shorter stories, the best of which, apart from their sheer capacity to hold the reader's interest, are chiefly notable for the intricate, painstaking architecture they brought to the careless sprawl of the mid-century "nuv-ve" as practiced by Dickens. More than anyone else, it was Collins who instigated the well-made serial to which James later adapted his own industry, refinement, and vision. In a Collins novel, not only were the plot details meticulously synchronized, but much of the effectiveness of the story derived from the ingenious use of shifting narrators. Now this explicit, rigorous, and quite gratuitous concern with an orderly shape and progress is no less significant in Collins's case than it is in Poe's, or Baudelaire's, or Tennyson's. Auden once suggested, in connection with Tennyson, that "the more a writer is conscious of an inner disorder and dread, the more value he will place on tidiness in his work as a defence." I don't think it's infractious to find a novel like "Armada," which is Collins's most ambitious, a case in point. For here we have not only a bravura job of plot complication, but in the story itself a sustained image of a man's helplessness before his sense of the uncontrollably fated in human experience and of the inefficacy of mere consciousness. It was Collins, too, who practiced for the first time in England that acutely symptomatic genre, the detective story, which is not only as "closed" a form as the novel admits, but in which, a priori, everything that happens must do so for the sake of unraveling neatly and securely in the end and in which the hero is a rational all-father who sees that it does.

In his private life, Collins was no less Victorian. By way of skeletons in his closet, he used opium; made periodic forays into the unmentionable nightlife of Paris; and though he was a nominal bachelor all his life, kept, simultaneously, both a mistress and what he called a "morganatic wife," by whom his will acknowledged three children. The son of a prominent Royal Academy painter who did sea-scapes for George IV, Collins grew up in the well-heeled (and well brought-to-heel) Bohemian society which James's stories of artists rather improbably portray. He discovered his vocation before he was twenty-one, beginning with an official biography of his father and moving on to a Bulwer-Lytton romance. In a few years, he had become a regular contributor to Dickens' Household Words, and after the publication in 1860 of "The Woman in White," he was almost as famous as his editor. He made a fortune; grew a beard; indulged himself with sailboats and French cooking; suffered agonies from the gout; and died in 1889, promulgating a furore over whether or not he should be buried in Westminster Abbey (he wasn't).

Since then a number of illustrious writers—Swinburne, Walter de la Mare, Dorothy Sayers, Eliot—have praised his novels (each of them, by the way, being significant for his own flair for the demoniac). But Kenneth Robinson has been the first to offer a full biography. Working with scant materials—for there is actually very little known of Collins's personal life—he has given us as thorough and serviceable a portrait as we need. (Though he might, I think, have made some mention of Edgar Poe, whose stories Collins surely knew, if only through Dickens, who had been in correspondence with Poe as early as 1842, over a review of "Barnaby Rudge" which Poe had criticized precisely in point of its loose construction.)

What we could use now, if there is a publisher in the house, is a cheap, unscholarly reprint of "Armadale," and maybe a selection of the shorter tales. For though in themselves Collins's stories are not of even secondary value, they remain not only magnetically readable, but their total image is a far more revealing index to the nineteenth-century consciousness than the works of many a more touted writer: say Trollope, or Thackeray, or even Meredith.

Books in Brief

THE ELLEN KNAUFF STORY. By Ellen Raphael Knauff. Norton. $3.50. A first-person story by the German war bride who was barred from this country in the erroneous belief that she had acted as a spy while employed by the American Army of Occupation, and who won admission only after a three-year battle with the Immigration Department. The crux of the case was the fact that the alien has no rights but only privileges and that his admission is in the hands of Immigration officials who often act on the basis of hearsay or confidential information that the accused has little or no chance to controvert. Under the circumstances and in view of the apparent strength of the case made against Mrs. Knauff by informers who were either prejudiced or mistaken, it is amazing and, on the whole, encouraging that Mrs. Knauff was able to fight her case through to victory even with the aid of a devoted husband, an excellent lawyer, and the support of influential newspapers.

GLORY ROAD. By Bruce Catton. Doubleday. $4.50. This history of the Army of the Potomac from Fredericksburg to Gettysburg can be recommended without qualification. Mr. Cat-

ton's preceding volume, "Mr. Lincoln's Army," was called in these pages "a splendid example of popular interpretative history." His new book is at least as interesting in its material and equally graphic in its presentation. Based on letters, diaries, regimental histories, reminiscences, and reports, it has the great merit of immediacy; of forcing the reader, as it were, to participate in the stupidities and heroisms of these campaigns and the experiences of the men who did the fighting.

THE GREAT GOD PAN. By Robert Payne. Hermitage House. $3.75. A lyrical analysis and appreciation of Chaplin as the modern reincarnation of Pan and inheritor of the art of Pierrot, Punch, Harlequin, and the great mimes and clowns of history. After thus tracing his artistic ancestry, the author describes his development, film by film, from "Kid Auto Races at Venice," the first farce in which he appeared "wearing his strange, subtle and faintly terrifying mask," down through "Monsieur Verdoux." One of the best of the forty-five books of which this assiduous young man is the author.

THE EXTRAORDINARY MR. MORRIS. By Howard Swiggett. Doubleday. $5. The publication some years ago of the Gouverneur Morris Diaries revealed this aristocrat of the Revolution to have been a brisk, exuberant lover and a complex and fascinating man. As a writer Mr. Swiggett is no great shakes, but by leaning heavily on the diaries and on letters he has produced a biography filled with lively incidents and illuminating characterizations and observations, particularly of the Reign of Terror which Morris witnessed at first hand as Minister to France.

POEMS OF MR. JOHN MILTON. The 1645 Edition. Edited, with Essays in Analysis, by Cleanth Brooks and John Edward Hardy. Harcourt, Brace. $5. The student of Milton—it would have to be a student—who applies himself to this volume will be confronted with serious business, both in the matter and the manner. Feeling that previous Miltonian scholarship has been too little concerned with the poems as poems, the editors here direct the student by close reading to arrive at evaluation; they offer in the end not final judgment but only "preliminary scaffolding, or, to change the metaphor . . . rough contour maps of the poems." Yes, but. The trouble is that a tractable temperament might well be completely satisfied with what he has been told; the maps are so detailed, the lines so firmly drawn, that it would take a resilient and hardy spirit to insist on further exploration.

THE CHATTANOOGA COUNTRY, 1840-1951. By Gilbert E. Govan and James W. Livingood. Dutton. $5. An excellent addition to the growing list of American regional histories. As frontier territory, as the scene of one of the bloodiest campaigns of the Civil War, as an early industrial center of the South, and as TVA country, the Chattanooga region has had an exceptionally picturesque history which the authors describe in a book of somewhat more than local interest.

Drama

KRUTCH

THE CHASE (Playhouse Theater) is the latest offering to be directed by the currently indefatigable José Ferrer. By now the earmarks of his product are beginning to be recognizable and "The Chase," like "The Shrike," might be described as topical melodrama. My colleague of the Herald Tribune called it "a Western with ethical commercials," which is more picturesque as well as more unkind and also raises the grave question whether or not the best interests of either melodrama or ethics are served by the combination. Certainly the total effect of the present work is no better than so-so.

The scene is a small Texas town which happens to have elected a very upright and somewhat introverted sheriff. A local bad boy who had graduated from youthful delinquent to full-fledged killer has just escaped from the penitentiary and is momentarily expected back to kill the sheriff who caught him last time. The town is up in arms. It wants the killer killed, not captured again, and it has begun to organize a lynching mob. But the sheriff hates violence; he has some vague feeling that that the community may just possibly be partly responsible for the criminal; and he is determined at all events to take the killer alive. Then, at the last moment, he himself loses his head and shoots the victim down. Next morning he is back in his office convinced that he has somehow failed in his duty and ready to make a fresh start. He will have a talk with a twelve-year-old whose mother has phoned in that she can no longer control him.

The principal difficulty seems to be not so much that ethical considerations interfere with melodrama as that no one is much disposed to thought while murderers are peeping through windows and revolvers are being flourished in all directions. In art as in life it tends to be true that passion and violence get the attention when they have an opportunity to bid for it and that only when they are recollected in tranquillity can they themselves be thought about. Melodrama accepts this fact frankly and generally simplifies a given situation very much as passion and violence simplify it. The villain is a villain, the hero is a hero, and when the right man gets killed we have no doubt that he should have been.

"The Chase," on the other hand, is content with nothing so simple. It asks us to think clearly in the midst of excitement and in asking that it asks the impossible. In fact it seems to have asked the impossible of the author himself since it can hardly be argued that he makes any important contribution to the solution of the questions he raises. Melodrama wins if anything does and the principal effect of the "ethical commercials" is, first, to slow the action down, second, to deprive the audience of an important part of melodrama's simple satisfactions by preventing that perfect identification with the hero upon which those satisfactions depend. Perhaps in this particular case there are commercial justifications. Perhaps an audience a little ashamed of melodrama will assure itself that what it is seeing is a sort of problem play. But commercial justifications are not necessarily artistic ones and "The Chase" is not thoughtful enough to be a play of social significance, not simple enough to be a first-class melodrama.

John Hodiak gives an effective, straightforward performance as the sheriff and Kim Hunter a pleasant one as his troubled wife.

COMING barely a week after the shrewdly contrived trash of Menotti's "Amahl," the ANTA revival of Gertrude Stein's and Virgil Thomson's "Four Saints in Three Acts" provided a refreshing experience of real and distinguished theater art. The album of the Victor recording of "Four Saints" quotes a statement by Thomson about "the poet's liberties with logic and the composer's constant use of the simplest elements in our musical vernacular" to evoke "something . . . of the childlike gaiety and mystical strength of lives devoted in common to a non-materialistic end. . . ." And it is true that one hears only "the simplest elements in our musical vernacular"; but it is also true that one hears a "constant use of them"—that is, a mind constantly at work with them for its purposes; and this activity produces something complex and original which achieves brilliantly the "childlike gaiety and mystical strength" of its objective.

Concerning the method of the activity and its results I can say nothing more than what I said ten years ago: "By separating and differentiating the repetitions of ■ Gertrude Stein verbal sequence Thomson's music articulates them, gives them point and even sense; the music also imparts to them its own structure and climax; and its effect is often the most delightful humor. Some of the humor consists in skilful musical pointing up—by the high-lighting of a group of words, the placing of it in relation to its context—of Miss Stein's surprises and irrelevances of juxtaposition; and to these Thomson adds occasional incongruities of his contriving between words and music—words of little or no sense or weight, musical style and structure of great emotional import and weight. But when such music is given to words like the 'led, said, wed, dead' sequence the result is very moving."

As for the production, it has the superb singing of Inez Matthews, Martha Flowers, Rawn Spearman, Edward Matthews, and some of the other principals and the chorus (prepared by William Jonson) of the Negro cast; and their charming acting and stylized movement in which they were directed by William Dollar. I have a recollection, however, of scenery and costumes in the 1934 production handsomer than the new ones by Paul Morrison "after the original models by Florine Stettheimer," according to the program (Stark Young's 1934 review attributes the original costumes to Kate Lawson). My recollection is of a backdrop of a delicate tint, instead of the almost garish blue of the new one; of costumes for the dancers that were in harmony with the rest, instead of their obtrusive—and, in the tango number, ugly—present costumes. And my recollection is of movements devised for the dancers by Frederick Ashton which also were in harmony with the others, instead of the present dance movements devised by Mr. Dollar whose style and tone are ■ recurrent unpleasant false note in the occasion of childlike gaiety and innocence.

But even with its defects the new production gives us something outstanding and distinguished in our theater.

Rubinstein's newly recorded performances of Chopin's Polonaises on a 12-inch and a 10-inch RCA Victor LP are more grandiosely proclamatory than the ones on the old 78 s—which means that they distend and even distort the music that is treated with quieter sensitiveness and elegance on the old records. And in addition there is the difference between the clanging sound of his American Steinway piano and the sound of the Hamburg Steinway (the most beautiful in the world) in the old performances. The best of the works are all on the 12-inch record.

There is some interest in following the operation of Haydn's mind in the Piano Sonatas Nos. 23 and 32 on a Haydn Society record; and perhaps the operation would be more impressive and exciting if Robert Wallenborn pointed up the detail that is so uneventful in his fluent performances. As he plays the works only the slow movement of No. 23 is outstanding.

Debussy's "En blanc et noir" for two pianos, played this time by Vronsky and Babin, I again find uninteresting. The performance seems good; and the Columbia record also offers a two-piano arrangement of music from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

Rachmaninov's superb performance of Schumann's "Carnaval" has been dubbed onto a Victor LP which reproduces it excellently.

Less valuable are most of the performances on Victor's LP record Great Pianists of the Past Play Chopin. De Pachmann's and Rosenthal's playing is as mannered as most of the singing of their time; Paderewski is more straightforward—but only for a time; Levitzki is fluent but without any force; Cortot plays the Berceuse with constant changes of pace, whereas the character of the piece requires a single tempo to be maintained throughout; Rachmaninov indulges in distortions; and only Lhévinne plays with simplicity and continuity of phrase outline in what I consider an effective performance of the Polonaise in A flat.

Columbia has dubbed onto LP all the old Weingartner recordings of Beethoven's symphonies; and I have heard the "Eroica," the Eighth, and the Ninth. I feel ■ need for more intensity in the "Eroica"; but in its unemphatic way the performance is good, except for some changes of pace in the first two movements; the recorded sound suffers from excessive reverberation, excessive bass, stridency of the violins, and distortion near the ends of sides. The first two movements of the Eighth are well done; the third is a little deliberate but acceptable; the slow tempo deprives the finale of its mercurial quality, and the pauses before the fortissimo bumps spoil their effect; the recorded sound gets muffled at the end. The placid first movement of the Ninth is something strictly for the Weingartnerites; the second movement is well done, as is the third (the violin figuration in variation 2 is inaudible) up to the coda, where I find the slower pace unconvincing (the sound is distorted here); the performance of the finale is good except for the fast tempos which destroy the effect of the wonderful Andante maestoso and Adagio divoto sections; the vocal soloists are unusually good, though the soprano breaks her last formidable ascent to high B both before and after the A sharp; the recorded sound is muffled at the end.

CORRECTION: In my comment last week on the Sadler's Wells Theater Ballet a sentence was misprinted. It should have read: As for John Cranko, I liked best his comedy "Pineapple Poll," and least his philosophical piece "Harlequin in April."

Letters to the Editors

Is the Issue Congress . . .

Dear Sirs: I do not think that Willard Shelton should be allowed to get away with his weird and irresponsible review of Blair Bolles's book "How to Get Rich in Washington" [The Nation, April 12]. The review is characterized by a clear disregard of the facts, violent prejudice, and, apparently, deliberate distortion.

For example, Mr. Shelton says: "Nor does he [Bolles] seem to realize that some of the RFC's most harshly criticized loans were at least vaguely justified under a Congressional injunction that 'small business' should be helped." It is too bad that Mr. Shelton did not read the book as far as pp. 131-32 where this section of the 1948 RFC act is quoted and discussed in detail.

Mr. Shelton states that "even half-way smart financiers" avoid upper-bracket tax rates by manipulating the capital-gains provision. This is no doubt true to some extent, but it in no way contradicts the plain facts Bolles quotes on pp. 24-25 to substantiate the occurrence of a "tax revolution" since 1944. Whatever Mr. Shelton may imagine smart financiers are doing, the fact remains that in 1929 internal-revenue collections took 2.8 per cent of the value of all the goods the country produced and in 1949 took 15.6 per cent.

The review scoffs at the statement that regulatory agencies "tend to become prisoners of the interests they are supposed to regulate" which one would have supposed had become accepted by everyone as a truism. Mr. Shelton points to the pallid renaissance of the Federal Trade Commission as proof of his thesis although this can scarcely offset the devastating material the author assembles to prove his case against the FPC, the CAB, and the old Maritime Commission.

Mr. Shelton naively suggests that Senator Kerr's friendship with President Truman had nothing to do with the FPC's ruling in favor of the natural-gas interests. Mr. Shelton blames Congress, which had given "warning signs that any timid commissioner could read." The fact, of course, is that the key vote in the three-to-two decision was cast by Mon Wallgren, who had already announced his decision to retire and who did so some two months later. What terrors could Congress hold for him if he was going out anyway?

A doctrinaire prejudice against Congress runs through this review. No one is going to praise the recent Congresses very much, but how can their sins exonerate Mr. Truman for appointing Boyle, Caudle, Nunan, Tom Clark, et al. in the first place?

Indeed, the whole thesis of Mr. Bolles's book is that the present corruption is a broad, complex, political question and not one of simple moral black-and-whites or of Congress vs. the Executive.

But then any reviewer who could compare this urbane and careful study to the nonsense of Lait and Mortimer is suspect in any case.

Washington WILLIAM V. SHANNON

. . . Versus the President?

Dear Sirs: "Getting away" with a review expressing doubt of the virtues of Mr. Bolles's book is not so much of a trick as Mr. Shannon thinks. Otherwise he might have been able to stick to specifics instead of slipping into a peroration impugning my motives and integrity.

My disagreement with Mr. Bolles involves the question of cures rather than of the diseases he describes. Even in handling the diseases, in my opinion, his diagnosis errs. "Washington itself has become J. P. Morgan." This is no better than a half-truth. Is speculative investment dead in our country? Do oilmen get rich primarily from RFC loans or from tax favors from Congress—as well as, no doubt, some drive, ambition, and skill on their own part? I don't think that one paragraph on pp. 131-132 of what Mr. Shannon calls "discussion in detail," in which Mr. Bolles quotes part of the 1948 RFC statute, substitutes for adequate consideration of the social values of the RFC.

I naively shrink from imputations unsupported by evidence in what purports to be a documented political study. I said I doubted—and I still doubt—the insinuation that the Phillips Petroleum case—in which Senator Kerr was interested—was decided as it was because Truman told Mon Wallgren (or because Truman's desires somehow seeped to Wallgren) to vote for Kerr, as a specific result of Kerr's support of Truman in the MacArthur fight. An $80,000 Hoax

❖ During the past month, statements circulated in various newspapers and radio news broadcasts have created the impression that District 65, Distributive, Processing and Office Workers of America, secretly diverted $80,000 of its funds to provide bail for Communist Party officials.

❖ We hereby serve notice that such statements are wholly unfounded and untrue. District 65 did not give $80,000 nor did this union give as much as 8 cents for bail for Communist Party officials, or divert a single solitary penny from proper union functions.

❖ The circulation of such rumors is an act of shameful irresponsibility against the public, and a libelous aspersion against the 32,000 men and women who constitute the membership of District 65.

❖ It is our belief that such rumors have their origin in a vile conspiracy aimed at undermining one of the cleanest and most democratic trade unions in America.

insinuation is there—clear and unmistakable—on pp. 19-20. Has Mr. Bolles any evidence other than his juxtaposition of separate facts? Has Mr. Shannon?

The Phillips case was not decided three to two by the FPC, as Mr. Shannon thinks, but four to one, with Commissioner Draper concurring in the decision but dissenting in part from Wallgren's majority opinion. So three commissioners who were not on their way out, who had not announced their forthcoming resignations, voted with Wallgren. How did Truman give them their orders and tell them to pay off politically to good old Bob Kerr? Neither Mr. Bolles nor Mr. Shannon vouchsafes. To me it seems possible that their decision was dictated by their honest judgment, and that Kerr's and the Senate's belief about what was likely to be their honest judgment was responsible for their confirmation. To me it also seems possible that they also observed the Senate witch-burning of Leland Olds when Olds was up for another term after fighting for regulation of the Phillips company.

A "doctrinaire prejudice against Congress" indeed! I suppose I should now call Mr. Shannon guilty of a "doctrinaire prejudice against the Presidency" because he—as I have done many times—criticizes some Truman appointments. I see no lèse majesté against the legislature in suggesting that the performance of the administrative agencies would be improved by a better Congress, one less scandalously gerrymandered in favor of rural districts and against urban interests, one more accurately representative of our people, one more responsive to what I consider the general welfare (non-doctrinaire variety). I cling to my weird notion that a shift in the political pressures in Congress would do more to improve the tone of the administrative agencies than any change Mr. Bolles suggests.

If Mr. Shannon wants to add a better President, all right. But I assume he knows that the long deterioration of the New Deal began when the conservative coalition captured Congress in 1938.

I consider many of Mr. Bolles's proposed remedies for evils disclosed by Congressional committees ill considered or scarcely considered at all. I do not think he has placed his scene accurately in the context of American history and political institutions.

For example, he writes on p. 218 that "independence" of the administrative agencies "will be a mirage" so long as the President appoints their members, and suggests that "some system" be worked out so that the President and Congress "can collaborate" in choosing key men. What gibberish is this? Does he comprehend the function of the Presidency and the "collaboration" already existing in the form of Senate confirmation? I am wary of vague prescriptions for "some system" the nature of which in our constitutional order is left undefined. Also, wisecracking subtitles such as the one that conveys the spirit of Bolles's book: "Rich Man's Division of the Welfare State."

WILLARD SHELTON

Fair-Trade Legislation

Dear Sirs: Your March 22 editorial on Fair Trade relies on something less than thorough reporting to reach its conclusion, with which I agree.

The House Judiciary subcommittee on monopoly power considered not only HR 4365, which would repeal the Miller-Tydings amendment to the Sherman act, but also HR 4592, HR 4662, and HR 6367. The last-named (known as the Keogh bill) would amend the Sherman act to get around not only the Schwegmann decision, voiding the non-signer clause, but also the Wentling decision, which weakened fair-trade laws as they apply to mail-order sales across state lines. The other two would amend the Miller-Tydings amendment simply to validate the non-signer clause.

Following open hearings, the full Judiciary Committee accepted the subcommittee recommendation of HR 6925, a rewritten Keogh bill, reporting it to the House on March 13, which you do not mention. Mr. Celler, chairman of both sub- and full committee, deserves commendation for his dissent, in which Mr. Jonas and Mr. Bakewell concurred.

It was not the I. C. C., as you stated, but the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, to which the McGuire bill (HR 5767) was referred. This aimed at the same end as the Keogh bill, but by amending the Federal Trade Commission act. It also provided criminal penalties, but after hearings (February 4-20) an ad hoc subcommittee, under Mr. Priest, dropped them before endorsing the bill. The full committee (with one opposed and two voting "present," but with no dissenting report) reported the bill favorably on February 27, which seems soon enough for mention on March 22. . . . Operation Albacore

San Francisco

LAST September, while the Japanese peace treaty was being signed in San Francisco, hundreds of albacore (tuna) fishing boats, bedecked in gala bunting and with loud-speakers blaring, paraded in the bay publicizing what they charged was the first result of Secretary Acheson's "soft peace"—ruin of the American tuna industry. The fishermen demanded a tariff on the frozen fish from Japan—and Peru—that was flooding the home market at $225 a ton. Actually $225 would not cover the bare cost of operation of American boats.

Tuna fishermen have engaged in a perennial running battle with the big canners over price, though as late as 1949 they were able to get $750 a ton for their fish. The price had dropped to less than half that by the beginning of the 1951 season, and then the duty-free imported tuna knocked the bottom out.

The Fishermen's Union, since 1949 an affiliate of Harry Bridges's International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (I. L. W. U.), had for years tried through organization to equalize the bargaining relationship between the small boat-owners and the packers. Its efforts were blocked several years ago when the federal government pressed a damaging restraint-of-trade case against the union, which it accused of fixing the selling price to canners.

At the start of the 1951 season John Pastorino, secretary of Fishermen's Local 3-34 (I. L. W. U.) of San Francisco, got the idea of going out on the run himself that summer. All tuna boats are equipped with two-way radio telephones. As Pastorino followed the warm stream up the coast from Mexico with the rest of the fleet, he engaged in long dialogues with other fishermen about their common grievances, plugging the union whenever he could. It was an unusual kind of organizing campaign.

Early in October the boats hit a solid run of tuna around Morro Bay, but before they completed their catch a squall drove them into port. The dealers on shore would not touch the fish at the price asked. The men held a council of war and agreed they would let the fish rot rather than sell at the ruinous price offered. "I tell you what we ought to do," one fisherman pitched in. "We ought to try and sell that fish directly to the public."

Albacore fishermen had made other attempts to sell their fish directly, but they had always run into official red tape. However, with the I. L. W. U. backing them, they figured maybe they could succeed this time. A couple of crab stands were rented on the famous Fisherman's Wharf. In two days the albacore catch was being sold to the public at 25 cents a pound by the whole fish, less than half the current price.

The idea caught fire swiftly. After a day or two markets were opened in Oakland and other towns across the bay, in Sacramento and Stockton, in Santa Clara and Salinas, and finally in Los Angeles, where sales soon totaled as much as at all the other outlets combined.

Some advertising was done by the union at first, but it soon became unnecessary as newspapers and radios gave the novel idea spectacular treatment. Since most people had never tasted tuna before it was confined in its "tin prison," the union hired television time and put on demonstration-cooking programs. Mimeographed recipes were given out with every purchase; variety was stressed, since tuna comes big, averaging twelve to fifteen pounds, enough meat for a family for several meals. Buyers came from all walks of life. "Where has this fish been all our lives?" the Stockton Record demanded.

But it was the middle-income consumer who was most appreciative. Protein-conscious housewives found this the best buy on the market. Neighbors teamed up and bought a fish between them. Meanwhile, most people seemed to be getting the point the union kept making indefatigably: that by supporting its selling campaign the consumer was helping to beat the monopolies as well as making it possible for the fishermen to earn a decent living. Everybody benefits, was the common feeling. One buyer demanded: "Why don't you go out and organize the cowboys, so we can get the same deal on beef?"

Nearly two million pounds of fish were disposed of in this manner, involving some 150,000 individual sales. The fishermen received $300 a ton for their catch—enough to guarantee a modest profit. Encouraged by this experience, the union opened a crab market on the wharf and sold the shellfish for 25 cents a pound live, 30 cents cooked, the lowest prices in years.

Does this indicate a new course for the ailing West Coast fishing industry? The I. L. W. U. itself is doubtful about the project, which it does not consider a legitimate long-term trade-union activity. Nor does it believe that the tariff, which it has supported in solidarity with other fishermen, strikes at the root of the trouble. Japanese tuna, I. L. W. U. leaders maintain, can be sold here so cheaply because the earnings of Japanese fishermen are so low. A decent wage for these workers would eliminate the pressure to sell abroad, whereas a tariff might have the effect of driving down still farther the miserable Japanese pay.

Yet it is difficult to rule out the tariff solution. Other proposals appear far-fetched in comparison. The Northwest's salmon industry is in as bad a state as tuna fishing as the result of a cut of from 25 to 15 per cent in the duty on Canadian-caught fish. The campaign for higher duties on both salmon and tuna will undoubtedly increase. The House adopted a $60-a-ton duty on imported tuna shortly before adjourning last December. Pressure is now being put on the Senate to follow suit.

But use of the "new market" discovered by the I. L. W. U. seems too tempting to resist. The Fishermen's Union (A. F. of L.) in San Diego, "the tuna capital of the world," has asked the big packers to share the expense of a great promotion campaign to develop this market and get the tuna industry out of its deep depression.

Is there a lesson in all of this for other industries which may soon be confronted with similar competition from our economic wards, the Japanese?

The Shape of Things

The Meaning of Israel

The fourth birthday of the state of Israel calls for more than the outpouring of admiration, wonder, and congratulations with which it was greeted in last week's celebration. The event was an affirmation, much needed today, that, given faith in its principles and purposes, a democratic cause can overcome great odds and survive. Israel provides dramatic proof of the vitality of that faith. Born out of a struggle against invading forces, faced with the staggering problem of creating a government in the midst of war, Israel might have been excused if it had suspended some of its democratic principles in deference to the "emergency." But it did not; and as a result it has achieved an amazing degree of integration and security—in spite of the immense financial difficulties that burden it—without forfeiting one atom of its integrity. The existence of Israel in the oppressed and backward region of the Middle East will prove of immense significance to that area in the years to come. It has almost as much meaning for the West—if the West knows how to read the lesson of this tiny country's survival.

"Released Time"

The Supreme Court's decision, written by Justice Douglas, upholding the New York released-time program (see The Nation, February 9), represents a clear reversal of its position on the McCollum case in Illinois. Except that in the earlier case the religious instruction was to be given inside the public schools, rather than outside, it is impossible to distinguish the Illinois system, which was held invalid, from the New York system, which has now been upheld. In fact the court intended in the McCollum case to make it "categorically clear"—as Justice Black pointed out in his dissenting opinion last week—that released time was unconstitutional even if the religious instruction were to be given off public-school premises; on or off, the effect is to "manipulate the compelled classroom hours of the compulsory public-school system." The only way to avoid this is to dismiss all students for a stated period each week.

It is impossible to escape the force of the conclusions reached by Justice Jackson—who also dissented—that the New York released-time program utilizes the public schools "as a temporary jail for students who will not go to church." In other words, the coercive power of the state is used to assist religious sects in violation of the First Amendment. The consequences of this initial breach in the wall separating church and state were dramatically foreshadowed in Jackson's dissent: "... The day that this country ceases to be free for irreligion it will cease to be free for religion—except for the sect that can win political power. . . . We start down a rough road when we begin to mix compulsory public education with compulsory godliness. . . ."

Bad Days in Buenos Aires

May 1 was a bad day for the Perón regime. On that day the Argentine dictator, addressing Parliament, admitted that his country was facing a desperate economic crisis for which he could offer no sure cure. And on the same day a group of noted Argentine exiles protested to the United Nations that Perón had tortured hundreds of political prisoners in a "reign of pure terror" over their unhappy land.

Neither development came as a surprise to regular Nation readers. In our issue of April 19, Alvarez del Vayo exclusively predicted the protest to the United Nations and detailed some of the torture charges. And our last week's issue, which went to press several days before Perón's speech, carried a remarkable and timely analysis of the Argentine economic crisis under the headline Perón Through in '52?

As an additional service to our readers, we hope soon to be able to repeat the headline—this time without the question mark.

labor, professions, politics, government, and the public to discuss major problems confronting the country. It was a pet project of the General's, who thought it "the most important step" he had taken as Columbia's president; he said it would give the nation's leaders a needed "pause to think."

Now the joker: Arden House, site of the Assembly, a handsome estate at Harriman, New York, was presented as a gift to the pet project of General Eisenhower, candidate for the Republican nomination for President, by W. Averell Harriman, candidate for the Democratic nomination. The American Assembly is thus a happy reminder of the friendship and similarity of interests and outlook which exist between these rivals for the highest post in the land.

This year's sessions will be devoted to a discussion of "Inflation: Causes, Consequences, and Cures." If General Eisenhower and Mr. Harriman could both attend, if the proceedings were open to press, radio, and television, the American people would also be given a pause to think—and not only about inflation.

Tunisian Dynamite

Tunisia again forced itself on the unwilling attention of the United Nations when twelve Arab-Asian and seventeen Latin American delegations met last week to hear Professor Ahmed Bokhari of Pakistan reiterate his conviction that the Security Council had committed a grave error in refusing to deal with the issue. The majority of the Latin American delegates, in accordance with the position taken in the Security Council by Chile and Brazil, registered themselves in favor of calling a special session of the General Assembly to deal with Tunisia's complaint, and have submitted the matter to their governments.

Meanwhile news coming direct from Tunisia shows that the situation there is no less precarious than two months ago when, under French orders, the Bey was obliged to replace the Chenik Cabinet with a hand-picked collection of civil servants who are ministers in name only. The "Premier," M. Baccouche, represents nobody but the French Resident General, M. de Haute-cloque. Continuing friction between the Bey and his new Cabinet has brought the routine administrative work of the government almost to a standstill. The appointment of the Mixed Commission to study the program of gradual reform suggested by the French has been postponed until May 20; it had been announced for April 24. Discontent increases and the Tunisian trade unions are now preparing for another big fight. Terroristic acts met by harsh repression give daily proof that it is no longer possible to handle this smoldering nationalist rebellion by halfhearted palliatives too long delayed.

Steel Seizure—

Threat Against Labor

THE issues involved in the President's attempt to seize the steel plants are in danger of being obscured by the government's ineptness, the arbitrary action of Judge David A. Pine, and the merits of the labor dispute itself.

On the merits, the steel workers have a powerful case (see The Nation, March 29, 1952), but this fact should not divert attention from the basic constitutional issues. Similarly, the Administration's inexcusably clumsy handling of the dispute, including its legal aspects, should not divert attention from the role that Congress has played in forcing the Administration to act as it has acted. In the same way, Judge Pine's attempt to dispose of a fundamental constitutional issue on a mere motion for a temporary injunction and his unsupported finding of "irreparable damage" do not alter the fact that his decision was basically a sound one.

Nothing in the Constitution, directly or by implication, authorizes the President to take the step he did, nor was the seizure authorized by act of Congress. In seeking to justify it in terms of the President's "inherent powers," Assistant Attorney General Holmes Baldridge was jockeyed into the untenable position that while the Constitution limits the powers of the courts and Congress, it does not limit the powers of the President.

But the legal issue also hinges on a basic factual issue. Neither the President nor Congress has power to order the seizure of a plant or an industry except in some grave national emergency affecting the security of the country. In speaking of the "awful result" of a steel strike, Judge Pine apparently assumed the existence of such an emergency. But if it does exist, then the Administration has been highly inconsistent in its actions and policies. On March 25, it authorized major increases in the production of passenger cars, washing machines, and other consumer goods after July 1; and on April 8, in a speech at Detroit, Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer predicted that the government would lift steel controls "before many months go by—perhaps in early 1953." Some months back the defense mobilizers extended the military program for a year longer than originally planned; it will not be completed now until 1955. Similarly, delivery of military items has been deliberately delayed to allow more time to work out better designs before production schedules were frozen.

If these decisions were proper, then the government is now crying "wolf, wolf" to justify an unconstitutional action. Although precise figures are not available, it has been estimated that the total available steel supply is sufficient to continue production, including military production, for sixty days or longer. And the talk about "emergencies" becomes even more puzzling when one reads that Nathan P. Feinsinger, chairman of the WSB, thinks that the union and the industry were "very, very close" to an agreement before the President acted and states that he had himself recommended against seizure.

The issue, we suspect, does not turn so much on the question of whether a cessation in steel production will endanger national security as it does on how and by what means labor is to be "controlled." If this is the case, then government seizure has dangerous long-range implications for the labor movement. Under Section 3 of the seizure order, the Secretary of Commerce was directed to recognize the right of workers to bargain collectively, "provided that such activities do not interfere with the operation of such plants, facilities, and other properties." Three times since the war President Truman has "seized" the railroads to prevent strikes; in fact the railroads have been under nominal army operation since August, 1950. "The only concrete effect of this seizure," Senator James E. Murray reported to his colleagues on March 28, "has been to stall all attempts at a settlement between the carriers and the operating railroad unions which are parties to the two-year-old dispute. The effect of the seizure has been further to resolve the dispute in favor of the carriers simply because the unions are deprived of the sanctions they could exercise if the roads were nominally in private hands."

Actually "seizure" is a phony procedure; nothing much happens except that strikes become "strikes against the government" and the government remains liable for losses. This is why Judge Pine's finding of "irreparable damage" to the companies is absurd. On the other hand, partisans of the President should note that in the argument before the Circuit Court of Appeals, Mr. Baldridge—once again speaking out of turn—said quite frankly that the government would enjoin the strikers if the seizure were reinstated. It is worth noting, moreover, that the conservative press is demanding that the President invoke the provisions of the Taft-Hartley act. Should an injunction be obtained, a curious situation would arise in which the government had been ruled powerless to coerce the companies but could force the workers to continue at their jobs for an additional eighty days for the benefit of private profit-making enterprises. One law for the companies, another for the workers.

In the present situation Congress is as much at fault as the President. After shouting "dictator" and hurling the threat of impeachment at the President, Congress simply walked out on the steel dispute by adjourning for the Easter recess. And it has continued to duck its responsibilities: about the only suggestion that has come from it has been a proposal for still another Congressional investigation. If the President's action in ordering seizure was dictatorial, the default of Congress was in part responsible. Government-by-decree is always justified in terms of some "emergency," real or imagined; but the basic explanation is usually to be found in a political crisis which has resulted in a deadlock between the executive and legislative branches of government. It is at least arguable that if such a deadlock had not existed, the President would have asked Congress to impose controls at the outbreak of the Korean war instead of permitting the situation to get out of hand, thereby setting in motion the chain reaction which precipitated the steel dispute. A decision by the Supreme Court may settle the legal issue, but only a resolution of the political crisis which has brought about the deadlock between Congress and the White House can check the threat of "government-by-decree."

Our Readers Prefer Douglas

THE results of The Nation's preferential poll for President are detailed in the tables on the opposite page. The ballot was printed in the April 5 issue; individual readers who requested them were mailed extra ballots provided they wrote before April 19 (634 such extra ballots were distributed). Participants were asked to indicate the state in which they live and their party affiliation. Minor-party candidates were not included in the ballot, but space for write-ins was provided. All ballots postmarked not later than April 25 were counted.

A total of approximately 3,600 ballots was cast, including write-ins. The tables on page 445 show the breakdown of first and second choices according to party affiliation, and the total first-choice vote by states. Votes were received from every state in the Union.

In all, 419 write-in votes were received, of which 158 were first choices divided among 33 candidates. The leading first choices were: Vincent Hallinan (Progressive Party candidate), 45; Senator Paul Douglas, 28; Norman Thomas, 13; Averell Harriman, 10; Herbert Holdridge, 8; and Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, 5. Harriman, Senator Douglas, and Hallinan led the second-choices in that order. Scattered write-ins were received for Justice Hugo Black, Stringfellow Barr, Senator Herbert Lehman, President Truman, Senator McMahon, Frank P. Graham, Robert Hutchins, and others.

In our view, the most interesting results shown by the poll are these: the clear first-choice preferences indicated for Justice William O. Douglas by Democrats, Republicans, and independents (including members of minor parties); the tendency of our readers to favor Senator Kefauver and Governor Stevenson as their second choice; the second-choice popularity of Governor Earl Warren among Democrats, Republicans, and independents; and the relative lack of interest shown in the candidacy of General Eisenhower. The fact that so many readers voted for Justice Douglas and Governor Stevenson, even though they were aware that neither is a candidate, indicates not only the kind of candidate they prefer but also the kind of platform they want. We think there is a straw in the wind here for the Democrats, who must retain their independent and liberal support to win.

In August, 1939, Elmo Roper prepared a study of a selected sample of 978 Nation readers. Among the questions asked was this: "Whom did you vote for in 1924, 1928, 1932, and 1936?" The results, given in percentages, provide an interesting tie-in with our current poll:

Coolidge	18.0	Smith	38.8
Davis	11.2	Hoover	18.9
LaFollette	41.5	Thomas	26.7
Foster	2.0	Foster	1.8
Other	2.0	Other	.4
Didn't vote	25.3	Didn't vote	13.4
1932		1936
F. D. R.	64.7	F. D. R.	81.0
Hoover	8.6	Landon	5.3
Thomas	19.4	Thomas	9.3
Foster	1.1	Browder	1.8
Other	.2	Other	.2
Didn't vote	6.0	Didn't vote	2.4

The percentage of first-choice ballots which Justice William O. Douglas received (67.2) is slightly higher than Roosevelt's percentage in 1932. It should be mentioned, also, that many readers explained that their "real" choice was William O. Douglas but that since they assumed he was not available, they were marking preferences for others.

Many interesting miscellaneous comments were received. One reader noted: "If, in my bitterness, I have spoiled my ballot by indicating—in an amazingly restrained fashion!—what I think of Kerr, Russell, MacArthur, and Taft, please send me another ballot." Another, who voted for Justice Douglas, commented: "But it would be a shame to permit Harry another Supreme Court appointment before he retires." Associate Justice R. B. Bottomly of the Montana Supreme Court has been doing a little private polling among his friends. "Most of those I have talked to," he wrote, "have expressed the thought that it is just too bad that the ordinary person has no way of expressing his choice for the important position of President of the United States. It appears there is not much hope for the expression of this choice until we have a national primary for this office which would mean real democracy in action."

Labor Views the Campaigns

BY HUGO ERNST

IT SEEMS to me that the key to this election year lies in a thoughtful reading of the signs which reveal a vast uneasiness at work among the American people. Walter Lippmann and others, reporting "ear-to-the-ground" tours of the country, have found this restlessness, this seeking after answers, in every corner of the land. Some pass it off as nothing more than a mood for changing the "ins" for the "outs." Others read into it a current of defeatism. I think these are dangerous and superficial readings.

The signs are all about us. They reach all the way from the President's decision to "take a walk" to the worried frowns of housewives as they pass through the check-out station at the supermarket.

They include slipping farm prices, the lines of unemployed in the textile and auto towns, the new boldness of employer attacks upon trade unions.

They include dislocations of world trade, the Treasury's monthly report that more defense bonds are cashed than sold, the big advertisements for clearance sales of TV sets, refrigerators, and other high-cost merchandise.

They include recurring reports of acts of downright fascist violence against Negroes, Jews, Spanish-Americans, and other minority groups; the snooping into schoolbooks which has befouled communities as far apart as Pasadena, California, and Port Washington, New York; the news that detention camps are being prepared for "subversives" in this land of the free.

They include items like the army's request for more funds to use in tracking down soldiers who have gone "over the hill"; the air-force lieutenants who do not wish to fly; and Argosy magazine's opinion poll showing that the headline which eight out of ten Americans would most like to see, reads: WAR ENDED FOREVER.

Twenty years ago Franklin D. Roosevelt, sensing a similar uneasiness in the land, illuminated the dark night of the depression with a flashing phrase that showed his remarkable insight into the popular mood. "The only thing we have to fear," he said, "is fear itself." Then he went on to offer a New Deal so bold, so concrete, so accurate in its grasp of the nation's sense of insecurity, as to rally the people to his standard for four years of historic election victories—to say nothing of a fifth Democratic victory in 1948.

The "new" part of F. D. R.'s prescription was simply that he put people's security first: the security of their homes, their jobs, their farms, their small enterprises, their unions. The security of their civil rights, their health, their education, their natural resources. These were given priority over the narrower interests of those he dubbed "malefactors of great wealth."

It was this program which made the Democratic Party the choice of workers, farmers, and the small business men and professional people who serve them. It was this New Deal which brought to birth the political arms of the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., the railroad unions, and the miners, all bent on supporting those in either party who would push the program. And it was this New Deal the Republicans and Dixiecrats in Congress set out to smash the moment F. D. R. was dead. Seizing the initiative from President Truman, the coalition has put in motion since 1946 a mighty flood of reaction from the Hill which is washing away F. D. R.'s program as surely as the life-giving topsoil of the Missouri Basin is being washed away as I write. We can expect the erosion to continue if the Dixiecrats dictate at Chicago the nomination of a man who suits their own purposes rather than the needs of the plain people who have looked upon the Democratic Party as their instrument of social progress.

The Democrats can't win without a tremendous turnout in November. They can't get such a turnout unless they offer a national program that satisfies the people's need for security. And they must offer real security at home and real security in relations with other nations.

At the very minimum, if there is to be a real outpouring of voters this year, the Democrats must not retreat an inch from the platform of 1948 when they meet in Chicago in July. There must be no surrender to the Dixiecrats. If the delegates permit Senator Russell, the man who says he "would rather be a Southerner than be President," to blackjack them with his 300 votes, then the campaign this fall will not be waged on the real issues at all, but on mink coats, reds-in-government, and wasteful welfare spending disguised as issues by candidates unwilling to face the causes of the people's restlessness. Disgusted voters will stay home.

Republicans have worked hand in glove with the Dixiecrats as wreckers of the New Deal. Together they forced the defense production program into forms which tightened monopoly's grip while weakening the people's defense against falling living standards. Carrying these policies beyond our shores, the "Dixiegop" alliance has starved the Point Four program for dealing permanently with what the President has called "stomach communism" by containing it within a wall of rising living standards. There is no likelihood that the election of Taft or Eisenhower, either of whom must carry into office reactionary Senators and Representatives, would in any way alter the nature of the present drift.

As for the Democrats, the great danger is that the Dixiecrats, using as their slogan, "You can't win without us," will blackmail the convention into choosing their man. The fact is, however, and it should be widely advertised, that neither Roosevelt nor Truman needed electoral votes from the Southern states; both would have been elected handily without them.

No, the Democrats don't need the Dixiecrats. What they do need is the votes of those—North, South, East, and West—who feel most sharply the insecurity of the times. And who are they? They are the voters who kept the Democrats in power from 1932 through 1948. They are the wage earners—steelworkers, hotel maids, white-collar employees—of the industrial cities. They are the family farmers of the Great Plains, the sharecroppers of the South. They are the Negro millions and the millions of new Americans from many lands even unto the second and third generations. Standing alone, they are called "minority groups"; together, they hold the popular power the Democrats must put into motion if they would win next fall. To enlist them, the Democrats must restore faith in the party as the defender of the people's rights. They must offer a platform explicit in its proposals for quieting the people's fears.

As I see it, these are the facts which the Democrats must face squarely if they want to win again in 1952:

☞ While most American families are caught in a net of frozen wages and rising prices, corporations continue to swell, like the frog in the fairy tale, with each new quarterly report.

☞ The existence of a tax structure which adds a heavy burden of indirect taxes to the already heavy direct taxes paid by the people, while lobbyists devise new loopholes for the big fellows.

☞ The shelving of the Fair Deal by the same Congress which continues to ladle out giant subsidies to industry, thus turning the nation's wealth over to monopoly.

☞ Mounting expressions of alarm from thoughtful people who see present policies as leading either to war or depression, and who don't want war as a "solution" for depression.

☞ The anti-labor climate fostered by the Taft-Hartley act, epitomized in the steel crisis.

☞ The present moratorium on social progress—public housing, security for the aged, health insurance, federal aid to education, public power, flood control.

☞ The series of murderous assaults on Negroes. These grow bolder, as though the FBI's failure to catch the Kluxers who bombed Harry Moore's home in Florida at Christmas time were almost an invitation to violence.

THERE is also the issue of free speech. The fear of speaking out is the most ominous fact of life in America today. The virus of McCarthyism chills the heart and stills the tongue of the teacher, the preacher, the public servant, the editor, the union member. Ultimately this terrible disease destroys its victims' resistance to a malignant growth within the body politic—the cancer of fascism. A serious threat is that this same political "polio" may lay hold of the Democratic convention. Indeed, it would be a bitter irony should the McCarthy virus infect the party whose only hope of victory lies in offering the voters a cure for all the ills for which McCarthy and the Dixiecrats stand.

I do not believe working people or their unions will ever surrender to the Dixiecrats. They simply will not accept, just as the Negro people will not accept, any Democratic candidate who compromises on civil rights to gain the nomination. Nor do I believe that working people and their natural allies will turn to the Republicans unless some miracle at Chicago reminds the G. O. P. of Lincoln, and they recover his concern for the rights of working people, white and black.

Should both parties turn their backs on the rights of labor, on civil rights, on the social needs of all of us, on the deep hunger for peace in the hearts of men, then I fear millions of voters will simply "sit this one out" and the victory will go to the Republicans by default.

The 1952 elections, it seems to me, are America's big chance, and perhaps the Democratic Party's last chance, to return to the path of F. D. R. Here is our opportunity to send to Washington a new President and a new Congress with a genuine mandate from the voters to re-appraise our foreign and domestic affairs. Such a government could help enormously in easing the tensions which now foster fear throughout the world.

Trouble in Textiles: II

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

THE trouble in textiles, of which I wrote last week, is not peculiar to the United States: it is a world-wide phenomenon which is causing the spinners and weavers of Osaka, Ghent, Manchester, and Bombay even more grief than those of Fall River. Universally the feast of orders that the textile industry was enjoying a little more than a year ago has turned to famine. Everywhere, as manufacturers and merchants struggle to reduce inventories in the face of strong consumer resistance, mills are closing, leaving hundreds of thousands of workers idle.

In the major producing countries anti-inflationary measures, such as increased taxes and higher interest rates, serve to lessen home demand. But exports afford no relief; on the contrary, important markets—Australia, for example—are being cut off by import restrictions designed to correct adverse trade balances. And in Asia, Africa, and Latin America consumption is being curtailed by a fall in purchasing power caused by price reverses in such commodities as rubber, jute, copra, tin, and pepper.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the textile industries of Britain and Belgium, which export one-third and one-half of their output respectively, should have been excited when the possibility of substantial orders from Russia, China, and other "iron curtain" lands was dangled before them at the recent Moscow Economic Conference. In Japan, too, where the cotton industry has just cut back production severely even though its capacity is still far below pre-war levels, there is keen interest in the prospect of reentry into the Chinese market. We have yet to see, however, how firm the proffered orders are and what strings are attached to them. British observers, while hoping for the best, appear to be rather skeptical. They note that in negotiating trade pacts with Russia Britain hitherto has never been able to persuade the Soviet government to use part of its substantial sterling balances for the purchase of textiles or other consumer goods. Nor have the British placed any obstacles in the way of textile exports to China; if these have dwindled to a trickle, it is because of difficulties created by Peking.

Should Lancashire succeed in obtaining appreciable business from the Eastern bloc, the American reaction is likely to be a mixture of criticism and envy. However, exports have never played a major role in America's textile trade—last year less than 10 per cent of the output of cotton fabrics was sold abroad—and recovery from the present slump depends primarily on a quickening of the home market. How is this to be achieved?

It can hardly be argued that the reduced rate of textile consumption in this country comes from lack of purchasing power. Generally speaking, the economy is operating at a very high level. Employment is at a new peak and disposable income in the first quarter of this year was only fractionally below the all-time high reached in the fourth quarter of 1951. It is not poverty, therefore, that is causing consumer resistance; it is rather that the average American is relatively wealthy in terms of goods. Few of our garages lack a car; our kitchens are lined with gadgets; our wardrobes are comfortably stocked. Since the war ended we have been buying fast and furiously, but now that we have learned that we can have our guns and butter too, the urge to spend is weakening and we are beginning to exercise what Keynes called a "liquidity-preference." As a result department-store sales have been sagging while savings-bank deposits have spurted.

This is just what the economic doctors ordered and a sign that the inflationary fever has left us. But there is no reason to suppose, as some observers are suggesting, that we are about to fall into a deflationary coma. As long as defense expenditures remain high and the government operates at a deficit, it seems unlikely that total demand will fall so far below potential supply as to create a critical situation. In present circumstances, collective thrift is a virtue; it is only if the habit persists after rearmament stops priming the pump that it could become a vice. Our economy, with its immense capacity for producing consumer goods, is geared to free spending, and if we all become penny-pinchers we shall soon have far fewer pennies to pinch. For in a shrinking market, business men would refuse to invest our savings in new plant and unemployment would rapidly spread from the consumer-goods to the capital-goods field.

THIS is the nightmare that haunts those who find their particular industries depressed in the midst of a general boom. For textile men it is all the more painful because their share of the consumer's dollar has been shrinking. Thus the Wool Bureau in a recent pamphlet pointed out that whereas disposable personal income increased by 214 per cent between 1939 and the middle of 1951, consumer clothing expenditure rose by only 183 per cent. In fact, in 1950, clothing accounted for only 8.02 per cent of the consumer budget compared to 9.53 per cent in 1929 and 8.56 per cent in 1939.

The brunt of this change in expenditure patterns has been borne by the men's-clothing industry. One immediate reason, of course, is that upwards of three million young men are being given their wardrobes by Uncle Sam, but since the wear and tear in the army is probably greater than in civilian life this should not cause any net decrease in textile consumption. More important is the trend toward greater informality often ascribed to the increase in suburban living. Evening clothes are going out and men tend to buy fewer business suits and dress shirts and more slacks, jackets, and sport shirts. That is why some textile men, who believe that there is nothing wrong with their industry that a little old-fashioned American salesmanship won't cure, are planning a campaign to smarten up the male animal and make him more style-conscious.

The whole-hearted cooperation of the industry in achieving this objective may be hindered by conflict between those who believe that there is nothing like wool and the promoters of the new synthetics—nylon, dacron, orlon, vicara, and so forth. Certainly, the latter are making headway. According to Facts for Industry, a publication of the Census Bureau, between 1950 and 1951, the output of summer-weight suits containing 50 per cent or more wool declined by 33 per cent: other types, mainly rayon and nylon, increased by 21 per cent. Almost two-thirds of the summer-weight suits manufactured in 1951 were made primarily of synthetics, as were more than half of all trousers and slacks sold separately.

Obviously, the growing preference for synthetics has serious implications for certain old-established sections of the textile industry, particularly worsted weaving. In the long run, however, it is the producers of natural fibers—cotton, wool, linen, silk—and not the processors that are threatened, since existing spinning, weaving, and finishing establishments can in most cases be adapted to handle synthetic raw materials. All the same, the Northern woolen and worsted industry will have to hustle if it is to keep any part of the synthetic processing business from grasping Southern hands.

Moreover, according to the Research Department of the Textile Workers Union, American mills now have an annual capacity of fourteen billion yards of cloth of all kinds—ninety yards for every man, woman, and child in the country. Since this is in excess of any probable demand for some time to come, the outlook for the older and less efficient plants, most of which are in the North, is unpromising especially in the face of the kind of subsidized Southern competition mentioned in my previous article. Even when business picks up, it seems probable that many mills closed in recent months will remain dark.

Fortunately, current expansion in other industries does provide new opportunities for displaced textile workers. During a recent visit to North Adams in western Massachusetts, I found that the depressed state of the textile industry there had been partially compensated for by the rapid growth of an electronics plant. Other New England towns with a supply of skilled, intelligent labor seem to be enjoying a similar experience. But if full advantage is to be taken of this situation, there will have to be many more community schemes like that adopted in the hard-hit textile city of Utica, New York, for retraining textile workers for the light-metals industries.

WHATEVER the problems of New England, those of old England are infinitely more serious. For decades Lancashire has been losing business, not to other parts of the country, but to other parts of the world where labor costs are lower. Before 1914 it almost monopolized exports of cotton goods, supplying 70 per cent of the world total. Today, Japan and India are competing for first place and Britain's share is barely 15 per cent.

It is, moreover, a smaller share of a smaller total, for while world production has risen some 50 per cent since 1914, world export trade has declined by 40 per cent. More and more countries now supply their own needs and this trend is unlikely to be reversed as nations aspiring to industrialization begin by manufacturing textiles—a relatively simple factory operation—usually behind high tariff walls. Thus, for the world as a whole, textile capacity tends to outstrip consumption.

In most countries the effective demand for textiles is extremely low. America's exceptional position is illustrated by the fact that with less than 7 per cent of the world's population we use about one-third of the world's cotton output and one-quarter of the wool. Our per-capita consumption has been rising steadily while that of other countries, including most of Asia, is stationary or even declining. Thus while our textile troubles reflect a high standard of living that permits consumers to postpone purchases of clothing without suffering from cold, or even shabbiness, those of the rest of the world are fundamentally the result of poverty. In Asia and Africa hundreds of millions of families exist at a subsistence level that at best allows only a tiny sum for clothing. Were their needs more nearly matched by their means, they would provide an enormous new market. Indeed, if Asiatic productivity and living standards could be raised by as little as 10 per cent, there would be few idle spindles or looms anywhere.

Such an increase in productivity will not be rapidly attained, however, without external capital and other assistance. This, in turn, cannot be provided on anything like an adequate scale while the major industrial nations, East and West, use their economic surpluses to build armaments. Consequently, weavers and spinners, if they want to eat, must forget their old skills and retrain minds and fingers to fit themselves for the manipulation of arms-making machinery.

Italy, the Vatican, and U. S. Catholics

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Rome
PERHAPS the chief strength of the De Gasperi government lies in the fact that, while not deeply loved, it is not deeply hated by anybody except the Fascists and certain circles in the Vatican. Its record is creditable in many respects. Although its deflationary policy has boosted interest rates, curtailed public works, and to some extent decreased employment, the government has succeeded in preventing the sharp rise in living costs that France has suffered in the last two years.

Supported by a comfortable Demo-Christian majority in the Chamber of Deputies, De Gasperi has been under no compulsion so far to compromise with either the extreme Right or (more important) the extreme Left, yet he has been careful to antagonize neither beyond endurance. The Premier is a staunch supporter of the Atlantic Pact, the European army, and the Schuman Plan; nevertheless, he has resisted American demands for an "abnormal" rearmament effort. He enjoys the reputation of being "a neutralist at heart" who is keenly aware of Italy's widespread anti-war feeling.

The government claims great credit for its so-called land reform—the division of badly run estates among landless peasants. In this the principle is more important than the practice; the distribution so far has been of minuscule proportions and the whole program is now threatened by court litigation. In any case, the reform satisfies neither Right nor Left.

If De Gasperi has avoided a sharp rise in living costs he has also kept wage rates low. The national average wage is 26,000 lire (the official exchange rate is 620 lire to the dollar); some "heavy" workers get up to 40,000 lire, but mill-girls earn only 16,000 to 17,000. But Italy's great problem remains unemployment. About 2,000,000 are registered as unemployed and another 2,000,000 are seasonal or part-time workers. Of the unemployed, only a small proportion get state relief, which amounts to a daily dole of 250 lire for twenty-six weeks only.

The unemployment problem is of course aggravated by the fact that Italy's population is growing at the rate of 500,000 a year. The traditional solution of this problem is emigration, but to the Italian Left the answer lies in further industrialization, the modernization of agriculture, and the development of Eastern markets.

The experience of the Italian miners in England has not been encouraging, and as for sending people to Australia (15,000 went last year) or to South America, the Left points out that it costs almost as much to send a family to either place as it would to create jobs for them in Italy.

Italian trade unionism is fairly strong. The C. G. I. L. (General Federation of Labor), with about five million members, represents the bulk of organized labor. Though closely linked to the Communists and Nenni's Left Socialists, the C. G. I. L. claims to be non-political. It is usually sufficiently powerful to win the support of rival unions in any major wage dispute.

The federation's most important rival is the Catholic C. I. S. L., whose 1,500,000 members are concentrated in the civil service and in industries employing large numbers of women, particularly textiles. The Communists, Nenni Socialists, and Social Democrats have federations of their own and a neo-Fascist union is now being organized.

While unemployment is a tragic business, the fact remains that more than 90 per cent of the employables are working productively and—thanks to the rigid financial policy—are not much worse off than they were three years ago. From the short-term point of view this may be considered a remarkable achievement in today's Europe. But as a long-term policy it gets Italy nowhere, and the De Gasperi government faces a stiff political struggle for power, with the challenge coming from the Right rather than from the Left.

Groupthink on Groupthink

IS ANYBODY LISTENING? HOW AND WHY U. S. BUSINESS FUMBLES WHEN IT TALKS WITH HUMAN BEINGS. By William H. Whyte, Jr., and the Editors of Fortune. Drawings by Robert Osborn. Simon and Schuster. $3.

IS ANYBODY talking to himself? Mr. Whyte and Fortune's research rockettes in a masterly Groupthink operation have collected a formidable volume of evidence against the Groupthink methods of Big Business. As in most group studies, there is ostentatious deep digging, an impressive show of wondrous instruments about to be used, a mesmeric riffling of reference cards, topped by some surprisingly queasy harumphing-out-loud.

On their far-flung trek into the secret citadels of Big Business, tirelessly mushing through the file-armored corridors of 9 Rockefeller Plaza, fanned by ever-dancing memo-mammas, the explorers find that Business has been so busy studying communication media that it can no longer communicate, and this fact too must be communicated. (The word "communicate" is used in the new television sense of I-talk-and-you-buy; you-talk-and-I-can't-hear.) The communication experts are called in, the Group Attitudes Development Company, the prose engineers, the Group Dynamics mediators, the Readability electronicists all fly to find the bug and get B. B. off the gobbledegookhook. Big Business is resolved to sell Free Enterprise to the Free Enterpriser who, through some mysterious flaw in the channel, refuses to stop his Buick for a lecture on his inalienable right to a Buick. The American Way must be sold to Americans as if it was something that had to be unloaded on the suckers before it molded in the warehouses. The directors have met and the minutes record that the resolution was passed for Big Business to Turn on the Charm with a capital gain.

Mr. Whyte & Co. produce many typical samples of B. B.'s idea of "communicating" Americanism to Americans, from the stately institutional ad with its recapitulation of capitalistic capsules to the crackerbarrel interchange between barefoot lad and Old Galway

Sluggers. But if the communication lines were really working the persuasion used would scare the average citizen to the other ends of the earth. The picture of You, Mr. Average American, as Big Business wants you to be, is an insult that wipes away the pleasant glow of the boss's Good Morning. What the prose engineers are knocking themselves gaga in all innocence to tell you, is that to be an American means to be an honest fellow, too unspoiled by your college education to understand big words, too decent to put your family and private ambition before that of the company's, too noble to notice other employees' defections without reporting them, too American an American to use your own brain resisting the Planned Mediocrity program set up by the kindly social engineers for the "cultural orchestration of the attitudes and motivations of an entire nation."

This American doll-man created by the Free Enterprise propagandists has a doll-wife, too, preferably not too smart, who can shut her eyes and shut her mouth, because if she doesn't the community "clinician" will "screen" her by means of "projective" techniques and depth interviewing. "Not a genuine American doll" will be the verdict, and husband, for purposes of optimum security, will lose his chance at one of the top slots in the corporation. This slightly subnormal doll-wife, as Mr. Whyte shrewdly points out, has been glorified consistently in the big women's magazines lately, the general plot being that the lean, crooked-smiling young public-relations hero would rather look after her himself than have her committed, and besides it's hard for a guy to find a wife dumber than he is. I wonder if the polling of wives' opinions on husbands' jobs didn't include too many of these new fiction wives. The live crop of young business men's wives on view around the country right now are definitely not nitwits. In the fictional America of Big Business those wives who show too much initiative at office parties or don't fit into the cookie-cutter are pegged "retrograde wives." Sometimes the situation is deftly handled by sending the husband on extended trips where he may find a more acceptable replacement. Sometimes the integrative leaders, endowed with

by Charles Callan Tansill

Before the truth about Roosevelt foreign policy could be known, the State Department's confidential files had to be opened to a historian who was not an Administration apologist. Such a historian is Charles Callan Tansill. He was given access to the secret diplomatic archives for the years preceding Pearl Harbor, and BACK DOOR TO WAR is based largely on this data. It contains more unpublished materials than any book yet printed on this subject.

Tansill's book on our involvement in World War I, America Goes to War (1938), was greeted by Henry Steele Commager as "...the most valuable contribution to the history of the pre-war years in our literature." Of his new book, the author himself has written: "I was given access to the confidential correspondence that revealed the President's policy of proclaiming pacifism while working for war... I have not been under any compulsion to write a 'whitewash' of the Roosevelt regime and have told the story as it developed from the examination of countless pages of diplomatic correspondence."

Charles Callan Tansill is Professor of American Diplomatic History at Georgetown University, Washington, D. C. As technical adviser to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee from 1918 to 1928, and a respected scholar in the field of diplomatic history, he is uniquely qualified to give an adequately documented account of the steps which led to our entrance into the second world war.

miraculous objectivity, decide the wife can be cured of resenting her husband's business trips and late work by a generous grooming at the company's special "finishing" school. Shades of Susan B. Anthony!

Mr. Whyte blames "businessese," the meaningless jargon of Big Business, for its failure to communicate with human beings. The tangy phrases are used to fill in dead air until there is no meaning left, but isn't this a good thing? The constant hum of the language of diplomacy, Tin Pan Alley, and Business is the foam-rubber mat to save the unwary, the comforting support for the insecure. If a silence ever came there is the danger that someone might say something.

Mr. Whyte, himself hamstrung by Groupthink, presents the picture of Big Business in a spirit of brotherly kidding, and the criticism occasionally permitted has an affectionate ring. Chuckling fondly, corporation heads will reproduce sections for house organs and Christmas calendars and even discover new angles in paternalistic patterns. One thing is certain, this glossy record by American Business about America will be more gleefully received by American-Way-haters abroad than any novel about depravity in our lower depths.

DAWN POWELL

'A Peculiar Genius

EMILY DICKINSON. By Richard Chase. William Sloane Associates. $4.

THIS newest volume in the American Men of Letters Series is without a doubt one of the best. Mr. Chase is a critic who is not carried away; in fact he makes a distinct point of not being carried away. The result is a critical biography that is reasonable and readable, an untransported study of a poet who, in the history of American literature, has transported more people than you can shake a stick at.

Any intelligent reader who takes the trouble to thumb through the fifteen hundred or more published poems of Emily Dickinson will agree with Mr. Chase that the critic's starting point must be a statement of her extraordinary badness. No other great poet has managed to equal Emily Dickinson's production of banal, stupid, disorganized, downright insufferable verse; poem after poem thumps on the page, a rain of stricken sparrows, with scarcely a live meter or moving image among them. Yet in spite of this one agrees too with Mr. Chase's final estimate: "A dozen or two of Emily Dickinson's poems are unrivaled; perhaps fifty can claim a kinship with the best of English lyric verse." (The first half of this statement, one knows from the context, refers only to American literature.)

Emily Dickinson was a genius, then, of a very peculiar sort—a genius who was largely incapable of exploiting her own abilities, who was unable to make anything coherent or workable out of her cultural heritage or her own experience, whose personal life was broken, or at least bent, by the minutest imaginable hardships. In large areas of art and thought she was ignorant and even insensitive. Though she was a distinctly private poet, and though it is often instructive to compare her with Blake, her personal vision failed in both range and intensity to support anything like the Blakean cosmos.

To explain the qualities of Emily Dickinson's genius many writers have resorted to the invention of tumultuous love affairs or traumatic family experiences. Mr. Chase shows that such inventions, which dangerously exceed the reliable evidence, are neither justifiable nor necessary. In a number of skilful passages, he presents the thought of mid-nineteenth-century America for precisely what it was—a rag bag of sentimentality, metaphysical incoherence, ethical and social destitution, and intellectual laziness or quackery in every sphere. He speculates, without going beyond the evidence of letters, diaries, etc., on how and through whom the elements of this culture impinged on the poet's mind. Finally, he analyzes the poems to determine how, among the successes, the poet managed a fusion of her experience with whatever rigor she derived from her dual Calvinist and transcendentalist inheritance, and how also, among the many failures, the aesthetic and intellectual indiscipline of her time prevented such a fusion.

This is not a whole biography. One must still turn to George Whicher's "This Was a Poet" for a dependable account of Emily Dickinson's life. Mr. Chase has given us instead an account of the New England predicament in the last century, a study of the struggle—largely unrealized, and for that reason singularly desperate, in the case of Emily Dickinson—against incoherence, incommunicability, and madness. Mr. Chase has perhaps discovered no new element in this struggle, but he has given us an exceedingly clear and incisive account of it, and he has shown how Emily Dickinson, in her own way, was as sharply engaged in the contest as her contemporaries, Hawthorne, Melville, and James. In addition, his reading of the poet's works is the closest and best that we have so far.

HAYDEN CARRUTH

Books in Brief

SPARTA. By H. Michell. Cambridge University Press. $7. Hedging nearly every statement with a meticulous scholastic caution which becomes almost comical in the long run, Professor Michell nevertheless manages to convey not only all that is known about the Spartans but also much of the conflicting surmise. The Spartans, it appears, had some admirable institutions but were on the whole a rather dull lot, leaving behind them one magnificent epitaph, and a legend—the one about the boy and the fox—whose authenticity appears to rest on very dubious evidence. The book has the usual apparatus of footnotes (copious), bibliography, and index; a good map or two would have been a help.

CAESAR. By Gérard Walter. Translated from the French by Emma Craufurd. Edited by Thérèse Pol. Scribner's. $5. Subtitled "The Story of a Momentous Life, a Mighty Personality," this is a heavy, long, dull book. Mighty the subject's personality may be, but obviously one which the author dislikes extremely. An exhaustive bibliography which lists some twenty operas written about Julius Caesar overlooks Bernard Shaw's play. Neither the illustrations nor the maps are immediately significant; the most valuable feature of the book would seem to be its thoroughness in listing other works of reference.

Drama Note

The Loft Players' imaginative and sensitive revival of Tennessee Williams' "Summer and Smoke" at 5 Sheridan Square eclipses a good deal of what is being offered uptown these days. The direction, handled by José Quintero, is crisp and tidy and gives the characterization a sharpness and beauty it lacked in the Broadway production. Geraldine Page, who plays the heroine, is one of the most talented newcomers to appear in New York in a long while. C. H.

THE most interesting of the current shows is Fifteen Americans, at the Museum of Modern Art (through July 6). Enough of the work of each of fifteen artists is displayed to give a fair sample of recent accomplishment. This is in no sense a group show. The variety is, in fact, a little bewildering; but the present assortment should be added to several other such exhibitions which the Museum has put on over the years. The policy of showing a few artists at a time and showing them well has great advantages—if artists not yet represented will agree to be patient. The alternative seems to be the Whitney type of affair, which makes sense only if you bring a good deal of knowledge with you. Fifteen Americans is precisely the sort of show which helps provide such knowledge. The two systems complement each other very well.

Skirting democratic diplomacy, I shall select from the Fifteen those whose work seems to me to be impressive. But not before taking a crack at some of the statements made for the catalogue by the artists or by their apologists. Herbert Ferber is admirably lucid on the space-piercing propensities of sculpture he admires; Herbert Katzman, Herman Rose, and William Baziotes are all refreshingly modest; Irving Kriesberg is engagingly clever; and Edward Corbett's statement is a model of conciseness ("I intend my work as poetry"). The other statements, or most of them, are impenetrable, obfuscating, solemn, arrogant, and badly written. Once you ask for a statement, I suppose you are stuck with it. This collection ought to convince Dorothy Miller, who organized the show, that she should have written the text to the catalogue instead of limiting herself to a purely general and unarguable preface. She could surely have improved on Clyfford Still, who despises tradition and considers that "demands for communication are both presumptuous and irrelevant." And on Joseph Glasco, who says he would like to live in a world where "the instincts are allowed to flow as freely as with any other animal." What arty nonsense!

Jackson Pollock and Bradley Walker Tomlin seem to me to be the stars of this show. In each, an individual style is powerfully marked and the effect is least derivative from other artists. Kirchner, de Segonzac, Maurice Prendergast, William Chase, and the Whistler of the Nocturnes are all stalking these corridors of the Museum of Modern Art. But Pollock and Tomlin are immediately identifiable on their own, more so than some of the others who have torn loose from representation, but whose style is soft, or at least passive. Pollock's centrifugal rhythms are laced together on the top layer of his canvases by repeats of a sort of treble-clef motive which forces the eye along in big, easy sequences. The best comparison, if it has not already been made, would be to medieval Irish manuscripts (Book of Kells) and to the carved wooden ornament of Norwegian churches. Tomlin is more serene, but his work is less photogenic (he suffers in reproduction) because its resonance depends on color harmonies at close value ranges. The array of greens in Number 18 (1950) rivals that in a late Klee (Green on Green). In these two painters I note a contrasting development: Pollock is moving away from a horror vacui which used to be, in works earlier than those shown, much too constricting; while Tomlin is apparently moving toward it. The former has discovered that his cramped labyrinth needs air; the latter dovetails his forms more cohesively with, I think, a loss of the boldness of the larger works of 1949 and 1950. Some of his best work is marred by the drip, or drool, of too liquid pigment. These accidents are cleverly exploited by Pollock, as they were by Hokusai, but in the same Number 18 by Tomlin they blur the squared-off character of the design. If, as I believe, he is Braque to Pollock's Picasso, he should purify his affinity to the great architectonic Frenchman.

Baziotes and Corbett depend heavily on atmospheric effects, in a sort of psychological impressionism. Baziotes' bold shapes save his work from going amorphous. He is eloquent in glowing green-and-violet tonalities, but the bright apple-green cat on a middle-gray ground is unusually gay. Rothko leaves such unbroken expanses of pure color to wander in that I find it nearly impossible to avoid daydreaming. I am enough of a fuddy-duddy to insist on communication, Clyfford Still to the contrary notwithstanding. And Still's work, which reminds me unexpectedly of Augustus Vincent Tack, has an outrageous lack of conciseness. He puts the whole symphony orchestra on the stage for a single tutti.

In recent sculpture I don't remember anything more monumental and at the same time more poignant than Herbert Ferber's metal construction for the Millburn Synagogue ("... and the bush was not consumed"). Richard Lippold, who works in metal rods and wires, speaks of the spider's web in his statement, and it is an apt simile for his beautiful Full Moon. (Was there an eclipse at the Harvard Graduate Center?)

Herbert Katzman is still young, and his European and New York landscapes heave with life. It is a good sign, but I hope that in his Paris sojourn he discovered Poussin as Cézanne did. We could use a Poussin today.

Among the one-man shows that will remain open through May 10, I recommend Maud Morgan's at the Betty Parsons Gallery. One picture, Counterpoints, impressed me more than the rest by its force of design. Marie Laurencin's dusted pallor is a danger she does not always escape, but Emergence (of yel-

TO LAST year's RCA Victor recording of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique played by Monteux with the San Francisco Symphony (a new LP recording, not, as I thought, a dubbing of the 78) Columbia now adds one of a performance by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and London one of a performance by Van Beinum with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. The Victor record offers a decidedly less-than-first-rate orchestra conducted by a less-than-first-rate musician; and though the recorded sound has the characteristic Victor warmth and luster it is made coarse and noisy in climaxes by excessive reverberation. The Columbia offers a great orchestra in a performance which indulges in vehement, lurid intensification of Berlioz's every nuance; and these excesses are made worse by the close-range reproduction. The London offers another great orchestra playing with beautiful sensitiveness in a performance whose only defect is the ignoring of some of Berlioz's nuances of tempo; but the recorded sound, though spacious, is dry and a little dim (the drums at the end of the fourth movement are not clear). Choice is difficult; but I would choose the London.

On another London record Van Beinum conducts the Concertgebouw in a fine performance of Mozart's charming Symphony K. 319, and a performance of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony in which the first movement is too slow. Violins are dry and bass must be reduced; otherwise the sound is excellent.

Another charming Mozart work, the Serenade K. 320 ("Posthorn"), is played on a London record by Maag with L'Orchestre de la Suisse romande. One hears refinements of orchestral and musical execution which Sternberg doesn't achieve in the Haydn Society performance; but the recorded sound is veiled and edged, and bass must be reduced. Choice again is difficult; but I would choose the Maag performance.

The wonderful Ricercare in six parts from Bach's "The Musical Offering," arranged for strings by Edwin Fischer, is excellently performed by Münchinger with the Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra. Also on the London record are similar arrangements of the Fugue of the great G minor Fantasia and Fugue and a Fugue in A minor (why not rather the G minor Fantasia?), and Beethoven's Great Fugue Opus 133, which is played too slowly. Violins are dry and bass must be reduced; otherwise the sound is excellent.

Beecham's slowed-up performance of Chabrier's "España" with the Royal Philharmonic on a Columbia record is something to skip. Better played is the pleasantly inconsequential Overture to Rossini's "La Cambiale di Matrimonio."

The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'or" and the equally engaging Capriccio Espagnol are well performed on a Capitol record by Desormière with the French National Symphony. The sound of the first piece is less brilliant than that of the second, and has a few bass notes missing in the Prelude.

Toscanini's performance with the N. B. C. Symphony of Gershwin's "An American in Paris" has been issued by Victor on 45 rpm; and listened to by itself it is very exciting; but listening afterwards to Leonard Bernstein's performance one hears how much the piece gains by his slower pacing of it. Not only is the opening the leisurely saunter it should be, but there is time for details to make an effect they don't have in Toscanini's performance. Played through the Victor 45 rpm reproducer I had to step up the treble of my amplifier enormously.

The superb Dinu Lipatti performance of Schumann's Piano Concerto that Columbia issued on a 10-inch LP has been reissued on one side of a 12-inch, with Grieg's Piano Concerto on the other side; and the new transference has greatly improved the sound—though the last movement acquires a hash of distortion.

Toscanini's pre-war performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 1 Overture with the B. B. C. Symphony—one of the finest he ever put on records, and one of the best-recorded—has been dubbed onto a Victor LP so skillfully that I can detect no difference between the copy and the original (except that the dubbing has a hum). With it are two other performances of the same period with the N. B. C. Symphony—of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the two movements of the Quartet Opus 135. The Fifth provides a fine example of Toscanini's relaxed, slower-paced, and spacious performances of that period, as against the swifter, tauter performance of the work, superbly effective in its own way, that he broadcast recently; and the dubbing achieves the remarkable feat of eliminating most of the unpleasant noisy coarseness and harshness of the original sound and losing only a little bass in the first movement. And finally another outstanding performance, the one of the "Prometheus" Overture recorded in 1944, whose dubbed sound is excellent.

On another LP is a dubbing of the beautiful performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony that Toscanini recorded with the B. B. C. Symphony. The original sound was itself not clean on top; and the dubbed sound is better with treble reduced a bit. Bass also must be reduced.

Joe McCarthy Performs at Smith

Dear Sirs: Your readers might be interested in learning how Smith College students reacted to a visit from Senator Joe McCarthy, who spoke at Northampton on April 10. In a packed auditorium, waving handfuls of "raw, harsh facts" and "cold, documented truth," the Senator from Wisconsin attacked Secretary Acheson, Philip Jessup, and other "subversives" with a brand of logic which made some of the members of the audience wince. Senator McCarthy's denunciation of Lawrence K. Rosinger, whom many of the Senator's audience had heard speak at Smith in a series of talks on Asia, was greeted with hisses. The feeling of the Smith students was pretty well summarized by an editorial. A Circus Comes to Town, which appeared the following day in Scan, the Smith College newspaper. It read in part:

Did Mr. McCarthy forget he was speaking to an educated audience and not barking at a circus? To a college steeped in objectivism his dogmatic presentation of "infallible" material extracted from diverse investigations seemed reminiscent of the Inquisition. . . . His categorizing of government officials in Washington into the stereotypes of villain and hero typified methods which should have died with the medieval morality play. . . . We realize that there may be communism in our government and, if so, that everyone should be aware of it and informed about it, but we are afraid McCarthy is making more enemies than converts to his cause. The muckrakers of the nineteenth century served the purpose of calling the attention of public opinion to the need of reform. If McCarthy is fulfilling the same purpose he may gain our support, but as long as he resorts to methods suited to the circus we reserve the right to act as a circus audience, a response which was much in evidence last evening.

Having used the methods he has in destroying the reputations and careers of not a few honest men, it struck many in the audience that it was rather incongruous for McCarthy to end his speech by making a plea for a world in which the rights of all people would be respected.

THE NATION

IN RECOGNITION of a long and successful career of publication of articles aimed to correct abuse, eliminate prejudice and discrimination, and strengthen the democratic process.

No less during the past year than throughout its 87-year history has The Nation demonstrated that an opinion organ can publish consistently a high proportion of first-class effective human relations articles on its pages and thus force a formidable wedge in the wall of bigotry and intolerance.

AWARDED AT Jefferson City, Missouri, this 25th day of April in the

Dean, School of Journalism

What has The Nation done to be thus honored by a great university?

The answer can be put very simply. In our articles we have tried unremittingly to search for the truth; and in our editorials, to measure all social and political developments against the yardstick of the Bill of Rights.

We are certain that those who have honored us with a certificate of award want no more than this from any publication—and will accept no less. The fight for the Negro is part of the fight for human freedom everywhere.

We are now in our eighty-seventh year. From our first issue, we have held to the principle that no man is free so long as another is enslaved by reason of his color, religion, or political creed. We can think of no better way of thanking the Lincoln University School of Journalism for the honor it has paid us than by renewing our pledge to remain steadfast to this principle.

"THE SEEDS OF TYRANNY"

"I say, with all the emphasis at my command, that there is no more corrosive, no more subversive attack upon the great task of our government today than that which seeks to undermine confidence in government by irresponsible charges against the loyalty and integrity of government employees. . . . There is no room in government service for anyone who is not true to this public trust. . . . I will not tolerate the smearing and slandering of government employees as a group. We have every right to protest and to raise the roof against the deliberate creation for private political purposes of these unjust charges; of an atmosphere of suspicion and distrust against public employees. I'm just not going to stand for it and I'm starting now and I'm giving warning to the people who've been slandering the government employees that they're going to have trouble with me from now until November.

"We have a right to protest against the creation of an atmosphere in which a charge is a conviction in the public mind despite the lack of evidence. . . . The loyalty program was designed to protect innocent employees as well as the government. When I set it up, I intended it to expose the guilty and at the same time to safeguard the rights and reputations of those who were innocent. But I have become increasingly concerned in recent months by attempts to use the loyalty program as a club with which to beat government employees over the head. Political gangsters are attempting to pervert the program into an instrument of intimidation and blackmail, to coerce or destroy any who dare oppose them. These men and those who abet them have besmirched the reputations of decent, loyal public servants. They have not hesitated to lie, under cover of Congressional immunity, of course, and repeat the lies again and again. . . . These tactics contain the seeds of tyranny. Can we be sure that people who employ such tactics are really loyal to our form of government, with its Bill of Rights, its tradition of individual liberty? The fact is that they are breaking these things down. They are undermining the foundation stones of our Constitution. I believe such men betray our country and all it stands for. I believe they are as grave a menace as the Communists; in fact, I think they're worse than Communists and I think they're partners with them."

—From President Harry S. Truman's speech to the National Civil Service League, Washington, May 2.

A Fighting Speech—But Where's the Fight?

WHEN President Truman spoke out sharply and vigorously against the evils of McCarthyism in his Detroit speech of July 28th last year, we were quick to applaud his statement and to suggest how it might be implemented. In a Memo to the President, published on August 11, we pointed out that his loyalty program had not only failed to achieve one of the stated objectives—protection for government employees against unfounded accusations—but had contributed enormously to the effectiveness of McCarthy's smear tactics.

Now again the President speaks out sharply against those who would "betray the country" (see excerpts from his speech above). Truman is an effective orator when he is angry; he has a gift for the simple and direct utterance of the man in the street. He sounds sincere, and that, too, is a great gift. But there is something much more important about his National Civil Service League speech than its effectiveness as oratory. In it he admits, for the first time, that the loyalty program is being used as a club with which to "beat government employees over the head." This is what we foresaw in our Memo to the President last year. No single phase of the program has been more harmful in this respect than the portion of the Loyalty Order of March 21, 1947, in which the President instructed the Attorney General to list organizations as "subversive" on the basis of doctrine alone.

In all, somewhat more than 150 organizations have been so listed by the Attorney General, while the House Committee on Un-American Activities has named 694 organizations which it regards as subversive. The Attorney General's list was prepared, of course, without giving the listed organizations notice or an opportunity to be heard, a procedure which the Supreme Court in effect held to be improper in the case of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee decided April 30, 1951. Of the organizations listed, an overwhelming majority are not alleged ever to have advocated the overthrow of the government by force and violence; most of them were formed for specific purposes unrelated to communism; and many have not been in existence for ten or fifteen years. When the list was first prepared, it was forwarded by the Attorney General to the loyalty boards with the caution that "no conclusions whatsoever are to be drawn from membership in any such organizations." Despite this warning, membership has in practice come to be accepted as evidence of disloyalty. In addition, the roster forms the basis of the blacklisting activities now being conducted by the various private profit-making gestapos that have come into being since 1947.

It is not merely federal employees against whom the loyalty program is being used as a club: state, county, and municipal workers are also being blackmailed and intimidated; and many thousands of private citizens—teachers, librarians, social workers, doctors, lawyers, artists, lecturers, and persons connected with the stage, motion pictures, radio, and television—have been similarly threatened. As a matter of fact, federal employees who have been smeared have less reason to complain than the others since they at least are entitled to a hearing. But hearing or no hearing, there can be little doubt today that the loyalty program has undermined five rights long considered as inalienable: (1) the presumption of innocence until guilt is proved; (2) the doctrine that guilt is personal and cannot be computed in terms of relationship or association; (3) the right of the accused to be informed of the charges made against him in order that he may prepare his defense; (4) the right of the accused to confront and cross-examine his accusers; and (5) immunity against being tried a second time for a charge on which acquittal has been won.

We repeat, therefore, what we said in our open letter to the President last year, namely, that he should correct those phases of the loyalty program which have made it possible "to pervert the program into an instrument of intimidation and blackmail." Specifically, the President should direct the Attorney General to stop the practice of branding organizations "subversive" and set aside the existing list. In modifying the loyalty program in this and other respects, Mr. Truman can with justification point to the fact that he tried to obtain an impartial review of the entire process but that Congress checkmated the attempt. In January, 1951, the President appointed the Commission on Internal Security and Individual Rights, headed by Admiral Chester Nimitz, to examine the whole question, but the commission was disbanded last October after Senator McCarran had successfully blocked legislation which would have enabled it to proceed with its work. Since Congress has made it impossible for the loyalty program to be impartially reviewed and itself failed to correct the program's abuses, the President has every reason to act. After all, the loyalty program is his instrument, not Congress's. Since it came into being by executive order, it can be modified or amended as the President wishes.

A defense of the civil service, as the Washington Post pointed out editorially on May 3, must necessarily take the form of "a political response to the political attacks made upon it." Since he is "not running for anything" this year, Mr. Truman is in an excellent position to make a political issue of McCarthyism. If he acts now, he can commit the Democratic Party to a defense of the principles so eloquently stated in his speech to the National Civil Service League.

But the President can make a political issue of McCarthyism only if he is first prepared to clarify his own position. Unfortunately his condemnation of "political gangsters" who seek to subvert the Bill of Rights is robbed of much of its moral force by reason of the fact that the loyalty program which he initiated has contributed directly to the state of affairs he now deplors. It is intolerable that Mr. Truman's advisers—including former Attorney General Tom Clark—should have put him in the position of having to condemn in his political opponents practices for which he, as President, provided official sanction. If "political gangsters" are in fact "undermining the foundation stones of our Constitution," then the federal government should not be a party to their subversive plottings. The President is entirely justified in saying that he is "just not going to stand for" their gangster tactics and we see no reason why he should. On the contrary, he should clear the decks for a genuine political offensive against McCarthyism, seizing and holding the initiative for the Democrats on this issue from now through the November elections. The way for him to start is to correct those aspects of the loyalty program which have led to its debasement and degradation.

Korean Deadlock

In an exclusive interview with The Nation last February Padilla Nervo, president of the United Nations General Assembly, listed as one of the positive results of the last session in Paris the decision that the Assembly might meet in special session in New York "if an unexpected development threatened an extension of the Korean conflict." Such a development may be close at hand. Not since the Panmunjom talks started have things looked so black. The Korean air is full of mutual recriminations, warlike threats (an admiral speaks of blockading China), and bursting bombs (last week the United Nations air forces unleashed the biggest raid of the war on the town of Susan). American press comment—some of it doubtless inspired, if not exactly inspirational—is already plotting still longer and bigger raids into Manchuria. The question of who is right at Panmunjom—on the war prisoners' problem, we think the United Nations is right—is dwarfed by the terrible dénouement toward which events seem to be moving.

It is in Nervo's power to call a special session of the General Assembly whenever the situation demands it. The responsibility for the ultimate decision in Korea should rest in the hands not merely of the world powers, but of the world, every last corner of which has a vital stake in the question of war and peace.

Easy Credit for Consumers

Suspension of restrictions on consumer installment credit is the latest of several Administration moves to relax controls instituted to check inflation. Some weeks ago restrictions on state and municipal financing were lifted and more recently the voluntary credit-restraint program, used to limit non-defense business borrowing, was put in cold storage. In addition controls on new construction have been eased, together with allocation regulations for a number of once scarce commodities which are now in good supply.

These moves follow a distinct lessening of inflationary pressure since the beginning of the year. For some months there has been a steady decline in wholesale prices—a decline that should soon be reflected in the cost-of-living index. In the case of a number of consumer-goods industries, including textiles, furniture, household appliances, and automobiles, an excess of supply over demand is leading to some softening of prices. This does not necessarily mean depression, or even recession, although it may feel like it to business men who last year were basking in the sun of a seller's market. Employment stays high and retail business is good except in comparison with the post-Korean period of panic buying. But thanks to record production, the lag in the defense program, and the successful operation of controls, the economy has become sufficiently stabilized to justify the relaxation of restraints.

The queer thing is that the very people who attacked the Defense Production Act from the beginning are now disposed to criticize the Administration for dropping controls. It can only be motivated, they suggest, by a desire to insure an atmosphere of prosperity for the election. Not for the first time President Truman is finding he is damned if he does and damned if he doesn't.

"Fascistic Hooey"

After a decade of easy pickings, the American labor movement is slowly awakening to the unhappy realization that the hard-won gains of the 1930's are now seriously endangered. Speaking in Cincinnati at a meeting celebrating the centenary of the International Typographical Union, Woodruff Randolph, its president, denounced the government's labor policy as "fascistic hooley." In his view, the government is restricting the areas in which unions may organize, forbidding workers the right to strike, and arbitrarily fixing wages and prices. "We have reached the point," he said, "where the government sanctions maximum prices instead of competitive prices," and, by indirect subsidies to large corporations, guarantees profits at the expense of the taxpayer. Turning to internal union affairs, Mr. Randolph warned that "there is an ever-present threat of labor power becoming too centralized, dinosaur-fashion, with the body growing too big for the brain. . . . We are right on the verge of Italian fascism under the guise of free enterprise."

It has been quite a while since an American labor leader of Mr. Randolph's prominence and influence has spoken in this vein. Even though he is obviously simplifying the picture, there is enough disturbing truth in his statement to underscore the significance of Hugo Ernst's Labor Views the Campaigns in last week's issue.

Unexpected Markets

There seems to be an assumption in Washington that Japan and Germany have been converted from enemies into docile allies. But now that the first has recovered its sovereignty and the second is about to follow suit, it will not be surprising to find them pursuing courses conflicting with American policies.

Thus we learn from the Wall Street Journal of April 26 that, whatever decision is reached about a German army, neither the industrialists nor the workers of the Ruhr are anxious to turn to arms production. They do not relish the idea of again becoming a high-priority bombing target. Moreover, they see in the defense pre-occupations of their chief foreign competitors a wonderful opportunity to recapture foreign markets.

Japanese business men also seem more interested in building up foreign trade than in turning out guns and tanks. They have ambitious plans for modernizing their plants and the government has earmarked a fund of $100,000,000 to purchase American equipment for export industries. With efficient machinery operated by cheap labor, Japan expects to recover lost markets and gain new ones.

There is, however, one area of the world largely barred to Japan and Germany, not by foreign competitors, but by American policy-makers—the whole Soviet sphere. Eastern Europe is traditionally a major outlet for German manufactures as China is for Japanese products, and both countries are finding current restrictions on trade with these markets increasingly irksome. Recently the Bundestag adopted a resolution calling on the Bonn government to seek normal economic relations with the Soviets and to secure more freedom to conduct such trade from the occupation authorities. Similar pressure on the Japanese government will surely develop, particularly if China makes a firm offer of badly needed coal, iron ore, and soybeans in exchange for Japanese textiles and machinery.

McCarran's "Liberal" Bill

There is nothing good about the McCarran immigration bill which was to come up for debate in the Senate this week. Its provisions are bad, its sponsorship is bad, and the manner in which it is being rushed to a vote makes a shambles of democratic procedure.

McCarran argues that his bill "liberalizes" immigration. We wouldn't believe it even if the bill said so, which it doesn't. The man who not so long ago sought to turn a Displaced Persons bill into a racial sieve cannot now be trusted to write a "liberal" immigration measure.

It is true that the measure might tend to increase immigration in a few special categories. Its overall effect, however, is the reverse. And even those people who come in under the bill will first have to sell their souls to McCarran. For the heart of the Nevada Senator's proposal lies in its policing aspects: the unhappy alien becomes the victim of a special thought-and-speech-control apparatus in the worst McCarthy tradition. The immigration inspector becomes judge and jury of the alien's expressed thoughts. The alien himself becomes a second-class resident, denied normal constitutional rights.

Senator Lehman, in association with a group of liberal Senators, has seen these dangers, and is trying to avert them through introduction of another, and truly liberalizing, bill. It is the measure of McCarran's real attitude toward the problem that he has pulled every parliamentary trick to prevent the Lehman bill from getting a hearing.

Scarsdale's Victory

For more than three years the Board of Education of Scarsdale, New York, has been busy fighting off the attacks of a local committee which has raised the familiar cry of Communist infiltration. Hearing of Scarsdale's "battle of the books," professional anti-Communists moved in to direct the attack and tell the Board of Education how to run the schools. At last week's annual election 1,500 Scarsdale residents—a record attendance—gave the board a rising vote of confidence and appointed a committee to defend it against similar attacks in the future. The opposition failed to enter a slate of candidates but three of its leaders, nominated from the floor, received a total of eleven votes, whereas more than 1,300 ballots were cast for each of the three incumbents.

Scarsdale is doubtless a special case, but the impressive vote by which its residents lifted the siege against the schools demonstrates that even the zeal of demagogues is no match for an aroused public. What happened to McCarthyism in Scarsdale can be made to happen elsewhere.

"Freedom's Stake"

Throughout the vast and acutely strategic area of North Africa and the Middle East the ferment of nationalism is breaking through the crust of old customs and colonial control. Both in the formerly independent Middle Eastern states and in the European dependencies along the Mediterranean coast of Africa the peoples are waking up, with consequences already becoming visible in the struggle for power between Russia and the West.

Sharply aware of the critical nature of this process, The Nation Associates has called a conference for May 25 at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York on Freedom's Stake in the Middle East and North Africa. Details of the sessions appear on the back cover of this issue. Out of the discussions will come, we hope, a positive program for dealing with the issues involved in terms which will contribute to security and peace—by recognizing the just political demands of the people and the need for fundamental social and economic change. We warmly invite all Nation readers within reach to attend the conference and the dinner forum.

Now the Foundations

BY A vote of 193 to 158, the House has adopted a resolution offered by Representative Eugene Cox creating a seven-member select committee to investigate educational and philanthropic foundations "and other comparable organizations" to determine if they are using their resources for "un-American and subversive activities or for purposes not in the interest or tradition of the United States."

In the debate, the resolution was attacked as an encroachment on the preserves of the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the Ways and Means Committee, which have been studying problems of tax exemption for some time. By insisting that his colleagues accept his word that no encroachment would result, Mr. Cox implied that the question of jurisdiction had been cleared with the standing committees. Indeed if one reads between the lines it is apparent that the new committee will have a special function. It will not be so much concerned with tax exemption or the financing of "subversive" or "un-American" projects as with the problem of "coordinating" the policies of the foundations.

The resolution has an interesting history. When it was first introduced, on August 1, 1951, Cox said that he was concerned only with those foundations which "operated in the fields of social reform and international relations." In a later speech, he hinted at the origin of the resolution by referring to "certain public-spirited people . . . themselves trustees of the various larger foundations" who had demanded that such an investigation be made. Also of interest is a reference in Merle Miller's book, "The Judges and the Judged," to the effect that Counter-Attack had been commissioned by an unnamed sponsor "to determine the extent of financial aid that foundations had given to Communist causes or Communist organizations."

Two types of pressure will be brought to bear upon the foundations. On the one hand, a showing will be made that research fellowships have been granted to persons whose names appear on the various "subversive" lists. A series of carefully spaced disclosures of this type will be used to "soften up" the foundation executives. At the same time, an effort will doubtless be made to show that the foundations have at one time or another harbored executives or employees who are or once were members of "subversive" organizations. At this point, a number of disgruntled former employees and unsuccessful applicants for grants can be relied upon to come forward to recite morbid tales of conspiracies and air twenty-year-old personal grievances. All the while, the threat of removing tax exemption can be used as a weapon to force various concessions and genuflections from foundation executives. Even if they resist this pressure, the campaign can hardly fail to influence foundation policies. Some form of "screening" applicants for grants will probably be suggested, and the mere fact that a Congressional investigation is pending will prejudice certain types of projects and give top priority to others. An incidental effect, of course, will be to discourage contributions and endowments for educational foundations.

Of the various provisions of the Cox resolution none is more objectionable than the phrase which authorizes the committee to investigate "other comparable" organizations. Under this provision, as Representative Adam Powell pointed out, the committee could investigate such organizations as the B'nai B'rith, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Urban League, the National Catholic Welfare Council, or the World Council of Churches. And why stop with tax-exempt institutions? Why not also probe the activities of private profit-making corporations? The new committee, it should be noted, will have no legislative jurisdiction; it can do nothing more than inquire, report, and recommend. The point has been made many times—and it was raised in the debate on the Cox resolution—that the number of such committees already in existence and the lengths to which they have gone in conducting investigations which can serve no legislative purpose have come to constitute a grave abuse.

One of the stated purposes of this latest foray into the field of thought control is to determine whether the social purposes being furthered by the foundations are in any way in conflict with the "interest or tradition" of this country. Unfortunately, conceptions of national interest and tradition vary considerably from Camilla, Georgia, where Mr. Cox resides, to the constituencies served, for example, by Representatives Javits, McCarthy, and Powell, all of whom spoke against the resolution. "It is frightening," as Representative McCarthy pointed out, "to consider the realities of a political authority setting the pattern and the limit of intellectual and moral development of its peoples. Yet this is precisely what the totalitarian state attempts, and indirectly could well be the effect of this resolution. In effect what it does is to subordinate another phase of American life to political authority. If we are to continue this course, it means that there will remain nothing that is normal or natural or private that cannot be taken from man and made political. . . . This resolution . . . indicates a lack of confidence in the free institutions of this country, and fundamentally and finally a lack of confidence in the people of the United States."

Fortunately Representative Cox has promised to step aside, once the committee has been organized, and has suggested the name of Representative Brooks Hays as chairman in his stead. But a substitution of chairmen—even one as desirable as this—will not guard against the dangers implicit in this latest investigation. Even the members of the Eighty-second Congress seemed to realize that the Cox resolution was carrying the investigation mania a bit too far: it provoked the strongest opposition yet voiced in Congress against a witch-hunting measure.

Speaking Out on Foreign Policy

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

ONCE again the West finds itself in a difficult period. Interrelated problems such as Korea and Germany, means of implementing the decisions reached at the NATO conference in Lisbon in the face of the obstacles created by the extreme nationalism of certain Atlantic powers, Congressional opposition to granting the sums asked by President Truman for Western defense and the corresponding slowdown in Europe's rearmament, now months behind schedule—all together, these items have created a situation close to crisis. Some Western observers are asking themselves whether the entire strategy of the Atlantic coalition, in the main an American concept, does not need prompt and energetic revision.

Inside and outside the United Nations pessimism is again mounting in view of the turn taken by the truce negotiations in Korea. The situation in Bonn offers no greater promise. The efforts of Chancellor Adenauer to hasten the integration of Western Germany in the Atlantic coalition are checked by each new German election (the latest setback occurred May 4 in Hesse).

At the same time demands are multiplying in every NATO country—and in Germany too—that the United States abandon its opposition to the conference on German unification proposed by Stalin. Diplomatic pressure, about which so little has appeared in the press, was so insistent during the last fortnight that Washington finally gave ground, declaring itself as at least not opposed in principle to such a conference. To the degree that the original Lisbon accord has been punctured by the subsequent disagreements of the major Atlantic powers, mutual reproaches and accusations are poisoning the diplomatic air of the West. In their private comments in the United Nations the Americans blame the Germans for asking too much and the French for conceding too little; but especially they blame the British, insisting that if Churchill as Prime Minister had maintained the position on the unification of Europe that he took when he was leader of the Opposition, all the time lost in ironing out differences among the continental powers could have been saved and the Western European "community," with West Germany inside, would long since have been a reality. The British for their part have reacted with indignation to Washington's renewed effort to put an American in command of NATO's Mediterranean forces. Said the London Daily Mail: "We sometimes wonder what the United States thinks we are. After all, the British Empire is not some Central American republic!" while the Mirror asks: "What would Nelson say?" No, harmony does not reign these days within either the Atlantic or the Adenauer coalition.

Viewed as a whole, the situation hardly justifies the tone of self-confidence adopted by Secretary Acheson only two weeks ago before the American Society of Newspaper Editors. It must confuse the average American to be assured at one moment that everything is going well and then be told a few weeks later that everything is at a perilous standstill. To explain this situation he can do one of two things: put all the responsibility on a single demon called the Soviet Union or try to discover if at least part of the evil does not stem from the absence of a foreign policy based on facts and honest analysis.

An irresponsible campaign of blackmail and intimidation, waged not only by the Right but by the "half-Left" including liberals and labor leaders blinded by their hatred of everything remotely related to Moscow or anything that could be twisted into the appearance of such a connection, has prevented the free discussion of foreign affairs which might have helped Washington elaborate a policy both more realistic in terms of world events and more reassuring to the American people and their allies abroad.

In its issue of May 3, the Saturday Review, in an editorial commenting on a conversation that took place in Peoria, Illinois, quoted this sentence, spoken by a Bradley University professor: "If you're a professor dealing with some aspect of contemporary history—let's say Europe or the Far East or even the United Nations as an organization—you honestly don't know whether you should give the facts as you understand them or whether the thing to do is to say to yourself, the hell with the facts, and try to figure out what the big investigations will be about two years from now and then teach things today that will look good later."

But facts and the correct interpretation of facts are the basis of every successful foreign policy. Without this even the most powerful nation can be condemned to final failure, stumbling into a situation in which it is unable to make peace or to make war. Held in a strait-jacket by the slogans of its own propaganda, a foreign policy loses the agility that is indispensable for effective action.

THROUGH the same process of intimidation that paralyzed the Bradley professor, we have been deprived of our best commentators on foreign affairs in the press, the radio, in public discussions. A vicious and stupid campaign, pursued for years, has pretty well succeeded in branding as Communists or fellow-travelers anyone who dared to criticize the policy of containment, to advocate Big Four negotiations, or to dissent in any other way from the orthodox point of view. Some of these men have, it is true, managed to retain their jobs, but at the cost of spontaneity and frankness. Thus they have been rendered useless in their most essential function of orienting and informing a public opinion which in turn might be able to help avoid or correct the mistakes of the official makers of foreign policy. The few exceptions, such men as Walter Lippmann in the press and Howard K. Smith on C. B. S. from London, deserve the greatest credit for their frankness and courage as well as for their insight into world affairs.

Occasionally commentators are able to take advantage of the classic device of quoting a person so conservative or so eminent as to be above suspicion. Former President Herbert Hoover became available for such use when he said in one of his recent addresses: "There is in Europe today no such public alarm over the im-

Plus ça change . . .

I know no country in which there is so little true independence of mind and freedom of discussion as in America. . . . In America, the majority raises very formidable barriers to the liberty of opinion; within these barriers an author may write whatever he pleases, but he will repent it if he ever steps beyond them. Not that he is exposed to the terrors of an auto-da-fe, but he is tormented by the slights and persecutions of daily obloquy. His political career is closed forever. . . . Every sort of compensation, even that of celebrity, is refused to him. . . .

[Under tyranny in democratic republics] the body is left free, and the soul is enslaved. The sovereign can no longer say, "You think as I do on pain of death," but he says, "you are free to think differently from me . . . but if such be your determination, you are henceforth an alien among your people. . . . You will remain among men, but you will be deprived of the rights of mankind. Your fellow creatures will shun you like an impure being, and those who are most persuaded of your innocence will abandon you, too, lest they should be shunned in their turn."—From "Democracy in America" by Alexis de Tocqueville (published 1835).

minence of Communist invasion as has been fanned up in the United States. Russian ground armies could have overrun Western Europe in a two-months campaign any time in the past five years and can no doubt do it during several years to come. That they have not done so seems proof that the Kremlin can see no final military victory." Mr. Arnaldo Cortesi was similarly obliging last Sunday in the New York Times when, discussing the principal reasons for the difficult positions of De Gasperi in the coming Italian municipal elections, he listed as the first: "Fear of communism—which was unusually acute in 1948 and caused many right-wingers to vote for the Christian Democrats as the strongest and most active of the anti-Communist parties—has now diminished."

Such comments throw a useful light upon the reasons for the difficulties American foreign policy is now encountering, for if Moscow is unlikely to strike or if Europeans are losing their fear of communism, it is going to be rather hard to make Europe accept higher taxes and other sacrifices, not only material but political. President Auriol is reported by intimates as having said: "They [the Americans] are asking me to put all my energy into fighting an imaginary danger, a Russian invasion of France, while abandoning opposition to a real and well-known danger—the rearmament of Germany."

But it is not only the columnist, the radio commentator, the university professor who suffers the effects of the campaign of intimidation. American policymakers themselves bend under its impact. Secretary Acheson has been forced on several issues to adopt Republican policies not necessarily to his liking; Philip Jessup, an able negotiator, was politically crippled by the vote of no-confidence passed by the Senate on the eve of his departure for Paris to represent the United States in the U. N. Assembly, an action that was acidly —and incredulously—commented upon by European diplomats.

Never has a great nation been more in need of applying its best talents to the framing of an intelligent and workable foreign policy. Without it all the material and political strength America can muster will prove useless at this crucial turning point in history.

2,400 Miles to Prosperity

BY ROD VAN EVERY

SOME 2,400 miles west of the Atlantic Ocean, an icy creek ripples over black rock and foams into an inland sea. The creek is one of the headwaters of the mighty St. Lawrence River, pride of the Northeast. It feeds one of the greatest inland waterways of the world, the Great Lakes. It is the western end of the hated, maligned, praised St. Lawrence Seaway, a favorite subject for high-school debaters since the 1920's.

Actually, the St. Lawrence Seaway has been in operation for 150 years or so. Nature provided most of the route; Canada and the United States had to put their engineers to work in only a few spots. The present controversy, hotly disputed for twenty-five years, concerns only the deepening of an already existing waterway.

The toughest, most dogged fighters for an improved seaway are, understandably, from the Middle West and states bordering the Great Lakes. They are interested in the navigational aspects. They care little about the tremendous electric-power potential of the St. Lawrence, of prime importance to the Northeast. But they are sure that deeper channels, locks, and canals will mean all these things to the Midwest:

☞ A tremendous increase in traffic, often at lower rates, between lake ports and with Eastern ports and Europe.

☞ Fairer industrial competition with the Eastern Seaboard and Europe.

☞ An alternate route, in peace or war, for vital iron ore; increased steel production instead of the threatened migration of the steel industry.

☞ Retention of control by a powerful nation of a strategic waterway.

☞ Stabilized lake levels and an expanded Great Lakes shipyard industry.

☞ Such a general increase in the prosperity of a vast, important region of America that the entire nation would be benefited.

Opponents of the seaway—chiefly Eastern railroad, banking, coal, electric utility, shipping, and port interests—contend that none of these things will result; that deeper channels would mean only dislocation, perhaps permanent damage to their interests.

The arguments, pro and con, are an old story, but the seaway, with its improved power development, is going to be built. Canada is determined to go it alone if the United States will not cooperate. She has waited many years, watching with exasperation the way private-power politics and sectional interests have stalled Congressional action. Few, even among seaway opponents, believe that Canada is bluffing. Her parliament has given authorization. Her treasury is in good shape. An all-Canadian seaway route has been laid out. Her leaders have committed themselves to the undertaking. Canada needs the power output of the St. Lawrence; she needs the deeper channels.

Three questions remain. One is before Congress now: Shall the United States make it a joint project with joint control over tolls and operation?

The second: Can Canada legally go it alone? The consensus in Washington is that she can. She must work through some United States agency, probably the Federal Power Commission, and through the International Joint Commission set up in 1909 to iron out boundary disputes. Exploratory discussions are now going on.

The third question is whether to deepen channels west of Lake Erie if Canada builds the bigger seaway alone. The all-Canadian route would end with the Welland Canal. The twenty-one-foot upbound channels of the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers would keep big ships out of Lakes Huron, Michigan, and Superior. All ports west of Toledo would be "high and dry" so far as twenty-seven-foot-draft ships are concerned. It is inconceivable to such ports as Detroit, Superior-Duluth, Milwaukee, and Chicago that the United States Government would not extend the deepened route all the way.

The chief seaway bottleneck is the string of fourteen-foot canals and locks in the St. Lawrence River between ROD VAN EVERY, on the staff of the Milwaukee Journal, has been specializing in the St. Lawrence Seaway story.

Montreal and Ogdensburg, N. Y. These are so shallow that only barges and short-draft ships can use them. Lesser bottlenecks exist in the twenty-five-foot canals and locks of the Welland Canal and in the twenty-one-foot upbound and twenty-six-foot downbound (deeper for heavy ore cargoes) channels of the St. Clair River and the Detroit River near Detroit, and the St. Marys River near Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan. Engineering plans call for cutting all these to twenty-seven feet, deep enough for most of the world's shipping.

On the basis of 1950 construction costs, the Army Engineers, famous for their too low estimates, put the full cost of the seaway at $818,000,000. America's share would be $566,000,000; Canada pays less because of the "credit" given her for work she already has done—rebuilding the Welland Canal and deepening the Thousand Islands section of the St. Lawrence.

Seaway proponents insist the construction cost is of little moment because it would be spread over five to seven years and would be liquidated by cargo tolls. But the sum is a major obstacle to a Congress acutely aware of the public demand for economy. A recent amendment to seaway legislation would provide the money by empowering a government corporation to sell seaway construction bonds to private investors.

Congressional opposition to the seaway on the ground of economy is the more bewildering to lake states because of the huge appropriations for power, flood-control, and irrigation projects in other sections of the country, seaway building in Texas, channeling for the Delaware River, even seaway and power projects in France financed by detouring American dollars. The growing dissatisfaction of the Midwest was demonstrated this spring when an official state body of Wisconsin publicly asked its Congressional delegation to practice log-rolling with reverse English—"You block the seaway any longer and we'll block your pet project."

No matter what the cost of the deepened seaway, Midwest leaders feel, it is an economic necessity. Now, a Midwest manufacturer or steel fabricator must include in his bid on Eastern or European contracts the cost of rail transportation. If he could ship by water, the rate would be far lower and he would be in a stronger competitive position.

Some ocean-shipping rates from Great Lakes ports to foreign lands are the same as from East Coast ports. Further savings could be made on exports straight from Midwest port to European dock—elimination of East Coast transshipping, lower insurance rates, reduced warehousing and dockage, less breakage, perhaps less crating. One Midwest manufacturer recently won a Norwegian contract for paper-mill machinery because he could ship in a small Norwegian vessel and save $18 a ton. Others, however, have lost contracts because their products were too big and heavy for the holds of ships limited in size by the fourteen-foot St. Lawrence canals.

In spite of the present canal limitations, foreign trade with the Great Lakes ports has been steadily increasing. In 1949, the import-export total was 160,000 tons, valued at $51,000,000. Seven major foreign lines sail profitably into the Great Lakes, and some have even designed new ships especially for the shallow canals. Forty-one foreign-flag ships are in regular service this season and about ten others are in charter service.

Imports from the Midwest, now confined largely to manufactured products, will take on added significance when the St. Lawrence canals are deepened. Then it will be possible to bring in raw materials—iron ore, limestone, coal and oil—in great quantities. This is the low-value "bulk" trade, economically possible only in big ships and a great saver of manufacturing costs.

Iron ore from newly found fields in Labrador and Quebec is sure to outstrip all other imports in tonnage and importance. For many years steel furnaces from Buffalo and Pittsburgh on the east, through Ohio and Indiana to Chicago on the west, have gulped iron from the Mesabi Range in northern Minnesota. About 90 per cent of all the ore they use comes from the Mesabi, shipped in deep-draft lake boats. But the days of the high-grade, open-pit ore of the Mesabi are numbered. When the ore runs out, in fifteen to thirty years, there will remain low-grade taconite and other high-grade but underground ores. It is cheap to dig open-pit ore. To increase production—for instance, in war-time—you just use more power shovels. It is neither cheap nor easy to increase the output of underground mines or the recovery from taconite. The steel industry cannot use taconite as it is found in nature because there is too little iron in it. Concentrating plants are slow and costly to build, and they use a lot of manpower.

In time of emergency, the alternative for quick expansion in the steel industry is discovery of new supplies of high-grade, easily mined, easily transported iron ore. That combination was found in the Labrador-Quebec fields. The Labrador ore is of higher iron assay than Mesabi ore. It lies on the surface of the ground, like Mesabi. It can be easily and cheaply transported in Great Lakes ore boats from the port of Seven Islands on the land-protected Gulf of St. Lawrence—if the St. Lawrence canals are deepened.

If the seaway is not improved Midwest economists see this chain of events: Labrador ore destined for most of America's steel furnaces will be subject to long, expensive rail hauls. This will increase costs so much that a large part of the industry will have to migrate to the East Coast. This dislocation of a basic industry, involving other major industries such as automobile manufacture, will disrupt the economy of the Midwest, probably of all America.

During World War II most of America was scarcely aware of the importance of the Soo locks between Lakes Superior and Huron. Why have armed guards there? Anti-aircraft gun emplacements? Fighter-interceptor squadrons? The Midwest and its steel industry (shortly the Chicago-Gary district will surpass the Pittsburgh district in steel production) knew the answers and worried over the iron-curtained Soo.

If the Soo locks had been bombed, the flow of Mesabi iron ore would have been dammed in Lake Superior, with no outlet except the overworked, under-equipped railroads. America might very well have lost so much steel production as a result of bombing that it would have lost the war. Then there was no nearby, alternative ore source. Now there is—Labrador.

A NEW impetus to improve the seaway has come from parts of the Midwest within the last few months. It is not concerned with iron ore, navigation, or power, but with the weather and lake levels.

Unusually heavy snows and rains in recent years, coupled with fast run-offs because of deeply frozen or saturated ground, have caused most of the Great Lakes to rise steadily toward a new high. The fastest rise came in the past winter and early spring. Lake-shore dwellers, particularly on Michigan and Huron, watched their beaches disappear and saw storms do millions of dollars' worth of damage to their properties. Roads, trees, and utility poles were washed out; cliffs and summer-home foundations undermined; fishing shanties smashed; basements flooded; sewer outlets clogged; even the opening of cantilever bridges slowed.

And what has all this to do with the St. Lawrence Seaway?

True, deepened canals in the St. Lawrence, 600 feet below the level of Lake Superior, would have no effect on levels of any lake above Niagara Falls. But control works at the Welland Canal and in the St. Clair and Detroit Rivers, suggested as part of the long-range seaway plans, would stabilize the levels of Lakes Erie, Huron and Michigan.

High water has its good points, too. To shipping interests it means millions of extra dollars in increased tonnage that can be carried cheaper, faster. The average Great Lakes bulk carrier can load ninety tons more into her barnlike hold for every inch the lakes rise. The additional tonnage costs little more to load and carry. To ports, high water means less dredging of canals, channels, and at docks, and less dry rot in pilings.

In high water or low, nobody expects the Queen

Elizabeth or the U. S. S. Missouri to come huffing up the St. Lawrence to dock in the Chicago River. But where the St. Lawrence canals now limit ship sizes to about 3,000 tons, deeper canals and bigger locks would open the way to ships of 20,000 or more tons.

This means that a major part of the United States navy could be built, outfitted, or repaired in the inland safety of the Great Lakes. In World War II such work was limited to submarines, destroyer escorts, small patrol craft, and seagoing tugs. Getting them into salt water was expensive. Many lake shipyards closed at war's end. Now, some Great Lakes ports expect a revived ship-building industry, military and commercial, with extension of the seaway.

It is difficult for the Midwest to believe that a world power like the United States would deliberately turn its back on a share in the control of one of man's greatest waterways. History points in the other direction. Nations have waged wars over control of strategic water routes. The Midwest seaway leaders have fought long and been frustrated often. They have had the backing of every American President since Woodrow Wilson, every investigating body, the best in military and economic opinion. Yet the medieval canals of the St. Lawrence remain.

The year is nineteen hundred and fifty-two. The time is short. If America won't, Canada will. And that is all right with the Midwest.

Bevanism Wins in America

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

IN THE spring of 1951, Aneurin Bevan resigned his Cabinet post in the British Labor government because, doubting the imminence of war with Russia, he considered the government's three-year rearmament program to be unnecessarily prejudicial to the British worker's standard of living. He argued, in vain, that the program should be spread over four years.

Mr. Bevan was bitterly attacked for months afterwards both in Britain and in the United States. American critics charged him with being ready to sell the "free world" down the Elbe to preserve free eyeglasses and false teeth for Britons.

It is now a matter of history that Churchill, returning to power in the elections held a few months after Bevan's resignation, suddenly decided that the Welshman was right. The Tory government has spread the British rearmament program, not over four years, but over an even longer period. What is also history, though less well known, is that even while American critics were attacking "Bevanism," our government was accepting the idea for its own rearmament program.

On February 5, the New York Times, reporting on the testimony of Secretary of Defense Robert R. Lovett before a Senate Appropriations Subcommittee, said in part:

Last September, he [Lovett] continued, the theory behind the military budget was revised. It was then decided that, instead of attempting a great and costly rearmament effort designed to achieve minimum desired strength almost at once, the program would be slowed down and leveled off with the middle of 1954 as the approximate target date for completion. . . . The rapid rearmament planned until last September would have thrown a probably impossible burden on the economy.

So far as I know, not a single Washington correspondent pointed out that we were adopting "Bevanism" even as we were attacking Bevan. To-day, when all the vital data are available in the Economic Report of the President of January, 1952, it is clear that Aneurin Bevan was right not only for Britain but for the United States as well.

Three factors are responsible for the slowdown in the tempo of American rearmament. Most important is the international situation; the conviction has gained ground that the Kremlin intends neither to start nor to provoke a war within the near future. This being the case, there is obviously no compelling reason to accelerate military production to a degree that would cause severe economic dislocation.

The second reason for the slowdown is the substantial priming period necessary to produce the complex equipment needed for modern warfare. If this priming period were to be sharply curtailed, the whole economy would be adversely affected. As the President's 1952 report says:

Major difficulties have been encountered . . . in getting our military production under way. These difficulties involve chiefly the machine-tool and other bottlenecks, and design, engineering, and production problems associated with the decision to produce exceedingly complex equipment of the most advanced design, rather than to concentrate on large-scale production of types already in use.

The third reason for the slowdown is the fact that American standards of living, and the existing wage and profit levels, can be more easily maintained if the defense program is carried out at the present slower pace. The present rate of military expansion approximates the increase in over-all American production. This is a most important point, since it affects the living standards of our allies as well as our own.

Our total output in 1947 amounted to 270 billion dollars (in terms of 1951 prices)—about one-third higher than before the outbreak of World War II. This is in striking contrast to the experience of our European allies, who by 1947 were either still lagging behind their pre-war living standard or had barely restored it.

By mid-summer of 1950, our annual output had increased by approximately thirty billions; given impetus by the outbreak of the Korean war, it jumped an additional thirty billions by January, 1952. Since 1947, therefore, our annual output has increased by sixty billions—from 270 billions to 330 billions. "The sixty-billion-dollar increase," remarks the President's 1952 report, "was greater than the total cost of the security program in 1951." Thus even at the present level of production we can carry the military budget while maintaining our 1947 standard of living, which was one-third higher than in 1939 and only a little lower than in the spring of 1950, before the Korean war started.

But even this relatively small civilian sacrifice turns out to be unnecessary. Since the defense program has been spread over four years instead of three, the increase in arms production is by and large not greater than the increase in total production since the Korean war began. Arms expenditures at the end of 1951, for instance, amounted to about 14 per cent of national production compared to 8 per cent in 1950. But in the same period gross national production (calculated in 1951 prices) rose from 300 to 330 billion dollars, an increase of 10 per cent and more than enough to cushion the effect of the rise in military expenditures. The President's 1952 report indicates that our standard of living actually rose somewhat in 1951.

The situation will not be much different for us in 1952. This year military expenditures will increase by another twenty billion dollars (they are expected to reach a total of sixty-five billions by the end of the year). But this rise will be almost balanced, according to the President's report, by a 5 per cent rise—about fifteen to twenty billion dollars—in our overall production. Thus our growing arms expenditures will not require any major drop in the total output of consumer goods, although there will be some curtailment in durable goods such as automobiles and housing. Moreover, there is no doubt that the huge conversion program will cause considerable trouble in certain areas.

Any sudden increase in international tension could, of course, destroy the existing balance between arms production and overall output. For example, the American military budget does not provide large-scale appropriations for carrying on the Korean war. But if these are not called for, and no new "minor" war breaks out elsewhere, arms expenditures will hardly exceed the budget as now contemplated. This budget is smaller than the one the government laid down in 1950 when, immediately after the Chinese intervention in Korea, we simultaneously launched a huge rearmament program here and urged our European allies to do the same. That our expenditures have slowed down is made clear in the President's report: "The rate of expansion of the security program slackened toward the end of 1951. During the last quarter, security expenditures are estimated to have increased only three billion dollars, at an annual rate, compared with an average increase of six billion dollars in each of the previous three quarters."

According to the President's report of January, 1951, the proportion of total output devoted to security purposes, which totaled about 6 per cent before Korea and rose to 11 per cent in 1950, was to rise 15 per cent by the end of 1951 and to approach 20 per cent this year. In reality, 1951 military expenditures amounted to 14 per cent instead of 15 per cent, and will reach 18 per cent (instead of 20 per cent) by the end of 1952. These percentage differences would seem to be minuscule; in terms of money they amount to a great deal. Each per cent of national income spent for rearmament means we are three billion dollars more out of pocket. If, instead of spending 20 per cent of our national income on military production this year, we spend only 16 or 17 per cent, we have cut our military budget by ten billion dollars. That's more than double the total military budget of Great Britain, and more than the United States is spending this year for military and economic aid to all of Europe and Asia.

It adds up, then, to this: We who are refusing to sacrifice our relatively high living standards for rearmament cannot now complain because Britain, following Bevan's policy, is reluctant to do anything which would imperil its own much lower standards.

The Retrogression of Senator Taft

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Washington, D. C.

THIS campaign, it seems reasonable to believe, is proving a little puzzling to Senator Robert Alphonso Taft, the "Mr. Republican" who for the third time in twelve years is making his bid for the supreme prize within the gift of the Grand Old Party. All the tricks he is trying in 1952 were tested and found useful in Ohio just two years ago. He has groups of "lawyers for Taft" and "doctors for Taft" employing the direct-mail solicitations invented by Whitaker and Baxter, the American Medical Association's slick-paper propagandists. He is campaigning through the hamlets and big industrial towns of two dozen states as vigorously as he campaigned in Ohio for nearly a year before he was triumphantly reelected to the Senate. He holds babies; he shakes hands; he repeats speeches until he is admittedly sick of the sound of his own voice; he insists that he is "labor's true friend." He still claimed, as of last week, that he would go into the Republican convention in July with a majority of the votes on the first ballot and emerge as the Republican nominee with a mandate to make a better fight than Tom Dewey did in 1948.

Yet the suspicion exists among many observers that he is wrong, that his blitzkrieg tactics have failed, that once again he will lose the victory and end up making speeches for the successful nominee and facing the prospect of four years more as Senate Republican Policy Committee chairman, doomed to execute programs for some other Republican President or perhaps to fight another Democrat.

Taft's political life is an enormous irony. Able, intelligent, a skilled legislator, he has twice previously been tricked out of Presidential nominations that by all the rules might have been his. By the rules he should have been the nominee in 1940: he had served in the Senate only since the 1938 election but he had whipped a prime New Deal intellectual, Representative T. V. Smith of the University of Chicago, in a nationally broadcast series of radio debates, and he already was being hailed by the Old Guard as the Republican champion. But suddenly emerged Wendell L. Willkie, with Wall Street money and the public-relations techniques of the Henry Luce-Atlantic Seaboard "internationalists" behind him, and Willkie "stole" the nomination as the convention was stampeded by the packed galleries chanting his name. In 1948 Taft's chances were less dazzling, but he could have had the nomination if Harold E. Stassen had agreed, at the proper moment, to accept the vice-presidential place on a Taft-headed ticket. The Chicago Tribune did its best to promote this deal, and had it been concluded before the first ballot in Philadelphia, Dewey might have been blocked. It is amusing to recall that James S. Duff, then Governor of Pennsylvania, was pro-Taft in 1948 and would have been delighted to go along with a Taft-Stassen ticket. But Stassen would not deal, the anti-Dewey forces collapsed, and Taft was whipped. Today Duff is playing a role in the Eisenhower coalition.

Senator Robert Taft

Some people in this world have bad luck. They work hard, they live up to the maxims, yet they never win the prizes that fall to the Horatio Alger boys. The electorate never calls on them for "duty"—as Eisenhower would put it. Taft may be one of these unfortunate souls. He is the beau ideal of Republicans—except in Presidential years. He had all the money he needed—at least $2,000,000—when he was in trouble in Ohio in 1950 and his friends wanted to teach the labor boys a lesson. He is not precisely suffering from financial stringency this year; he has a large and capable staff of technicians, tacticians, and well wishers. But the big Republican money, the slickest public-relations boys, are behind Eisenhower. The coalition that backed Willkie in 1940 and Dewey in 1948 is still functioning—and it is anti-Taft.

As the campaign has grown hotter, and as Taft has seen blitzkrieg tactics fail to check the Eisenhower boom, the Ohio Senator has become so reckless and bigoted in his speeches that it is difficult to remember the Taft who used to be respected for his integrity. He was indignant when he was quoted two years ago as approving Senator McCarthy's attacks on the State Department. But he did not become indignant until weeks after the newspapers had carried the original story and he made no public denial until he thought he was in trouble in Ohio for supporting McCarthy. At Des Moines, last

This is the fourth of a series of profiles of persons most widely mentioned as possible Presidential candidates. Willard Shelton is a veteran Washington correspondent and a regular contributor to The Nation.

October, he suggested that McCarthy had perhaps sometimes "overstated" his position. This won from Jumping Joe a warning rejoinder that he would not credit any report of a repudiation by Taft until he heard it himself—and he has never yet heard it. Instead, he had the pleasure of getting a Taft testimonial in Beloit last January, when Taft told a Wisconsin audience that the "pro-Communist" policies of the State Department "fully justified" McCarthy's demands for an inquiry. What nonsense is this? Decent people have excoriated McCarthy not for demanding an "inquiry," but for lies and character assassination that brought him a direct repudiation from the six Republican Senators who joined Margaret Chase Smith in her "declaration of conscience." Senator Taft's conscience has become so flexible that he apparently refuses to admit the difference. Taft cited the dismissal of John Stewart Service as justifying the McCarthy "inquiry." Is this the Taft who prided himself on saving civil liberties by blocking President Truman's ill-advised "draft strikers" bill in 1946?

Taft has deluded himself into believing the legend that Dewey's refusal to "fight" was responsible for the Republican debacle in 1948. He does not seem to realize that Dewey was placed in an impossible position by the Republican Eightieth Congress—that to "defend" such a Congress might very well have lost the Republicans more votes than to ignore it. So, as a campaigner in 1952, Taft has severely criticized Dewey's 1948 tactics; he thinks it necessary to show himself different from Dewey and to assail the Administration on every issue.

TAFT has become a military expert—although he has never served on either the Senate's Armed Services or Foreign Relations Committee—and he proclaims his august lack of confidence in our Joint Chiefs of Staff. Why? Well, Truman appointed them, didn't he? Taft believes we should build up air power rather than ground power. Why? Well, he has had some counsel from Brigadier General Bonner Fellers (retired), the Republican National Committee's military attaché, and from General Wedemeyer (retired), and a few others. And the Truman Administration, after all, is in favor of "balanced" forces of ground, sea, and air units. That is enough to make any good Republican fighting mad and certain the policy is wrong.

The Korean war is "Truman's war." It is the "unnecessary war." It is the war that was "invited" by Secretary Acheson. The record shows merely that Acheson warned that we could not hope to settle all the problems of Asia by our intervention—that our economic and military strength could be usefully applied only when our strength was the single "missing component" needed to help an area stabilize itself. Acheson never said that we would not fight to defend the Republic of Korea against gross and direct military aggression. Taft and the Eightieth Congress cut the heart out of the economic and military aid advocated by the Administration for Korea. But everything is Truman's fault—according to Taft.

Taft thinks he must "fight" to prove that he would be a different stripe of candidate from Dewey. If he tries to win votes by charging that the Administration "deliberately built up" Russia as a world power, he may be charged with a stupid and unworthy distortion of history. But he can't be charged with being "soft toward Truman."

Taft is hagridden with a desire to scotch the dreadful impeachment that he lacks political sex appeal, that as the Presidential nominee he couldn't win. So he told his audiences in New Hampshire that he had always been a winner in his political adventures and that in 1950, in fact, he won by the largest plurality ever given a candidate for the Senate in Ohio. He may have forgotten—it was so long ago—that he was licked in 1922 in a race for the Ohio state Senate, and that in 1938 and 1944 he barely won election to the United States Senate. But the Taft of even four years ago—the Taft who was more cautious about his statements and enjoyed a reputation for integrity—would have been expected to remember.

As a traditional conservative, Taft used to be valuable in the Senate. Traditional conservatives tend to be compromisers with democracy and with facts, and Taft in the 1940's was an advocate of "middle-way" public-housing bills and aid-to-education bills. Traditional conservatives respect law and order and the procedural niceties that safeguard individual rights; they are reluctant to support laws that restrict liberty. In 1948 Taft privately told reporters that there would have to be "substantial changes" in the Mundt-Nixon Communist-control bill before he could support it, that its registration-for-Communists provisions seemed to him of questionable legality. But in 1950 he voted without hesitation for the McCarran "internal-security" law, which imposed registration provisions on Communists and serious restrictions on freedom of movement of persons merely accused of improper political associations. He was running for reelection, just as were some liberal Democrats and Republicans, and neither Taft nor the liberals wanted to have to take time to explain away a vote against McCarran. That is the situation into which the country has been pushed by McCarthyism—and Taft thinks that his direct support of McCarthy, his encouragement of McCarthyism, can be balanced by the wisecrack that he would "welcome the support of Wayne Morse" as well as that of McCarthy. The insult to Morse is no worse than the insult to the intelligence of the voters generally. The cream of the jest is that McCarthy has never yet publicly declared for Taft; he has forced Taft to seek his favor yet he is free, if he thinks it desirable, to leap aboard the Eisenhower bandwagon.

Taft today is apparently incapable of such a speech as Senator Wiley made to the American Society of Newspaper Editors recently—a speech reminiscent of Vandenberg's moderation and sense of responsibility in discussing foreign affairs. The notion that Wiley could be intellectually more honest than Taft would have astonished leading Wisconsin citizens as recently as three or four years ago. Taft's partisanship, his desire to "fight" the Administration, has led him into preposterous overstatements and to reckless adventurism in the whole field of Far Eastern policy.

One wonders what this man would do in the White House. If he cites the Service case as justifying McCarthy, what protection could victimized public officials expect from his oath to preserve and defend the Constitution? If he would throw out the Joint Chiefs of Staff and "bring back MacArthur," as he has promised, to what lengths would he go in trying to overthrow communism in China with American armies—or perhaps just American bombs? Would the Southern Democrat he promises to place in his Cabinet be a man like Senator Byrd, who with Taft has been hostile to Mutual Assistance and Marshall Plan appropriations and has voted repeatedly to cut down assistance to Western Europe? Would he pull American divisions out of Europe or just slash our foreign-aid budget? Would he solve our labor-management problems by reviving his barely defeated 1947 proposal to make the Taft-Hartley act harsher by restricting industry-wide bargaining?

Taft's chances in the convention, it is clear, depend on whether the Midwestern and rotten-borough Southern delegates at Chicago can outmaneuver, outlast, and finally break down the coalition of Atlantic Seaboard and West Coast Republicans that nominated Willkie in 1940 and Dewey in 1944 and 1948. Taft is Colonel McCormick's candidate, the isolationists' candidate. He may say as often as he pleases that he now "supports" the North Atlantic Treaty Organization although he voted against NATO's ratification in 1949. But non-isolationists from the East Coast and West Coast do not trust him. Senator Morse does not trust him—and is driven by this distrust to support a military man, General Eisenhower, whose known position on domestic policies can scarcely be pleasing to the Oregon liberal. Senator Ives of New York and Senator Lodge of Massachusetts shrink from the nightmarish thought of running for reelection with Taft at the head of the Republican ticket. The contest for delegates is now reaching the no-holds-barred stage, and Taft is a tough and tenacious infighter in a political barroom brawl. It is a disagreeable truth that the Taft of 1940 and the Taft of 1948 were preferable to this curious campaigner of 1952, this Taft whose thwarted ambition makes him almost unrecognizable.

No Mandate for a Bolt

BY WILLIAM CARLETON

Gainesville, Florida

THE most surprising and significant feature of the Russell-Kefauver Presidential-preference primary in Florida on May 6 was the closeness of the vote. So far as Senator Russell is concerned, it fell so far short of expectations as well-nigh to preclude a formidable Dixie revolt against the Democratic Party this year.

Senator Kefauver was opposed by one of the strongest combinations in the history of the state, a fact that was repeatedly noted by the local press. A few days before the voting, an election prediction based on the observations of Florida's political correspondents gave Kefauver only about 40 per cent of the vote. Newspapers quoted Senator Spessard L. Holland as predicting a Russell sweep of more than two to one, possibly of three to one.

WILLIAM CARLETON is a member of the department of political science at the University of Florida.

As it turned out, Russell and Kefauver ran a photo-finish race in southern and central Florida, and it was only the late returns from the rural, Old South counties near the Alabama and Georgia borders that gave Russell his relatively narrow victory. Delegates to the Democratic National Convention will be chosen in the second primary, on May 27, and indications are that Kefauver will win several of them.

Russell had behind him a misalliance of Dixiecrats, conservative regulars, "Presidential Republicans" voting in the Democratic primary, and friends of Governor Fuller Warren, who in the past frequently has been on the liberal side and an ally of former Senator Claude Pepper. Warren bitterly resented the Kefauver Committee's activities in Florida last year.

Large sums of money poured into Russell's campaign, some reputedly garnered from Northern conservatives and from national gambling interests; the Russell forces officially admitted spending six times as much as did Kefauver's. Russell had the vigorous and almost unanimous support of the press, overwhelmingly conservative. He also had the active and unanimous support of the Congressional delegations, solidly conservative, and of the vast majority of professional politicians.

THIS impressive array of Russell support must also be viewed against the deeper social and political background of the state. Florida, unlike north Alabama, for instance, has few former Populist counties. There is little manufacturing and organized labor is weak. Agriculture is predominantly specialized—citrus, fresh vegetables and truck crops, cattle raising. It is essentially a middle-class state with small and medium-sized residential cities where chambers of commerce and civic clubs are influential. In the Middle West such communities are the bulwarks of Republican strength; here they are bulwarks of conservative strength. Their conservatism has about it the flavor of prosperous Iowa towns, intensified and distorted by the race question. Nevertheless, Kefauver did surprisingly well in many of these centers, much better than Pepper did in 1950.

Russell's greatest single source of strength was his stand against President Truman's civil-rights program, particularly his statement, repeated over and again during the primary campaign, that as Democratic Presidential nominee he would repudiate any FEPC plank written into the Democratic platform at the convention. On the other hand, Kefauver stated that while he favored a voluntary FEPC he would support a compulsory one if the platform pledged it.

Florida's population contains many transplanted Northerners, but it has many more transplanted Southerners. For example, it is estimated that some 300,000 transplanted Georgians live here (to say nothing of those whose ancestry is Georgian), and many of them worked for Russell. In addition, squads of Georgia "minute men" with tri-colored cockades invaded the state to drum up enthusiasm for Russell.

A striking feature of the primary was the boldness of the conservative tactics, which were even more daring than those employed in the Pepper-Smathers campaign of 1950. In the closing days of the primary, Russell spoke alongside Fulton Lewis, Jr., at a meeting of the Associated Industries. Banks and building and loan associations displayed Russell pledge cards.

Nevertheless, Kefauver had some advantages. The most important was popular resentment over the gangsters, gamblers, and racketeers who for many years have been operating in the state, and the general disgust with political corruption and the low tone of official morality the country over. Some of the Kefauver Committee's most sensational charges were made during its Miami sitings, and these deeply disturbed the public.

Another advantage was the prevailing belief that the Tennessee Senator has a good chance to win the Democratic nomination while Russell has not. Voters were impressed by Kefauver's victories in the Northern primaries and often remarked that for the first time in a century a Southerner might actually be elected President; that a vote for Kefauver would not be wasted while a vote for Russell would be thrown away. To combat the appeal of this argument, Russell's forces stressed their candidate's loyalty to the national party and maintained that his prospects of being nominated were excellent. On the night his candidacy was launched in Atlanta, the Senator showed extreme annoyance when the chairman of the Georgia Democratic State Committee declared that "the South will sit at the head of the Democratic table or we won't sit at all." In every speech Russell insisted that if nominated he would surely win 148 electoral votes from the South, and that these, with only 118 additional votes from the North, would safely elect him. "Who doubts that I can get these 118 votes from the remaining thirty-five states?" he would ask.

It was claimed that Russell was not a bona-fide candidate for the nomination, that he merely wanted to go to the Democratic convention with enough delegate strength to be in a bargaining position, that he would not even have entered the Florida primary if that position had not been challenged by Kefauver's entry. Toward the end of the campaign Pepper charged that Russell's followers were largely Dixiecrats who were planning a bolt.

Pro-Kefauver speakers advised Russell to go after the Republican nomination, saying that he has a good deal in common with Republican Senator Mundt, who at that very time was campaigning for Russell in Mississippi. It was intimated that Russell was being used as an instrument by those intransigent Southern conservatives who are working for a Republican-Dixiecrat alliance either in the Electoral College itself or in the House of Representatives, which would elect a President if no candidate received a majority. To allay these doubts, Russell, the night before the primary, declared categorically, "I will not walk out of the convention in an FEPC fight."

Kefauver came through to the Florida voter as the more authentic internationalist. He made a strong appeal to the women voters, and women's organizations sprang up throughout the state to campaign for him. The state's biggest labor organizations endorsed him and he had the support of a large number of the 112,000 Negroes registered for the Democratic primary. The St. Petersburg Times, Florida's foremost liberal daily, did yeoman service for the Tennessean. State's attorney general

Richard Ervin, who is a crime-buster in his own right, came out for Kefauver.

Kefauver himself proved to be an exceptionally able campaigner—friendly, imaginative, soft-spoken, outspoken, and indefatigable in shaking hands on street corners, in filling stations, in stores, in factories. He was careful to leave the impression that where Russell was concerned he was no mud-slinger—an impression that Russell did not trouble to give—and this helped him with the voters. His eighty-year-old father campaigned among the old folks and made a decided hit; his attractive young wife filled engagements the Senator couldn't make time for, and even the pro-Russell newspapers praised her vivacity and charm.

The outcome was close and certainly no mandate for a bolt. Even conservative Democrats, leaders and rank and file alike, for the most part voted for Russell in the belief that Democratic differences should be aired inside the party. Russell himself publicly endorsed this view.

Russell was a candidate in 1948 and received strong delegate support from the South. But when he failed to win the nomination or even to soften the platform resolutions on civil rights he did not bolt. And with Truman out of the picture there is even less sentiment for a bolt now than there was in 1948. Moreover, the international crisis has intensified since 1948, and Southern conservative Democrats, like Southern liberal Democrats, for the most part are not prepared to return to isolation or to support a foreign policy which gives priority to Asia over Europe; hence in the end Southern conservatives are not likely to allow themselves to become stalking horses for a Taft-MacArthur foreign policy. And should Eisenhower be nominated by the Republicans, the pressure for a Dixiecrat third party would be still further weakened, for in voting for Eisenhower on the Republican ticket, conservative Southern Democrats could simultaneously strike at Truman's domestic policies, which they dislike, and support his foreign policies, which they like.

Had Russell run in a Florida primary in 1948 he would probably have won by a bigger margin, for there was no Kefauver to oppose him. Yet while Florida rejected Pepper's bid for the presidency in 1948 and voted for Russell in the convention, it rolled up a handsome lead for Truman in the November election.

Central Africa in Black and White

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

IN WEST AFRICA, where there are no white settlers but only traders and officials, the populous British colonies of Nigeria and the Gold Coast have recently won a large measure of self-government. This development is "disastrous" in the eyes of Premier Malan of the Union of South Africa, the only part of the Dark Continent where whites comprise even a sizable minority of the population. His government, which hopes to arrest the rising tide of African nationalism by establishing white supremacy on an impregnable basis, is occupied in sweeping away such meager constitutional safeguards as the vast native majority of the country now enjoys.

Caught between these cross currents, fearing both the thrust of Malanism, which is anti-British as well as anti-native, and the African demand for equal rights, the white settlers of British Central Africa have long sought salvation in unity. They desire a federal government for the three territories—Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia, and Nyasaland—to control communications and economic development. That, it is claimed, would make possible the better exploitation of the very large potential wealth of the area, now hindered by artificial boundaries and conflicting interests. Railroad extension would facilitate the movement of coal from Southern Rhodesia's enormous Wankie field to the fuel-starved copper mines of Northern Rhodesia. Development of the tremendous power resources of the Victoria Falls and other Zambezi River sites would benefit all three colonies. A unified market would assist the growth of Southern Rhodesia's secondary industries.

From the native point of view, however, the economic advantages of federation are much less obvious than the political disadvantages. They see it as a threat to the existing safeguards against discrimination, and still more as a barrier to future democratic advance. It would mean, said Chief Masokatwane of Northern Rhodesia in a recent London interview, "self-government for white people—handing us over to the European settlers whom we do not trust."

At present the political status of the three territories differs widely. Southern Rhodesia is a dominion whose self-government is limited only in respect to foreign affairs and by the British Government's rather tenuous power to protect native interests. But it is self-government by and for Europeans, who constitute about one-twelfth of the whole population. For while on paper there is no color bar at the polling booth, in practice educational and income qualifications deprive all but a handful of Africans of the franchise.

Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland are both protectorates under the tutelage of the Colonial Office and governed in conformity with the principle laid down by a joint select committee of the British Parliament in 1931: "The interests of the overwhelming majority of the indigenous population should not be subordinated to those of a minority belonging to another race." Thus in Northern Rhodesia the white settlers, numbering some 30,000 out of a total population of about 1,500,000, elect only a minority of the members of the legislative council; and in any case the governor, who represents the British Crown, has full veto powers. Nyasaland, where the European population is minute, is administered by a governor assisted by executive and legislative councils which he nominates.

The protectorate is a very unsatisfactory form of government to the white settlers, particularly the aggressive group in Northern Rhodesia. They want "self-government" so that they can deal with "the native problem," obtain more land, and hasten economic development without constant interference from Whitehall. They support federation because, as their chief spokesman has said, "it offers our best chance of breaking with the Colonial Office."

The Africans, on the other hand, cling to Colonial Office rule despite the fact that in many ways it has failed to carry out the principles of trusteeship. Thus the color bar operates in Northern Rhodesia, where, for example, no native is allowed to hold a skilled job in the copper mines. Nevertheless, so long as the settlers are unable to acquire political power, the Africans feel that the way to gradual democratic progress will remain open.

The opposition to federation arises from a belief that it would mean domination of the region by Southern Rhodesia and the extension to the protectorates of Southern Rhodesian native policies. Those policies were described in a letter to the London Times of April 29, signed by members of the African delegation to the London Conference on Central African Federation, as more nearly akin to those of the Union of South Africa than to those of any other British territory. "The two races," the letter declared, "are segregated in different areas of land by law. . . . No African may own land in any town, and an African may live in a 'location' near a town only while employed by a European. No skilled work may be done by an African in any urban area. No African trade union is legally recognized. An African requires a 'pass' to move from one district to another."

This list of disabilities suffered by the African inhabitants of Southern Rhodesia, which might be greatly extended, goes far to explain why the native representatives from the protectorates are so suspicious of the white man's motives that they refused to participate in the London conference called to draft a plan for federation. Although this plan, which has not yet been published, is believed to contain various constitutional safeguards for native interests, the Africans are unlikely to be impressed. The recent history of South Africa has made it all too plain that such safeguards may prove scraps of paper. Africans are skeptical too about the talk of "partnership between the races" which has been a favorite theme with advocates of federation. This term has not been clearly defined but Africans suspect, not unjustly, that in practice it would turn out to be the kind of relation that exists between the farmer and his draft-oxen.

There can, in fact, be no genuine partnership between races in Africa until the Europeans agree to drop the color bar and accept the principle, once proclaimed by Cecil Rhodes: "Equal rights for all civilized men." That would mean giving Africans a chance to acquire skills and to rise to any position their ability warranted; the grant of full equality before the law; the ending of all qualifications for the franchise other than literacy—in short, renunciation of the whole doctrine of white supremacy. Failing this, the African, as a special correspondent of the Economist wrote on January 26, will react "by rejecting 'partnership' as a sham and defiantly proclaiming his own brand of 'black supremacy.' After all, in Africa, there are far more Africans than Europeans; if there cannot be genuine partnership, then let numbers alone count."

Proposed Central African Federation

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE USES OF RELIGION

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A GENERATION ago only the religious were interested in religion. Most "intellectuals," most scientists, and most sociologists assumed that it was, at most, a survival not destined to survive much longer. Today members of these same groups write books about it and religion is assumed once more to have a future as well as a past.

Two recent symposia* are cases in point. In the first, twenty-nine "intellectuals" discuss the subject as it presents itself to a predominantly literary avant garde; in the second, nineteen somewhat more diverse persons—sociologists, Christian clergymen, rabbis, philosophers, etc.—address themselves to the same topic. Despite the titles, "Religion and the Intellectuals" is the more directly concerned with "culture" in the narrow sense of the term; "Religious Faith and World Culture" more concerned with the political and economic aspects of the problem. The twenty-nine make confessions of faith or the lack of it; the nineteen are more likely to ask whether society can cohere when deprived of some set of basic assumptions commonly accepted which a religion supplies.

Inevitably there are some desperate involvements with the difficulties of definition and among the "intellectuals" there is universal agreement on no single point. There are, for example, those who deny that "intellectuals" really have become interested in religion and others who deny that they ever ceased to be. Allen Tate begins, "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Creator of Heaven and Earth"; Meyer Schapiro begins, "The recurrent interest in religion today is a sign that the great effort of emancipation that began three centuries ago has not been successful, or at least has not completed its work." Nevertheless, one finishes the discussion with the sense that there has been, on the whole, a tendency to agree, first, that to call oneself an intellectual is less likely now than it was a few years ago to imply a definite lack of sympathy with everything which can reasonably be called "religion"; and, second, that this fact may mean at least a little more than a superficial change in fashion.

Several of the "intellectuals" are nevertheless very acutely aware of the fact that the avant-garde sympathy with religion is often no more than an intellectual affectation, and without denying that it is sometimes genuine, more than one makes shrewdly satiric thrusts at the shallowness of what sometimes passes for a religious attitude. Thus, on the subject of those who have concluded that religion is necessary to culture, Hannah Arendt observes: "The idea of somebody making up his mind to believe in God, follow His Commandments, praying to Him and going regularly to church, so poets again may have some inspiration and culture be 'integrated,' is simply exhilarating. . . . One cannot escape the question of truth and therefore cannot treat the whole matter as though God had been the notion of some especially clever pragmatist who knew what it is good for." From a related point of view Robert Graves pays his respects to the Evelyn Waugh who boast their orthodoxy without showing any disposition either to sell all they have to follow Jesus or even to work for the conversion of unbelievers. When he knew Waugh and Graham Greene at Oxford, both "appeared to be impressed only by the dramatic possibilities of the confessional and by the church's amusingly strict stand on the Seventh Commandment." In a somewhat similar vein William Barrett compares the attitude of certain intellectuals who "seem to have discovered a very salable commodity—a suave but vague 'spiritual rhetoric' that gives many people the illusion they are somehow getting more than they are willing to pay for," with that of the Christian business man of the twenties who interpreted Jesus as a successful business executive. And he wonders what a certain tense young man who smokes, drinks, and—so far as one can guess—practices birth control could possibly have meant when he rose in a public gathering to assure Mr. Nehru that "we intellectuals in America want you to know how much Gandhi means to us."

WITH this aspect of the matter "Religion and World Culture" concerns itself little, but the two symposia are drawn together by a question to which all the "intellectuals" were asked to reply. Is "the present revival of religion" due to "the worldwide failure and defeat of a real radical movement in politics" and to "a renunciation of hopes for any fundamental social improvement"? And the group to which this question was not specifically posed is the group which seems most united in a sort of implied answer to it and which takes what might be called the more consistently secular attitude. Most of even those members who are professionally concerned with religion seem to assume that religion is important chiefly because of its social utility and have little to say of the religious experience as a personal thing or of what salvation for an individual soul may mean. In one way or another most of them are occupied with the question whether or not religion can oppose the evils which accompany world revolution, technological development, statism, or what not.

In other words, both the question actually posed to the intellectuals and the answer to it which seems often accepted by the members of the other group tend to prejudice the discussion because they are thoroughly secular. They seem to assume that both the real cause and the real importance of any phenomenon must necessarily be sociological, and thereby incline if they do not actually force the reader to conclude that any "revival of religion" must be, not a religious or even a philosophical movement, but simply a "reaction" to something more fundamental. Marianne Moore implies a protest when she writes as the first of a characteristic series of detached sentences, "The helplessness of individuals and of society I attribute to breakdown in the individual." R. P. Blackmur, on the other hand, states very simply and explicitly a thesis which the habits of mind dominant in the phrasing of the questionnaire led its formulators to overlook. "I should not suppose that the revival of religion is in any way a result of the failure of radical politics, nor that religion could remedy any breakdown in the organization of society. I should prefer to believe the political failure and breakdown in organization resulted from prior or parallel failure of response to religious experience."

Considered from this point of view—and I think it is the most fruitful one—the "revival of religion" is not, strictly speaking, either religious or a revival, for nothing, neither a religion nor anything else, has actually been revived. What has really come about is simply the realization that naturalistic positivism has not worked very well and that it has not worked very well because it has failed to establish those norms of conduct which the individual as well as society needs for successful living. What "the intellectuals" have been experiencing is less the discovery of a faith than the loss of one—the loss, that is to say, of their faith in irreligion, for late-nineteenth and early-twentieth-century naturalism was a positive and not merely a negative thing, the declaration of a conviction that scientific materialism, relativism, and doubt were capable of supplying whatever we need to live by. Thus the so-called "revival of religion" is a loss of faith in skepticism rather than a decline in skepticism about faith. And that of course explains why the positive aspects of the "revival" are so shoddy; why "intellectuals" so often either adopt Waugh's pietist snobbery or, even more commonly, profess, not their belief in God, but their conviction that it would be a fine thing for "culture" if everybody did believe. Strachey once remarked that whereas to most Victorians the loss of their religion was the shedding of a burden, there were a few, like Clough, to whom it seemed the loss of a portmanteau full of necessary articles which they spent the rest of their lives looking for. Most intellectuals belonged formerly to the first class; more and more of them have been joining the second.

What seems to me increasingly clear is simply that scientific materialism, Marxist determinism, and the anthropologist's relativism are alike incapable of providing certain things which we cannot get along without. To accept any one of them as a complete account of reality is to find ourselves in a position where it is impossible to believe either that one thing is better, absolutely, than another or that we are capable of deciding to do one thing rather than another. It is to deny free will and to declare that all value judgments are ultimately invalid. Neither the individual nor society can function successfully under such conditions.

I strongly doubt that any considerable number of "intellectuals" find either the concept of revelation or Christianity as an institution congenial in itself. Mysteries, sacraments, dogmas, and scholastic metaphysics are all stumbling-blocks. But a Christian can believe in the effectiveness of his own decisions, and he can make value judgments. To gain these two inestimable privileges a considerable number of people, seeing no other way of achieving them, make a desperate effort to believe that they can accept a faith upon which they were once based.

The Chinese-Soviet Axis

MAO'S CHINA: PARTY REFORM DOCUMENTS, 1942-44. Translation and Introduction by Boyd Compton. University of Washington Press. $4.50.

ONE cause of the current open season on China specialists has been a bifurcation in the American approach to Chinese communism. Formerly, American specialists on China seldom worked on international communism, while specialists on communism seldom worked on China. The result was that those who approached the Chinese Communist revolution by way of Moscow could see it as mainly an achievement of the Comintern, or at least of the Leninist philosophy and technique of revolution. Those who approached the same scene, however, by way of China's domestic history over the last century could see a steadily developing revolutionary movement within China which, in its latest phase, had been "captured" by the Communist leadership. Henceforth neither of these approaches (whatever their merit in the past) will any longer be adequate for the understanding of Communist China. The internecine Sinological warfare of recent months may continue in some measure until these two approaches are synthesized and resolved into one, but resolved they must be, sooner or later. We shall have no China policy adequate to our needs until we understand how China today can be both Chinese and Communist.

Boyd Compton's volume, "Mao's China," provides important documentation for this purpose. His selection of "party reform documents" from the period 1942-44 can give American readers direct insight into the Leninist ideology which underlies Maoism. Mr. Compton has translated a score of key statements by Mao and other Chinese party leaders, excluding writings of Stalin and other non-Chinese which were used in the reform movement but are already available in English. The resulting volume is one of the University of Washington publications on Asia sponsored by its Far Eastern and Russian Institute and published with the assistance of the International Secretariat of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. Compton's illuminating forty-page introduction analyzes the position of the Chinese Communist Party during the early years of the anti-Japanese war: In its war bases in North China—the "border region" and the "liberated areas"—the party found itself facing great opportunities and dangers. As part of its united-front line, it supported "coalition governments" in which Communists, Nationalists, and non-party persons were equally represented in form, even though the Communists held the final power in the background. Similarly, in this "Yenan" period, the Communists made an appeal both to the tenants and the landlords by seeking a reduction of rent and interest rates, yet at the same time guaranteeing rent and interest payments.

The very moderation of this program by which the Communists gained hegemony and local power in North China created severe internal problems within the party. During the war against Japan the party membership increased some twelvefold. A tremendous number of enthusiastic youth and patriotic followers of Mao's "new democracy" had to be assimilated into a party which in its basic philosophy had remained Leninist and committed to "democratic centralism." To complicate this problem, the war bases were separated among the Japanese-held communication routes. Centralized control through the movement of personnel or a central police power was all but impossible. In a situation where radio contact was the main cohesive device, a great premium had to be put upon ideological, as opposed to administrative, unity. Mr. Compton sees the party-reform (Cheng-feng) movement as principally an effort to use the doctrines of orthodox Communism (in their Maoist adaptation for China) as a means for maintaining unified control, raising the level of political sophistication of the party membership, assimilating the new recruits of the war-time period, and thereby regulating the course of the party's growth and political development.

The reform movement was inaugurated by Mao in February, 1942. It was the forerunner of the present-day movement for study, self-criticism, and investigation, which now has reached a more violent level on a broader plane. A decade ago, however, self-criticism and public confession were already Chinese Communist techniques, although Mr. Compton believes the movement did not become and should not be called a "purge" in the usual Russian sense of the term.

From the internal-party point of view, Mr. Compton suggests that the reform movement was used by Mao to effect the final consolidation of his leadership as against that of the group of Moscow-trained Chinese Communists under Wang Ming, who had remained his chief rivals since their return from Russia in the early 1930's. As evidence for this thesis he cites the fact that none of these reform documents was produced by this Russia-returned group. A major effort of the "ideological remolding" was "the eradication of dogmatism—dogmatism of all types, but principally dogmatic imitation of Russian models." This did not mean a repudiation of Stalinism at all, but rather a repudiation of dogmatic theorizing. "Mao's idea of a real theoretician in 1942 was one who had done as much organizing as he had reading. The object of the movement was the bolshevization of the Chinese party in the sense that the Chinese Communists took a 'greatly intensified interest in any lessons it could take from the experience of the Russian party.'" Mao's "new democracy" had already accepted the Stalinist interpretation of Chinese history and the orthodox bolshevik view of the class struggle and of the function and organization of the centralized party. The net result was a "greatly increased rate of absorption" of the Russian message for the Chinese revolution.

The greatest significance of Cheng-feng was Mao's insistence that Marxism be made Chinese. This effort at the Sinitification of Marxism and the development of writings which were Marxist in principle but Chinese in content, contributed to the final amalgam—a Chinese Communist doctrine ("Maoism") based on orthodox Stalinism. This provides the occasion for China's being today the junior partner in an axis, rather than a satellite of the Eastern European variety.

As we watch the application of the Maoist adaptation of Stalinism to the Chinese scene, we are not likely to find reassurance that Communist China must soon break with Russia. On the contrary, we should derive a keener sense of the failure of the West in the generation before the 1940's to offer China an adaptation of its own principles which could be more effectively applied to meet the needs of Chinese life. This was, of course, a task for Chinese leadership in China, not for Westerners; yet the fact remains that the liberal-democratic West was not able to provide an equally streamlined method for the organization and consolidation of revolutionary power. The American people, who had contributed so much to the development of China's social revolution, could not suggest to the new China how her political revolution might be organized and channeled. Political revolutions, of course, gravitate toward dictatorship, and we have few teachings to offer to dictators. Yet it seems plain that the organization of power in China was the essential ingredient which the Western democratic model could not provide. Indeed, this lack had already been acknowledged by Sun Yat-sen when he turned to Comintern help in 1923 and by Chiang Kai-shek thereafter when he based his Bevan is one of the most controversial figures in the western world. While some may damn his book before reading it, it is published for that vast majority who like to examine and evaluate for themselves ideas with which they may or may not agree.

ANEURIN BEVAN's In Place Of Fear is just published. It is a full, candid declaration of the deepest beliefs of the miner's son who may be Great Britain's next prime minister—the only man in the Labor Party who, according to Life Magazine, can "stand up to Churchill and trade him blow for oratorical blow."

His book is the first complete statement of the kind of life that an important segment of the British electorate seeks for the individual citizen. It is presented not by an observer on the side lines, but by the man who, as Minister of Health and Housing set up and administered the furiously debated National Health Service. It explains how Bevan and his supporters look at the United States and the Soviet Union, and includes a concrete proposal for ending the cold war.

John Berryman calls the original text of the novel "one of the authentic prodigies in English fiction; and yet it has never quite become a standard novel. J. K. FAIRBANK

Gothic Novel

THE MONK. By Matthew Gregory Lewis. The Grove Press. $4.75.

THE MONK" was written in 1794 when its author was nineteen. It was enormously popular for some years, gained him the sobriquet of "Monk Lewis," the friendship, later, of Byron and Scott, and the reputation of having written one memorable book. After the third edition it was expurgated, though what was deleted to suit contemporary proprieties is no more shocking than what was allowed to remain. Little read since the early nineteenth century, it has been reprinted in its entirety by the Grove Press with a valuable introduction by John Berryman.

It is an authentic prodigy of great aesthetic and psychological interest, a sensational example of how far a novelist whose experience must have been slight can go on little more—but how important these are "The Monk" witnesses—than imagination and feeling. Further, Lewis followed a fashion in writing which regularly produced bad novels, this one, and "The Mysteries of Udolpho" and "The Italian" by Ann Radcliffe excepted. The fashion was that of the Gothic novel, a kind of fiction which succeeded very well for a few decades in disturbing pleasantly the nervous systems of idle women. It was derided by the best critics of its brief day, but it, and "The Monk" in particular, did influence, along with many others, Scott, Hoffmann, Poe, Hawthorne, and Emily Brontë.

The triple plot has all the trappings of such fiction, touching on, to list a few characters and "subjects," one unjustly imprisoned and one ghostly and bleeding nun—Coleridge found the tale of the latter "truly terrific"—a villainous prioress, the wandering Jew, a baleful beauty who sells herself, most profitably, to the Devil, rape, incest, matricide, three serious cases of injured innocence, bandits, ruined castles, and the Spanish Inquisition.

Ambrosio, the monk of the title, gives life to some of these clichés; his history soars above the others, though the book is highly readable as a whole. He is a triumph of the imagination. By ancestry he comes of a long line of malign Roman Catholic clerics invented by Protestant propaganda. But he is also a genuinely Faustian character. Lewis' rationalism is superficial and conventional. As he writes he genuflects regularly and perfunctorily before the eighteenth-century detestation of what was usually called "monkish superstition" and then hastens about his real business, the formulation of the thought and feeling of a man who manages, slowly but utterly, to damn himself, though to make damnation certain he must summon up the Devil.

We are told in the opening chapter that Ambrosio, the idolized confessor and preacher to a vaguely sketched Renaissance Madrid, is at heart a hypocrite, proud and vengeful, his original goodness corrupted by his training. Until he is thirty, however, his outer life is innocent. Lust is the beginning of his ruin. It is first aroused by Matilda, herself a remarkable creation, who, out of what she considers platonic passion, contrives to live with him disguised as a novice. The rapid shifts from mutual self-deception about what they seek from one another to mutual seduction and then to satiety on Ambrosio's part are finely drawn. Then, in a crescendo, he seems to take the management of the book into his own hands. He falls in love with the pathetic Antonia. Love becomes lust, and he murders her mother when she interrupts him in attempted rape. He succeeds at a second effort, but hard on success comes self-loathing and remorse. By this time the officers of the Inquisition are at the door and he signs a contract with the Devil too late to save himself from minutely described earthly torments and consignment to eternal flames.

Lewis makes all this very important. His imagination and his feeling infuse the most tritely shocking situations with life and meaning. He never loses sight of the center of his imagined panorama: an immortal soul is in balance. The novel gets better and better toward the end as the other characters disappear and Ambrosio is left almost alone with the Evil which attracts and repels him. For Lewis had a fully developed if not subtle awareness of Evil and was able to give a convincing body to his imaginings of the ways in which fallible mortality responds to its blandishments. Though the history of the century and one half subsequent to the appearance of "The Monk" has diminished the capacity for feeling and believing as spontaneously and as strongly as he did, yet reading him—this boy!—one cannot avoid sharing, if only for the moment, his central preoccupation.

"Nothing But a Painter"

GUSTAVE COURBET. By Gerstle Mack. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

COURBET. Texte de Pierre MacOrlan. Paris: Editions du Dimanche (at Wittenborn and Company, $8.75).

TO HIS valuable biographies of Cézanne and Toulouse-Lautrec, Gerstle Mack has now added a third, of like stature. All three are strictly compilations of fact in chronological order. As such, they provide indispensable reference points for critical interpretation—which Mack leaves for others. The sixty illustrations, of rather poor quality, combine documentary photographs with an adequate selection of Courbet's work. A full index is included, as well as notes to sources and a map of the Besançon-Ornans region, where Courbet painted when he was not in Paris, and of western Switzerland, where he spent his final years in exile.

"Shout loudly and march straight ahead!" This maxim, which Courbet inherited from his grandfather, became a sort of leit-motif for Courbet himself. His conceit was (like his nudes) ponderous, but his joviality made it endurable, even as his massive good looks made it plausible. For sheer aggressive virility among painters, Goya and perhaps Caravaggio are his only real competitors. A living rival in another field, once accused of wearing false hair on his chest, is hardly in the running.

Courbet was "nothing but a painter," says Mack, referring to his misadventures in politics and elsewhere. This is so exactly true that one may fairly ask how much any biography of Gustave Courbet can reveal of the artist by the same name. His social origins are certainly relevant, as is the geography of his homeland. In addition, the facts of his life clarify the literal-mindedness which sometimes inspired and sometimes destroyed his plastic power. It is reassuring to observe, in the full detail that Mack affords, that Courbet's healthy sensuality was as strong—and as external—in his life as it was in his art.

In a much too flowery essay, MacOrlan attempts an interpretation of Courbet. The most interesting part of it relates the hunting pictures to Courbet's own prowess as a huntsman. Here life and art overlap in a sort of "natural brutality." But Courbet was also capable of a distinctly erotic tenderness, which in certain passages rivals Correggio (Sleeping Girls, for example). The common factor in this paradox, MacOrlan suggests, is the sensation of physical touch. In Courbet, hand and brush are hardly distinguishable: one was the extension of the other.

The plaes accompanying MacOrlan's essay, particularly the superb details, make this clear enough. In addition, they extend the range of Courbet's work beyond Mack's somewhat conventional selection of examples. Lot and his Daughters, a rarely reproduced early work (wrongly described by Mack), is included; but there are no still-lives, no Etretat cliffs, and none of the late, surprisingly ethereal marines. I do not mean The Wave, which is, after all, a kind of self-portrait.

ORIGINS OF THE NEW SOUTH, 1877-1913. By C. Vann Woodward. A History of the South, IX. Edited by Wendell Holmes Stephenson and E. Merton Coulter. Louisiana State University Press. $6.50.

WE ARE in favor," announced a Vicksburg, Mississippi, editor in 1881, "of the South, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, being thoroughly and permanently Yankeeized." His whole section might have subscribed to another newspaper headline: "MEN OF MILLIONS TO REDEEM THE SOUTH." Never before had rape been so "desperately sought, implored, cajoled." Symbolic of the return of the South to the restored Union and of its willing subordination to Northern industrial dominance was the marriage of a North Carolina belle to the seventy-one-year-old oil magnate, Henry M. Flagler, who commemorated his con-

PROFESSOR BRITAIN'S new book is an eye-opener. It reveals a new science as marvelous as atomic physics: the brilliant experiments being made by the "food hunters" all over the world. It is a smashing affirmative answer to those who claim we are all headed for mass starvation. Here are a few of the discoveries and experiments described:

How the oceans are being farmed and mined with a view toward some day producing even more food than we get from the land. Pages 101, 106, 108

How the accidental discovery of antrycide can wipe out Africa's scourge of sleeping sickness and open vast new areas for cultivation. Page 173

How Israeli scientists are using dew to produce more food. Page 26

The challenging discovery of the vast lake of pure fresh water that runs for hundreds of miles deep under the Sahara. Page 40 quest by erecting a $2,500,000 palace for his bride at Palm Beach.

The process by which the Southern states, after four desperate years of Civil War and a decade of Reconstruction disorder, became reintegrated into the economy and politics of the Union has been a subject little explored by historians. There are more than enough books on the ante-bellum South, slavery, the Confederacy, and the politics of Reconstruction, and on a later era one has the invaluable work of Howard Odum, Rupert Vance, and V. O. Key; but the intervening era, from Reconstruction to New Deal, has remained a lost period to most American historians.

With the publication of C. Vann Woodward's "Origins of the New South, 1877-1913," there can no longer be any justification for ignoring a period and a process which deserve careful study. As one might expect from Professor Woodward's earlier writings on Southern history—"Tom Watson" (1938), still the best biography of any Populist leader, and "Reunion and Reaction" (1951), an almost revolutionary reappraisal of economic forces during Reconstruction—this is a book that is crammed with facts and with ideas. Based upon vast research, presented with critical objectivity, and written with clarity and at times with wry wit, "Origins of the New South" is as important as it is provocative.

The most outstanding thing about this latest, and perhaps best, volume in the "History of the South," being published by the Louisiana State University Press, is its lack of Southernness. This is not a book about magnolias and happy pickaninnies. Instead, it is a realistic reappraisal of basic social and economic forces in the South seen against a national background. If Ohio had a John D. Rockefeller, North Carolina had a James B. Duke, and not even "the standard mustache and goatee" of the Southern robber baron could make him differ very much from his Northern counterpart. "Let buffalo gore buffalo, and the pasture go to the strongest" was the motto of the Bull Durham tobacco firm, and other Southerners likewise attempted to apply social Darwinism to the post-war economic struggle. They might talk with drawls or dress like Confederate colonels, but these captains of industry were as hard and unscrupulous as they were successful. Lending money to farmers at interest rates of 43 per cent or more, exploiting mill labor at an hourly wage of not quite 3 cents in 1890, extracting favors from purchasable legislatures, these champions of the New South liked to fancy themselves as the successors of the ante-bellum gentry. Writing of this

"social revolution the most unrecorded and undepicted, in proportion to its magnitude, that ever was," Henry James rightly saw "this reversion . . . to the things of the heroic age, the four epic years," as "a definite soothing salve."

Dissatisfaction and discontent with these lords of creation could be heard, but the protests were ineffective. The Southern Negro was at the bottom of the economic order, and he remained there. Bourbons might exploit his vote or Populists disfranchise him, but it made little difference so long as he was virtually a peon on farm or in factory. His brief day of political achievement during Reconstruction was forgotten, and his new leader, Booker T. Washington, gave him soothing syrup in "a gospel of conservatism, patience, and material progress."

Southern white farmers were more articulate but equally impotent. The gains of the Farmers' Alliance and the Populist movements were bartered away in the shabby politicking of their leaders. "With the agrarian radicals in alliance with the party of big business and the party of white supremacy in combination with Negroes against lower-class whites," Professor Woodward observes, "it was little wonder that the masses lost confidence and became apathetic." A Watson or a Tillman of the 1890's, if often misguided, had some constructive proposals; a Blease or a Bilbo, who succeeded to Southern leadership, never "rose above the level of an obscene clown."

In one essential way, however, this "New South" was different from the rest of the rapidly industrializing nation. With its late start and its heavy handicaps, the whole area became an economic colony of the Northeast. Southern railroads, Southern steel, Southern banking, Southern plantations came under the control of Northern capital. Southern business leaders could migrate or remain as puppets in their native region. "Cut off from the better-paying jobs and the higher opportunities, the great majority of Southerners were confined to the worn grooves of a tributary economy. . . . The inevitable result was the further intensification of the old problems of worn-out soil, cut-over timber lands, and worked-out mines."

Today's Southern problem is the result of the historical processes which Professor Woodward so admirably analyzes. Perhaps one of the most hopeful things about the present-day South is the fact that such Southerners as Mr. Woodward can think so critically and write so clearly about its past.

Films

MANNY

HOLLYWOOD films were once in the hands of non-intellectuals who achieved, at best, the truth of American life and the excitement of American movement in simple-minded action stories. Around 1940 a swarm of bright locusts from the Broadway theaters and radio stations descended on the studios and won Hollywood away from the innocent, rough-and-ready directors of action films. The big thing that happened was that a sort of intellectual whose eyes had been trained on the crowded, bound-in terrain of Times Square and whose brain had been sharpened on left-wing letters of the thirties, swerved Hollywood story-telling toward fragmented, symbol-charged drama, closely viewed, erratically acted, and deviously given to sniping at their own society. What Welles, Kanin, Sturges, and Huston did to the American film is evident in the screen version of Dreiser's "Sister Carrie," which is less important for its story than for the grim social comment underscoring every shot.

You first see Carrie Meeber, rural and naive (Jennifer Jones), rushing to get off a daycoach while a drummer tells her she is making a mistake: "South Chicago? That's the slums." The remark, which makes a 1909 masher sound like a 1952 social worker, is full of meanings that the movie audience by now is wise to, and the writers need only touch on Carrie's first threadbare months in the city. The next few scenes are also immersed in social significance and accomplish the same kind of half-implicit story-telling. One of them shows a crabby foreman driving Carrie so relentlessly that she runs a needle through her finger and loses her job as a shoe-stitcher. Since the foreman is played by a spidery bit player always type-cast as a mean "pinch-penny," and since his dialogue runs to sentences like "Here's a dollar, a whole day's pay," the spectator has picked up a quick course in non-union labor in no more than two minutes of screen time.

The most important aspect of all this social significance is its prejudice against Americans, who are being ridiculed in films as completely as they were in the writings of Mencken. In this movie, the bias is managed, Mencken fashion, by treating people as "national" or "local" types rather than ordinary figures, and then casting the roles with actors who love to over-act uncharming traits. Carrie's first amour is played by Eddie Albert, whose portrayal of an American "go-getter" consists of flashing a big, lopsided grin, twirling a heavy gold watch and using his voice like a loud musical instrument. Somehow the heroine, whose strong point is her essential gentleness, puts up with this caricature who opens every conversation with either a belch or a couplet: "Charley's the name, charm's the game!" When Carrie and her second lover, the sleek restaurant owner Hurstwood, skip to New York with his partner's money, they are tracked down by a detective from the Western Bonding Company. The acting of this leering, gum-chewing slob is rendered by Ray Teal, who has a penchant for using one eye as though it belonged to a cruel pig and working a rich, sneering sound into his voice. Hurstwood's decline takes him into a Third Avenue hash house run by the sort of confident, ruthless Irishman Barry Kelley has been enacting since he entered films. The cameraman helps

Kelley to look repugnant and slovenly with floor-shots that exaggerate his huge belly and the lazy, tyrannical way in which he lolls in a chair. And finally, Hurstwood's wife, rich shrew that she is, turns up near the end to trade him a divorce for the rights to their Chicago home. Miriam Hopkins plays the scene by holding her mouth in a single grim line and keeping a rigid, buzzard-like look in her eyes.

One of the cardinal elements of the Times Square technique introduced in the era of "McGinty," "Citizen Kane," "A Man to Remember," and "The Maltese Falcon" was the use of very close, snarling presentation which put the actors practically in a nose-to-nose relationship with the movie spectator. The entire production of "Carrie" is thrown at you in shallow scenes, the actors arranged parallel-fashion and statically on the front plane of the scene so that their physical presence is overpowering. The film was fortunate in having Laurence Olivier as the high-powered Hurstwood, all delicacy, intelligence, and high style up to his last weakened whispers on the Bowery. But after an hour of close views Olivier becomes less a figure than a formidable mustache, a mouth that has a tendency to flap, and poignant hands that sometimes mimic the gestures of madonnas in medieval painting. In one of the last views of the pitiable Hurstwood his ravaged face is exposed to Carrie as she turns a lamp on it. The fact that Hurstwood is ashamed to show himself seems next to ludicrous after an hour spent watching his face disintegrate over most of the screen.

"Carrie" is also fortunate in having a handsome production all around, but in the deliberate and magnified style to which Hollywood has turned, lightness of touch is impossible. When the camera dollies slowly over the cubicles of a flop-house (the big "art" scene) one has the feeling that the director is working with material that is as heavy and dignified as a Steinway grand inlaid with precious stones.

"Outcast of the Islands." A lesser Conrad story, showing the evil consequences of a tropical environment on a chivalrous, well-meaning leech. Starring Trevor Howard, who is surprisingly credible as a feverishly bored ne'er-do-well getting hot over a native girl who confines all her acting to moving her eyes. Despite some bad casting (Robert Morley and his daughter), Director Carol Reed has created an exceptional film that entangles the spectator in tropical textures and worries him with the shame and guilt of a hero who betrays only his friends. Alongside Reed's film, "African Queen" looks as if it had been shot in Palm Beach.

faced period the spirit of the piece, the humor and confidence with which it sets Supreme Court Justices dancing and cuts a wide farcical swath through Presidential politics, is somehow reassuring as well as refreshing.

The book has been revised to make it topical for 1952 and though some of the changes don't come off, many of them do—the sequence of election-night bulletins, for instance, is hilarious.

Jack Carson didn't seem to me a good choice for John P. Wintergreen. On the other hand, I was determined in advance not to accept Paul Hartman as a replacement for Victor Moore and then was quite won over by Mr. Hartman's own very different and distinctive quality. Betty Oakes is appropriately cast as Wintergreen's partner on his platform of Love and as the traditional nice girl of musical comedy. Lenore Lonergan is right too as the siren with a Southern drawl whose amateur standing is never quite dispelled. The rest of the company has the necessary competence and gusto.

Records

B. H.

SOME time ago Allegro issued a recording of part of Bach's Clavierübung Part 3: the opening Prelude and closing Fugue in E flat, and in between the longer and more elaborate Chorale Preludes. Now Decca gives us Part 3 complete—with, in addition, the shorter and simpler Chorale Preludes, and the Four Duets. For me the great music in the work is the magnificent Prelude and several of the longer Chorale Preludes—Kyrie, Gott Vater in Ewigkeit; Kyrie, Gott, heiliger Geist; Dies sind die heil'gen zehn Gebot; Wir glauben all' an einen Gott, Schöpfer—with the Fugue impressive as a piece of fugal construction rather than moving as a piece of music. The shorter Chorale Preludes I find less interesting; the Duets very dull. Except for the Duets, which are played on the harpsichord, the pieces are played by Helmut Walcha on the St. Jakobi organ in Lübeck and the Schnitger organ in Cappel. The sound is bright and, for the most part, clear (I have given up hope of ever hearing a clear reproduction of the opening of the Prelude), but occasionally not clean. I like the slower tempos and the continuity of Noehren's performances on the Allegro records; but the sound is less bright and the surfaces are noisy.

From Columbia comes the third record in the series Bach's Royal Instrument, with the great Passacaglia in C minor and Toccata and Fugue in D minor, the fine Concerto in D minor after Vivaldi, the little G minor Fugue, and the uninteresting Fugue in C ("Fanfare"), played by E. Power Biggs on the organ in Symphony Hall, Boston. The performances of the Passacaglia and the Concerto are good; the one of the Toccata and Fugue is the less effective for its long pauses. This record is free of the shattering and the noisy confusion from reverberation that afflicted the first two of the series; but in loud passages the thick sounds of the Symphony Hall organ coalesce into a mass in which the strands of the contrapuntal texture can't be distinguished; and one wonders again why Biggs uses this organ instead of the one in Harvard's Germanic Museum.

Another Columbia recording has given me a second hearing of Mahler's Symphony No. 8, the so-called "Symphony of a Thousand" for orchestra, three choruses, and soloists. When Stokowski performed the work with the New York Philharmonic two years ago the first part, the "Veni, Creator Spiritus," impressed me as "twenty-five minutes of frenetically apocalyptic ranting"; this time I subtract the few minutes of a quiet and lovely interlude in the ranting. As for the second part, the final scene of Goethe's "Faust," which two years ago I found to be "more agreeable, but . . . much the same thing over and over again for almost an hour," I am struck this time by the fact that it is, even at the start, what one has heard over and over again in previous works. The records offer a performance in which Scherchen conducts the Vienna Symphony, the Vienna Kammerchor, Singakademie, and Sängerknaben, Elsa Maria Matheis and Daniza Ilitsch, sopranos (both excellent), Rosette Anday and Georgine Milinkovic, contraltos (both with formidable tremolo), and Erich Majkut, tenor, Georg Oeggel, baritone, and Hugo Weiner, bass (all good). Though the recording was made at a concert the sound of the second part is good in every respect including balance of orchestra, choruses, and soloists, whereas in the first part the soloists are close, the orchestra distant, and the sound strident and not clean—some of the high notes of the solo soprano coming through as unpleasant screams.

Completing my report on the Columbia LP dubbings of Weingartner recordings of Beethoven symphonies, I find the performance of No. 1 the most satisfying of the series—the work being one that suffers least from the characteristic lack of energy and cohesive tension; and the recorded sound is good with bass reduced and treble stepped up. The first three movements of No. 4 also are satisfactorily played, but the slow tempo lessens the effect of the finale; the recorded sound needs stepping up of treble, which makes it coarse, and there are the noise of shellac surfaces in the first two movements and some high-frequency hash in the finale. I think it is the lack of energy and cohesive tension, not just the slow tempos, that makes the performance of No. 5 seem sluggish; the sound of the first movement requires treble to be stepped up a lot, which makes the brighter sound unclear; and there are noisy crackling in the second movement, high-frequency hash near the end. The first movement of No. 6 is graceless, the rest satisfactory; the sound of the first, second, and last movements lacks brightness even with treble stepped up, and the first two have the noise of shellac surfaces. The first movement of No. 7 is sluggish, but the tempos of the later movements are good; bass needs stepping up and treble needs stepping up a lot, which makes the brighter sound unclear; and the finale gets dim and requires some high-frequency hash. No. 2 I didn't receive.

Sex Guideposts: Confusing the Is with the Ought

Dear Sirs: A word on In Defense of Current Sex Studies, which appeared in your March 15 issue. This article proposes that "the best and quickest way to establish . . . sexual guideposts would be to have many research projects." This naive assumption is totally without foundation in fact. When in human history have ideals of any type been established by means of statistics?

Ideals—which, for some reason, sexologists call "guideposts"—by definition are distinct from reality. The majority of people are not particularly brave; nor do they love their neighbor. This fact does not affect one whit the validity of heroism and brotherly love as ideals. Whence this peculiar idea that we must model the "ought" on the "is"? The day when ideals are patterned after the real—or what is alleged to be real—will mark the end of any ethical tradition that is noble or profound.

Voters for Douglas

Dear Sirs: Recent political statements have revealed that there is but one man among the many mentioned for the nomination for the presidency who possesses the wisdom and courage required to grapple with the complex international and political problems which beset us. That man is Associate Justice William O. Douglas of the United States Supreme Court.

Justice Douglas's views, stated on the bench and off, have consistently evoked a tremendous amount of favorable comment throughout the nation. In spite of this, there has been little inclination by political leaders seriously to consider him for the nomination. Although many newspapers and magazines have editorially favored and have indicated the existence of strong popular sentiment for his candidacy, this sentiment has not yet been expressed in a movement designed to secure the nomination for Douglas.

Independent Voters for Douglas has been organized as a rallying point for Americans of all political faiths who feel it is time that our nation dispense with mediocre political leadership and once more elect men of stature and maturity to our highest office.

Those who are interested in supporting the committee should address their inquiries to Independent Voters for Douglas, Box 1572, Grand Central Station, New York 17, New York.

umns of The Nation that now I would like to say a word about it myself.

Mr. Shelton, the reviewer, misses the point of my book if he really thinks what he says in his letter [The Nation,
May 3], that the subtitle, "Rich Man's Division of the Welfare State," is a wisecrack.

The book shows that the economic royalists whom the New Deal held at bay have now captured control of the strong central government which was created to defend the traditional victims of the royalists from continued victimization. The book assigns the blame for this to both President Truman and Congress.

Furthermore, the book gives repeated instances of industrialists' and business men's reliance on the strong government for favors, competitive advantage, and financing, even as they pretend to belabor the strong government. In other words, the kind of government that Franklin D. Roosevelt gave us has been thoroughly perverted. The narrative of the book serves to illustrate the above points.

Course Offered on Problems of Race Violence

Dear Sirs: I think some of your readers would be interested to know of a seminar to be held by the University of Chicago Law School during its summer session (July 14 to 28). Because racial violence has been increasing recently and because the handling of such incidents is an important test of democratic practices, the Law School is sponsoring a special seminar, headed by Joseph D.
Lohmon, on Police and Racial Tensions. The seminar, primarily designed for law-enforcement officers, will cover specific incidents of race violence, police practices in treating violence, the law on segregation and discrimination, techniques which will increase the capacity of the police to deal effectively with racial tensions, etc. The participants include well-known sociologists, lawyers, psychoanalysts, and social scientists as well as police officials who have had long experience with race violence. The National Conference of Christians and Jews has expressed a willingness to offer scholarships to representatives of those police departments whose budgets do not include funds which could be used to cover the cost of tuition.

Mormons and the Negro

St. Paul, Minn.

ACCORDING to Mormon theology the status of the Negro on earth was determined in the "pre-existent" state, specifically in the War in Heaven (Revelation 12:4, 7). As everyone knows, Lucifer rebelled and was "cast down," taking with him one-third of the hosts of Heaven. These are the sons of perdition. Michael clearly had a majority with him, some more active supporters than others. Although I can find no Scriptural basis for it, I have heard it said that the active pro-Michael group was no more than one-third. The other third "sat on the fence," refusing to take sides. The latter, in the Mormon lore of my boyhood days, was identified as the Negro. This places him in a sort of never-never land, a twilight zone between the Satanic hosts and those who were ready to be counted on the side of Michael. Thus the blessings of the Mormon Church cannot be extended to anyone with Negro "blood."

This unfortunate policy of the church is a source of embarrassment and humiliation to thousands of its members (the writer among them) who find no basis for it in the teachings of Jesus, whom all Mormons accept as the Saviour. The issue has become increasingly important as members of the church outside of Utah and adjacent states have increased rapidly in recent years and are brought into direct contact with Negroes, and who see their fellow-Christians engaged in programs to reduce racial prejudice—programs in which they cannot fully participate. Such persons would like to see the policy altered in the interest of peace and simple humanitarianism.

The doctrine of white-race superiority, so much the vogue in the early nineteenth century when Mormonism had its beginning, has been so thoroughly debunked as to catalogue its adherents today as either grossly uninformed or victims of traditional irrational prejudices, or both. Mormons as a group are not ignorant people; they rank high in formal schooling, with an extraordinarily high proportion of college graduates. Many of them naturally find it difficult to reconcile what they learn in college about racial differences and equalities with the stand taken by their church. Curiously the position of the church on the Negro does not carry over to other racial groups. Natives of the South Seas, Mongolians, and American Indians are given a clean bill of health. And Mormons, according to their theology, regard the Jews as their own kin! The doctrine, however, does not mean there is no anti-Semitism among Mormons, but that is another problem.

The basic question remains as to whether the church will modify its present stand on this matter. Perhaps a more important question is, can it change? Theoretically the church has a means by which its doctrines may be modified. It was founded upon the idea of "progressive revelation," that as God spoke to the people in Bible days, so He continues to do today through the head of the church. An announcement ex cathedra on this question would be accepted by the body of the church; joyfully by some although, no doubt, reluctantly by others. It is recognized, of course, that it is very difficult for a religion based upon revelation to modify its doctrines, but few other denominations have the procedures for change that the Mormon church has. The leaders of this church are men of good will. It is difficult to believe that deep in their own hearts they are not troubled by the ethical problem which this bit of dogma presents.

A very real difficulty is the fact that those who disapprove the church's attitude have no way of expressing their point of view. It is safe to say that most of the one million members give passive assent to the present policy. For most of those living in Utah and adjacent states the Negro question is academic; they hardly ever see Negroes, much less live in the same community with them. In any case, they would find comfortable agreement with the white-supremacy idea because of latent historical prejudices which they share with so many other white people. However, my knowledge of the deep humanitarianism of the Mormon people leads me to think that if the question could be openly discussed they would line up on the side of justice.

Such open discussion, especially in print, however, is a perilous undertaking for any member. It automatically leaves him open to the charge of "disobedience to constituted authority" which may lead to his being excommunicated. The upshot is that discussions by interested persons are largely subrosa. So widespread are such discussion groups that they might be said to constitute a "Mormon underground." The participants are not disloyal church members; rather they are generally active in the church and rationalize their conduct by weighing the many admirable features of their religion against the features with which they disagree.

In writing this article for publication the author does so in a spirit of constructive criticism and in the conviction that his church, with so many admirable qualities and achievements to its credit, is faced by a challenge to place itself alongside those other groups which are laboring against racial bigotry.

Bevan Symposium

The Nation will present in an early issue a symposium on Aneurin Bevan's important book, In Place of Fear. Among the contributors will be Stringfellow Barr of the University of Virginia, author of Let's Join the Human Race; Carrol Binder of the Minneapolis Tribune; Palmer Hoyt, editor and publisher of the Denver Post; Benjamin Javits, author of How the Republicans Can Win in 1952; Murray D. Lincoln, president of the Cooperative League of the U. S. A.; Howard K. Smith, Columbia Broadcasting System's European correspondent and Nation staff contributor, and James P. Warburg, author of How to Co-Exist and many other books.

Aneurin Bevan, leader of Britain's left-wing Labor faction, is one of the most colorful political figures in the world today. His book, particularly the sections on foreign policy, is perhaps the most controversial of the year.

The West's Answer

That the Western powers took five weeks to compose and send their answer to the last Soviet offer on Germany does not necessarily mean, as the Russians charge, that they were merely stalling for time. The note must have been a ticklish one to compose, since it had to prove the unprovable and untrue: namely, that the Western Big Three were ready to support German unification brought about through free elections and that, in rejecting the Soviet demand for German neutrality, they were not merely expressing their own determination to integrate West Germany, willy-nilly, in the Atlantic Defense Community. The note was thus necessarily weak, even though it made certain concrete proposals for insuring the freedom of all-German elections and proclaimed a willingness to start talks with the Russians.

But what would the Big Four talk about? The real stumbling block in the way of serious negotiations was pointed out by the London Times last week: "Russia clearly would not accept a united Germany that was already included in the Western Alliance." The reaction to the note in East Germany and Russia has emerged in a series of dark warnings of civil war and threats of reprisal. In West Germany the Social Democrats have formally voted to reject the contractual agreement.

The only hope of a compromise solution—a rather feeble hope—seems to lie in the suggestion made by the London Times, and echoed by French Foreign Minister Schuman, that the accord between Bonn and the West, presumably to be signed this week, should not be ratified until after new four-power talks have been held. "As long as there is no ratification there is no fait accompli," said M. Schuman, "and the Russians will have an opportunity to make unification proposals." It is to be noted, however, that this suggestion has received no encouragement from either Moscow or Washington.

Truman's A. D. A. Speech

Delegates to the Americans for Democratic Action convention in Washington seem to have enjoyed listening to the President's speech almost as much as he enjoyed delivering it. But read in cold type a day later it was not as effective as it must have sounded. For example, the ribbing of certain A. D. A. leaders for having supported Eisenhower in 1948 was amusing and deserved; but, on second thought, one recalls that Mr. Truman once announced that he, too, would support the General for President. The do-or-die commitment to civil-rights deserved the applause it received, but the President is well aware that the chairman of the Democratic National Committee has been trying for the last two months to work out a "compromise" with the Dixiecrats on this issue. In taking a lusty poke at the tide-lands-oil swindle—"robbery in broad daylight"—the President put General Eisenhower on the spot, but he did not succeed in diverting attention from the scandals of his own Administration. Democrats have, moreover, promoted this swindle as actively as Republicans. Again, the President pointed to "the terrible dangers that lie in wait for us if we surrender to McCarthyism and adopt the practice of guilt by association." But guilt by association became the law of the land with the Supreme Court's decision upholding the Feinberg law. And even the Feinberg law provides that organizations cannot be listed as "subversive" without a hearing—which is more than can be said of the President's own Loyalty Order.

Despite these inconsistencies, the President's speech will make effective campaign material if only for the reason that the Republicans will not be in a position to exploit its major weaknesses. As the President said, you can always count on the Republicans to make it perfectly clear before the campaign is over that they are the party of big business.

Norway's Unique Plan

We call to the special attention of our readers the short piece by Erling Bjøl, entitled Norway's Little Point Four, which appears on page 500 of this issue. The generosity and unique social conscience of the Norwegian people have become proverbial; that they should have initiated the project described will surprise no one. More important, as the author implies, is the example that might be set. Relatively poor Norway, with a population of only little more than 3,000,000, is undertaking to raise $3,000,000 to help modernize an "adopted" backward area in the world. How much could the United States raise? For that matter, how much could be raised by New York State, with more than four times Norway's population, or New York City, with more than twice?

We can, of course, see complications arising from any attempt to apply the plan in widespread fashion. Still, Mr. Bjol's article is both heartwarming and—to say the least—provocative. It's interesting that much the same suggestion was advanced the other day by Murray D. Lincoln, president of the Cooperative League of the U. S. A., who said that our own Point Four program should be supplemented by the "combined best efforts of all our schools and churches, our trade and professional associations, labor unions, and farm and consumer co-operatives."

We'd like to hear from our readers on the subject.

Pentagon vs. Labor

The reports of Jacob S. Potofsky, Frank Rosenblum, and Hyman Blumberg to the Amalgamated Clothing Workers convention in Atlantic City bear out phases of Keith Hutchison's analysis of the slump in the textile industry [The Nation, May 3 and 10]. Seeking "the cheap bid," the Pentagon has been awarding huge contracts to non-union Southern textile mills, many of which have been subsidized by Southern communities. These short-sighted procurement procedures violate the government's declared labor policy by encouraging the growth of non-union plants in the South and, at the same time, undercutting the position of once prosperous textile manufacturing communities in other areas.

In order to stop these practices, the Amalgamated demands the establishment of a civilian procurement agency composed of government, labor, and industry representatives. Special emphasis is given to this recommendation by the recent majority report of a Senate subcommittee on "Labor-Management Relations in the Southern Textile Industry" which points out that the extent and effectiveness of the opposition to labor in the Southern textile industry is of "unbelievable" proportions. The Pentagon's procurement policies undoubtedly bear large responsibility for this situation. But before these policies can be effectively changed, something must be done about the unholy alliance of Republicans and Dixiecrats which, although representing a minority of the nation, now wields the power of a majority in Congress.

Malan's New Threat

In the midst of his campaign to torpedo the South African constitution, Prime Minister Malan has turned to blast the British government for refusing to yield to his tender mercies the three native protectorates of Bechuanaland, Basutoland, and Swaziland. "No free sovereign country," he declared in Parliament, "would allow a position where territories within its borders are controlled by another country." Malan gave notice that next year he would present a formal demand for incorporation of the protectorates within the union.

This move points up the futility of the appeasement policies pursued by Whitehall, for instance in the case of Seretse Khama, who was deprived of his hereditary chieftainship of the Bamangwato, largest of the Bechuanaland tribes, following his marriage to a white girl. Now that a delegation of Bamangwato elders has forced Lord Salisbury, Secretary for Commonwealth Relations, to admit that this exclusion is strongly opposed by the tribe, it is clear that the real reason for the action was an over-tender regard for the South African taboo against mixed marriages.

It does not follow, we hope, that the British government will yield to Malan's new demand. For the most solemn pledges have been repeatedly made to the native inhabitants of the protectorates—their white population is negligible—that their status will not be changed without their consent. In view of the South African government's treatment of its own natives, it is inconceivable that such consent would be forthcoming. Nor do we think that British opinion, disturbed by the fascist overtones of South African nationalism, would stand for coercion of the Bechuanas, Basutos, and Swazis should they ask for the continued protection of the British Crown.

Congressional Censors

Add two more to the roster of pending Congressional inquiries. With only 31 of 435 members present, Congress approved H. R. 278, drafted by Congressman E. C. Gathings of West Memphis, Arkansas, and sponsored by Congressman William Meyers Colmer of Pascagoula, Mississippi, authorizing a commerce subcommittee to "determine the extent to which radio and television programs . . . contain immoral or otherwise offensive matter or place improper emphasis upon crime, violence, and corruption." At the same time Congress also approved H. R. 596, offered by the same members, calling for the appointment of a committee of nine members to "determine the extent to which current literature—books, magazines, and comic books—containing immoral, obscene, or otherwise offensive material, or placing improper emphasis on crime, violence, and corruption, are being made available to the people of the United States."

While both resolutions purport to deal with "immoral" and "obscene" material—Congressman J. R. Bryson of Greenville, South Carolina complained that "beautiful ladies on TV shows have been demonstrating techniques for pouring cocktails"—the texts are so vague as to be almost completely meaningless and apparently give the committees dangerously wide powers of investigation. Moreover the manner in which the word "corruption" is used in both resolutions lays Congress open to the suspicion that it wants to crack down on programs and printed material calling attention to the widespread dishonesty which is such a conspicuous feature of contemporary American society and government.

These latest investigations are certain to be used further to restrict freedom of thought and expression rather than to improve the undoubtedly low moral standard of our mass-entertainment media.

Franco's Worries

Our information from Spain indicates two concurrent developments: Franco's determination to capitalize on the recent visit to the Arab countries of Martin Artajo, his foreign minister, and the increasing deterioration of the domestic situation. The two are connected, for the dictator needs a spectacular success in foreign policy as a weapon against his domestic opposition.

The presence in Madrid of the Regent of Iraq emphasizes Franco's play for the Arabs. Franco's goal would seem to be the formation of a powerful Arab-Latin American bloc in the United Nations which would back Spain's admission into the world body at the propitious moment. That moment would come when a way could be found to circumvent the Soviet veto on new members. Japan first—and then Spain.

Domestically, Franco faces growing opposition from the three groups which put him in power: the church, the Falange, and the army. Cardinal Segura and his followers are attacking him openly. Schism among the Falangists is indicated by the fact that the dictator has ousted Colonel Luis Serrano de Pablo, a Nationalist civil-war hero, from the National Council of the Falange Party. As for the army, widespread dissatisfaction is reported because Franco, in a gesture of friendship towards the Arabs, is elevating native military chiefs in Morocco at the expense of veteran Spanish officers.

The Anvil of Policy

Speakers at the Stanford University Alumni conference held in San Francisco recently apparently agree with J. Alvarez del Vayo on the necessity of "Speaking Out on Foreign Policy" [The Nation, May 17]. "Scurrilous attacks on the State Department by a horde of witch-hunting fanatics," to quote Professor Graham H. Stuart, "have endangered our capacity to make wise decisions on foreign policy." "For the first time in our national history," said Dr. Harold H. Fisher, chairman of the Hoover Institute, "it is a political virtue to be afraid . . . we are encouraging fear of each other." On the same day, Governor Adlai Stevenson told the members of San Francisco's Commonwealth Club: "These contemporary exponents of irresponsible accusation and guilt by association can do us more grievous injury than all the miserable thieves and opportunists that foul the public nest. We have all witnessed the stifling, choking effect of Irresponsible witch-hunting, the paralysis of initiative, the hesitancy and intimidation that follow in its wake and inhibit the bold, imaginative thought and discussion which is the anvil of public policy."

Anti-Union Offensive

FOR nearly nine years reactionaries in Congress have been giving aid and comfort to the anti-union forces of big industry. They passed the Smith-Connally war-time disputes act over President Roosevelt's veto in 1943 and the Taft-Hartley law over President Truman's veto in 1947. Now they are aiming a double-barreled blow at labor by threatening to destroy the Wage Stabilization Board's authority to handle disputes and by threatening, further, to pass the drastic injunction-receivership bill sponsored by Representative Smith of Virginia.

The Smith bill is so violent an attack on trade unions and their operation during any kind of emergency that unions for practical purposes would cease to exist. It provides, in effect, for permanent injunctions against strikes. If a dispute were not settled in eighty days after a crisis arose—and a strike would be forbidden during those eighty days—both the industry and the union involved would be thrown into "receivership." "Receivers" for the company would be forbidden to change the wages and working conditions of the employees; the union, for its part, would be forbidden to quit work, and it would be unlawful for "anyone" to instigate or give guidance or direction to a work stoppage.

The "receivers" for the company would not be forbidden to raise prices or increase profits. The actual managers of the company, therefore, would have no incentive whatever to settle any dispute with the workers. The union would be robbed of its only economic weapon—the threat to interfere with production and profits—and the company would be permanently sustained with a guarantee that the union was helpless.

Smith of Virginia knows exactly what he is aiming at in this bill. He did not dare try to put it through the Labor committees of Congress even though the House Labor Committee is headed by Representative Barden of North Carolina, whose lack of sympathy for unions is notorious. Smith offered his bill as an amendment to measures now pending on universal military training and service so that jurisdiction would be in the hands of the Armed Services committees. He is basing his bill on the theory that drafting men for forced labor for the private profit of private employers is as much within the domain of Congress as drafting them for military service for the country. The theory is wrong, and Chairman Carl Vinson of the House Armed Services Committee has indicated that he recognizes it. But until it is beaten into utter defeat the Smith bill will remain a menace.

Scarcely less serious, however, is the drive of big industry to kill the Wage Stabilization Board as it now exists, to destroy its organization as a tripartite board with industry, labor, and the public equally represented, and to rob any new board of the power to handle disputed cases between unions and companies and to recommend settlements. The immediate offensive arises from the WSB's proposed settlement of the steel case, but this is merely an expedient: big industry was opposed, more than a year ago, to letting the WSB have authority to handle disputes or make recommendations on so-called "non-economic" issues such as the union shop. With newspaper editorialists almost unanimously supporting the steel companies, parroting the industry's misrepresentations and lies, ignoring the protests of WSB Chairman Feinsinger, Economic Director Putnam, and Price Stabilizer Arnall, Congress seems at last ready to give industry what it wants.

The unions are no happier than the companies about the general idea of government intervention to settle wage disputes: they greatly prefer the processes of collective bargaining. But if free collective bargaining is inhibited for a period of years, because the country cannot accept strikes in important industries, then some substitute must be created. What substitute can there be except a government board with power to recommend settlements?

In the long run, the recommendations of this board must be generally acceptable to both parties in industrial disputes—to both management and labor. That is why the board should be a tripartite group, with management and unions equally represented along with "public" members who are experienced in the field of industrial relations. The suggestion that the board should be composed exclusively or even predominantly of "public" members is unrealistic and naive. The steel industry in 1946 turned down proposals of a special board composed entirely of "public" members, just as this year it has turned down the recommendations of a tripartite board. Within the field of wage stabilization, when the whole country is involved, compromise and adjustment are needed, and these cannot be obtained without the voluntary participation of unions and management. We are not dealing with a dictatorial system: there must be a degree of voluntarism and consent even when the WSB's "recommendations" carry moral obligation. The tripartite War Labor Board worked brilliantly during World War II; a tripartite Wage Stabilization Board can work equally well now—if Congress can be persuaded not to give all the advantage to the side of industry.

Germany: Last Chance to Negotiate

BY GERALD BAILEY

London

I HAVE recently returned from a mission of exploration to Western Germany in behalf of Quaker groups in Britain and the United States to encourage agreements between the Soviet Union and the West and thereby to lessen international tensions and strengthen the hope of a more stable peace. It was this purpose, among others, which took the British Quaker delegation to Moscow last year and which has animated the work of the international teams of Quaker observers in the last two sessions of the United Nations Assembly. The crucial relation of the German question to the possibilities of an East-West settlement warranted an attempt to study on the spot the urgent problems of Germany unity and remilitarization.

In a crowded fortnight I had conversations with a number of groups directly concerned with these issues as well as with many political and religious leaders and other representative persons. Among others, I talked with ministers and deputies of the Christian Democratic Union (the major government party); the deputy leader and other parliamentary members of the opposition Social Democratic Party; the president of the Bundestag; Ernst Reuter, the Lord Mayor of West Berlin; Martin Niemöller, recently returned from Moscow; Bishop Dibelius, who proudly claims that he is one of the few people able to send birthday greetings to the presidents of both the East and West German republics; and last but not least, the two courageous leaders of the popular movement against rearmament and for German unity and European peace, Dr. Gustav Heinemann, former Home Minister in the Adenauer government, and Mrs. Helene Wessel, deputy of the Center Party. I had the privilege of talking also with John J. McCloy, the United States High Commissioner; and at what might be called the other extreme, I spent two hours with the officers of the Communist-controlled German Peace Committee in the east sector of Berlin.

The adage, "so many men, so many opinions," or at least so many shades of opinion, aptly fits the German scene today. And indeed the confusion and uncertainty of the political outlook deepened even during the few weeks I spent in Germany. When my visit there began about five weeks ago there was, despite the unsettling influence of the Russian notes, a confident if somewhat optimistic assumption among West German and Western government officials that within a short time the general treaty between the Bonn government and the Western Big Three would be signed, together with the agreement establishing (at any rate on paper) a German contribution to the European Defense Community. The treaty and the agreement may still be signed—though to sign is one thing and to ratify is another and the gap between theoretical and actual German military formations may be wider still. But as the moment for signing has approached, hesitations inside and outside Germany have increased and enough difficulties have now accumulated, if not to imperil Western plans, at least to delay their implementation and certainly to make necessary a realistic review of Western strategy.

The more technical difficulties, such as the apportionment of defense costs between Germany and the Western powers, can be resolved quite easily, given the will to resolve them. But there exist more fundamental and tenacious difficulties which directly involve the whole question of an East-West settlement.

FRENCH fears of German rearmament under any conditions have been increased by German emphasis on the provisional nature of the proposed contractual arrangements. To the French, this means that Germany will consider its membership in the European Defense Community as equally "provisional."

Within Germany, the more the government parties see of the detail of the proposed agreements, the less they like them. Simultaneously, the opposition of the Social Democrats is stiffened by the visible success of Dr. Heinemann's anti-rearmament program and by the support of the British Labor Party, which is now free to question the policies it reluctantly proposed while in office. And there exists, over all, the growing determination of Germans of whatever political persuasion not to be committed to remilitarization and integration with the West until the possibilities of German reunion through Four Power negotiation have been tested.

For though Germans may differ widely on the expedience of this or that method of attaining unity, sovereignty, and independence, they leave no doubt that these must be the central aims of national policy. West Germans do not lie awake nights lamenting the lot of their fellows in the Eastern zone. "The dominant note" as the London Times said recently, "is for safety first and unity later." But the desire for unity is elemental and strong and the normal German regards the division of his country as abnormal and transient. This is not merely sentiment. Neither East nor West Germany is by itself a viable economic entity and the desire for the normalization of East-West trade, stimulated recently by the reported achievements of the Moscow Economic Conference, will grow steadily with the approach to full sovereignty in the West.

It would be equally misleading to assume that there is a united will to maintain German demilitarization at all costs and in all circumstances. The average German has not been converted to pacifist principles. The Social Democrats who reject rearmament under Adenauer would not necessarily reject it under Schumacher. Gustav Heinemann's Emergency Movement against Rearmament has, of course, pacifist and near-pacifist support, but neither Heinemann himself nor his colleague Helene Wessel is a pacifist. The slogan of their movement is not "no rearmament" but "no rearmament before reunification." Nevertheless this platform is attracting widespread support which reflects not merely an after-war reaction and a justifiable fear of the implications of the rearmament of a divided country, but also a deep desire in many thoughtful Germans to avoid the disasters which reliance upon military might has brought to their country twice in a lifetime.

All Germans, of course, want their sovereignty restored and the foreign occupation ended. Recognizing that their country would be the cockpit of the struggle in the event of war, many Germans want to keep out of both the competing power blocs. But they differ widely as to the practicality of doing so. Those who have no faith in Russian declarations are quick to point out that under a four-power treaty creating an ostensibly free and united Germany, the Red Army would still be on the Polish boundary while the weight of American armed power would be several thousand miles away. Even those who retain a more hopeful view doubt whether neutrality is a workable option for a country so strategically placed—militarily, politically, and economically—as Germany is today, unless there is concurrently a decisive change for the better in great-power relations. They feel not unreasonably that the gravitational pull towards one side or the other would be irresistible.

IN THIS situation, what is the responsibility of those in Britain and the United States whose desire is to see international tension relaxed and the prospects of peace enhanced? What should they demand of Western policy? We have now entered the most critical period of international relations since the war ended. The next six months may provide the last opportunity for moderating the great-power conflict. And it is in the heart of Europe, around the future of the German people, that the issue is most likely to be decided.

The attempt to integrate the Federal German Republic with the West was made plausible, if not inevitable, by the continuing failure to negotiate a four-power settlement for Germany and specifically by the absence hitherto of any sign of a Russian willingness to make concrete concessions to this end. But the weakness of Western policy in this matter over the past year is that it has been governed too exclusively by considerations of the cold war. In consequence it has failed to take adequate account not only of the aspirations of the Germans themselves but also of the crucial importance to the Soviet Union of the German question. It was always clear that Moscow would not sit by idly while Germans were rearmed and the Ruhr industrial potential was harnessed to the West. And even before the recent Soviet notes were issued, there were growing indications that the Russians might well pay handsomely for the abandonment of these Western plans. Here was—and here remains—the best chance of a balanced and negotiated agreement between East and West.

Does this mean that Western policy should now be reversed? It may well be reversed by changing political conditions in Germany itself. But in any case the readiness to reverse it, if a valid four-power agreement can be reached, is imposed upon the Western governments by their declared policy of negotiation through strength and by their commitment to German reunion and independence. It may not be possible at this late moment to hold up the actual signing of the contractual arrangements and the defense treaty, though there is always the possibility—so far too lightly regarded in the West—of a sharply hostile Russian reaction, focused perhaps in Berlin, to the signing itself. The forecasts of an open and intensified counter-rearmament in Eastern Germany are not just idle threats. But if the treaties with the Federal Republic are to be signed and the risks of a hostile Russian response are to be minimized, it is absolutely vital that simultaneously the West should show unequivocally its readiness to get around a table with the Russians with the primary purpose of establishing the conditions for genuinely free elections in the whole of Germany. Nothing less than this will prevent a mounting German opposition which would render the treaties abortive even if signed. More important still, nothing less will discharge the obligation of the West to explore every possibility of an agreed settlement not only in the interests of German unity but in the wider interests of a world desperately needing some relief from the threat of war and from the paralyzing burden of war preparation. For the most dangerous of Western illusions is that the determined pursuit of present policies, coupled with a continued procrastination on the issue of negotiation, will produce further Russian concessions and strengthen the prospects of peace. A contrary estimate might well be nearer the mark.

It is not surprising, after all that has transpired in recent years, that Western governments should take a dim view of the possibilities of ending the cold war and of negotiating valid agreements with the Russians. And it is certainly right that they should insist on a genuine freedom for the whole of Germany, not only during but after elections, as the basic condition of an agreed settlement. But despair is the negation of statesmanship and in this situation the betrayal of the deepest hopes of mankind. "As long as there is one thousandth of a chance," said George F. Kennan, the new American Ambassador to Moscow, recently "that a major world conflict can be avoided, let us guard that chance like the apple of our eye. Let it not be said that we allowed any hope for the avoidance of war to die by abandonment or neglect."

The best chance that we are likely to have for a long time confronts us now and it is centered in the determination of the German question. But it is not only the chance of avoiding war. Viewed with sufficient imagination and pursued with sufficient courage, it is the chance of transforming the climate of East-West relations, of establishing the United Nations as the guardian of the security and well-being of all peoples, of giving reality to the hopes of disarmament, and of directing the resources of mankind to the purposes of peace.

Warren of California

BY HERBERT L. PHILLIPS

EARL WARREN of California is the only Republican candidate for President who bases his bid for the nomination upon the fundamental contention that the Republican Party must become more progressive or lose the November election, as it has lost every national election since 1928.

Facing the Old Guard of the Republican National Committee, meeting in San Francisco last January 17, Governor Warren stated this position very plainly:

Our party has never had a radical wing, but we have our problems just the same because we do have in it extremists of the Right—those who would freeze our nation to the status quo with whatever inequalities go with it and those who would have our country return to what they look back to nostalgically and affectionately call the good old days.

I believe these extremists of the Right are not as numerous as they are vocal and influential. It is my very deep conviction, however, that, unless there is a forthright repudiation of this thinking by our party, we will suffer again at the hands of the voters. . . .

I am convinced the American people are not Socialists and will not tolerate socialistic government, but they are definitely committed to social progress. Any party which turns its back on social progress will be repudiated by the people.

He then proceeded to document his argument for

This is the fifth of a series of profiles of persons most widely mentioned as possible Presidential candidates. Herbert L. Phillips is political editor of the McClatchey newspapers of California.

Republican liberalism with extensive quotations from the G. O. P. platforms of 1944 and 1948. What the Republican Party must do, he insisted, is practice what it preaches, not just at campaign time but between elections. The American people want a change in national administration, he went on, but they want to know to what they are changing and they will not switch parties simply for the sake of change itself. "The Republican Party," he said, "cannot make its appeal on the basis of invective, ridicule, or negation."

That kind of talk, frequently reiterated this spring and added to several lively battles with special-interest lobbies in the past, has prompted disgruntled factions of the Republican Old Guard in California to set up a rival ticket, headed nominally by an ultra-conservative Congressman, Representative Thomas H. Werdel, for the June 3 Presidential primary. If this seventy-member anti-Warren slate wins over the Governor's ticket, the scheme is to release all California delegates at the convention, allowing them to vote as they please for any of four listed "legitimate" G. O. P. candidates: Taft, MacArthur, Eisenhower, and Stassen. The Old Guard advocates of this proposed "uninstructed" delegation are denouncing Warren as guilty of "Trumanism."

This is a far cry, indeed, from the situation in January, 1943, when Republican Attorney General Warren assumed the California governorship, having unseated Democratic Governor Culbert L. Olson at the previous fall election. It was the fashion in the liberal wing of the defeated Democrats at that time to classify Warren as simply a good-looking, genial stooge for the Republican reactionaries. It was argued that the Old Guard, finally awake to its inability to win in California with obvious political hacks, had seized upon the pleasing personality of big, silver-haired Earl Warren as an effective mask for its drive to regain state-government control. According to this reasoning, the reactionaries were in the saddle again, and the progressive goals that Olson had recommended so persistently—but failed to reach—would be abandoned under Warren.

This forecast was drowned out by cries of consternation from the extreme Right, however, when Governor Warren, in the ensuing years, advocated a fair-employment-practices act, reorganized half a dozen major state departments, fought organized medicine in an attempt to establish a public health-insurance program, and obtained liberalization of old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and workmen's-compensation benefits. The medical fraternity—or what Warren calls an "eloquent minority" of it—assailed him as a dangerous sponsor of "socialized medicine." Oil interests reviled him when he demanded gasoline-tax increases to modernize a highway system carrying the largest number of motor vehicles in the nation. He stepped on the toes of other interests when he worked actively for the Central Valley Project—and particularly for publicly owned and operated hydroelectric transmission lines to carry the federally developed cheap power of the CVP. And lobbyists were alienated by his demand for a strong lobby-control act.

Warren did not get all the legislation he wanted, but his stubborn efforts year after year soon convinced the Old Guard that he meant business and was altogether too progressive to have around. Democrats were dubious about this at first, claiming that he was a political phony shrewdly advancing progressivism in order to gain a reputation for liberalism which would be helpful at election time. Then Warren prevailed with a bill that made California the first large state to inaugurate a sickness-and-disability insurance system for working people. (Little Rhode Island was first in this field.) He followed that up with a measure giving hospital-aid benefits to workers. In this program California led the nation.

Meanwhile, California had absorbed in good order something like four million new citizens after Pearl Harbor. State facilities and institutions had to be enlarged to cope with what has been called the greatest peacetime migration in history. Tax rates were cut back below pre-war levels for six years, yet at the same time more than $400,000,000 was saved for long delayed institutional public works. California became the second largest state of the Union in population with a minimum of growing pains. Inroads by the underworld were combated by a Warren investigating commission on organized crime which antedated Kefauver's national investigations. Not the least interesting thing about the Warren administration, considering the current national rash of exposés of corruption, is the fact that it has survived for nearly a decade without any major scandal.

That survival itself contained elements of the politically spectacular. Availing himself of California's much discussed practice of cross-filing on more than one party ticket, Warren conducted a "non-partisan" campaign in 1946—and won in the primary. The Democrats nominated him over their own candidate, Attorney General Robert W. Kenny. No California Governor ever before had scored such a victory. Bouncing back after the Republican defeat of 1948, when he served as a reluctant vice-presidential candidate with the overconfident Thomas E. Dewey, Warren tackled James Roosevelt in the 1950 gubernatorial campaign and was elected for a third term—also unprecedented in California—by more than a million votes.

Governor Warren

JUDGED strictly on his achievements, Governor Warren presents an arresting example of the political growth of a man in public office. Yet it is hard to put a finger on the causes of his development from district attorney and attorney general, primarily concerned with law-enforcement problems, to his present stature as one of the most outspoken advocates of progressivism in his party. His independence as Governor has produced painful headaches for conservative G. O. P. machine politicians who had taken it for granted that they would become his close advisers on patronage and his mentors on governmental policy. It turned out that, while Warren was willing to listen to advice, he insisted on making his own decisions. It also turned out that, while he was careful—even cautious—in arriving at a policy judgment, he was willing to stand by it with a stubborn courage which both his political enemies and his would-be handlers found extremely irritating. And what proved more irritating still was the discovery that, though he warmed up to almost everyone with the friendliness of a political extrovert, he appeared to have no cronies who could be depended upon to sway his decisions. If anything, Warren is cursed with an inability to delegate responsibility or authority in vital matters. There has been no palace guard in his Capitol, these last nine years.

When Warren took office in 1943, he surprised a good many people by approaching controversial public questions with what appeared to be an almost complete lack of political ideology. He did not seem impressed by assurances that such-and-such was the liberal stand or that thus-and-so was the reactionary position. He preferred to "pick up the issue by its four corners"—he is certainly no Rooseveltian phrase maker—and judge it after studying all the facts.

As time went on, Warren, along with the rest of the state, seemed to recognize his middle-ground progressive inclinations, and nowadays he refers to them frankly as such. But in his first administration, even in his second, he was sometimes characterized as a master of improvisation. There seemed to be a public disposition, though—reflected at the polls—to regard intelligent improvisation, especially at a time of fluctuating population and economic conditions, as an admirable thing so long as the net result served liberal causes. There were those, too, who claimed that Warren blazed a forward-looking and untried governmental trail only when his personal observations and experiences led him in that direction. "If that is so," commented one observer, "may the good Lord give Warren more experiences."

THIS is Warren's thirty-third consecutive year of public service in California. Attempting to explain his climb from a minor political post in conservative Alameda County in 1919 to the rank of Presidential candidate whooping it up for progressivism—even urging the G. O. P. to absorb Democratic policies when they are sound—interested onlookers have dug into his private, professional, and political background for the answer. They found a devoted family man with a big smile—and a gubernatorial record which the Democratic President calls excellent.

Earl Warren was born in Los Angeles, March 19, 1891. Educated at the University of California, he was a World War I infantry captain. He began political life as a deputy city attorney in Oakland and moved on to deputy district attorney of Alameda County, district attorney, state attorney general, and finally governor. Politically, he has served as Republican state chairman and National Committeeman from California. He has been married since 1925 and has three boys and three girls. He belongs to a dozen or so clubs, lodges, and fraternities and is a Past Grand Master of Masons in California.

If lifelong progressives find it difficult to explain why Warren turns up so often on their side of public questions, confirmed reactionaries accept the bitter fact that he does and dislike it intensely. Early in this year's pre-campaign Presidential maneuverings a California outfit known as the Partisan Republicans—repudiated, incidentally, even by Senator Taft—began circulating charges that the Democrats and the Communists were in an unholy alliance to build up Warren for the Republican nomination so that the leftists would be in power after the November election even if the Democrats lost. Eisenhower was berated in similar vein.

Warren's political effectiveness in his home state is unique. His support is not organized in the legislature even though both houses have Republican majorities. His success with tough issues is attributed to his willingness to take half a loaf at one session and try for the rest the next year. Warren long since broke with the Herbert Hoover faction of his party. On the big policy objectives which have made him a controversial figure it can be said truthfully that he has neither been backed nor dominated by the Republican State Central Committee or the county-committee leaders.

Warrenites recognize that their man's main chance of obtaining the Presidential nomination depends upon a Taft-Eisenhower deadlock in the convention. As a possible compromise choice in such circumstances, the Californian has been giving his own views of desirable Republican and national policy and largely abstaining from personal attacks on the other G.O.P. political camps to which he might later have to look for support. From his affirmative declarations, however, Warren is poles apart from Taft on both domestic and foreign policy; there is no indication that he takes Stassen any more seriously than the voters appear to be doing. Warren has said that he has no major disagreement with Eisenhower on international affairs, but he has also made it clear that he does not know, and would be highly interested to learn, the General's views on domestic matters.

Meanwhile, the Republican Old Guard misses no opportunity to publicize the fact that President Truman not only has praised Warren as an outstanding governor but on one occasion described him as "a good Democrat who doesn't know it." Governor Adlai Stevenson of Illinois also had words of praise for him recently. And Walter Reuther was quoted in a press dispatch as calling Warren "enlightened"—so enlightened, he said, that the Republicans will never nominate him.

To this extent probably most politicians will agree: electing Earl Warren to the Presidency would be very much easier than nominating him.

Dilemma in the Sudan

BY ANDREW ROTH

London

BRITAIN seems on the point of being locked in a triangle of its own making. British foreign and imperial policy dearly loves creating triangles, with the possibility of playing one of its two associates off against the other.

It was the danger inherent in the peculiar Anglo-Egyptian-Sudanese situation that caused Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden on April 18 to summon to London Sudan's Governor-General Sir Robert Howe and Britain's Ambassador to Egypt Sir Ralph Stevenson. With this expert help Mr. Eden hoped to appease the Egyptians in order to form the top-priority Middle East defense organization without making the Sudanese feel they are being "sold down the river."

Early in April Britain got a foretaste of the difficulties involved in trying simultaneously to side with King Farouk in Egypt and attempting to bar him as nominal sovereign of the Sudan. At the outset, Anglo-Egyptian talks proceeded quickly and the negotiators were edging towards agreement in principle on British evacuation of the Canal Zone and Egypt's participation in a Middle East Defense Pact. Egypt's Prime Minister, Hilaly Pasha, asked Britain for a gesture towards the "unity of the Nile Valley"; specifically, that Farouk's title as "King of Egypt and the Sudan" be accepted, subject to its subsequent ratification by the Sudanese. The British said the Sudanese could, if they wanted, accept King Farouk as their monarch when they were self-governing. The negotiators were impelled toward compromise by their mutual fear that the anti-British Wafd would be returned with a stunning majority in the elections, then scheduled for May 18, if the Palace-sponsored Hilaly Pasha government did not score a success in the negotiations.

Then, without any warning, the Sudan's British civil secretary presented a new draft constitution enabling the Sudan to become self-governing this year. The action infuriated all sections of Egyptian opinion, including supporters of the conciliatory Hilaly Pasha government. The Egyptians considered it proof of a British "plot" to establish a nominally independent Sudan governed by the anti-Egyptian Umma Party. Only Britain's "good-will gesture" in releasing an additional 10 million pounds in Egyptian sterling balances and a personal message from Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden enabled talks to begin again. The Egyptian Cabinet, which had thought it could defeat the Wafd if it secured an agreement with Britain, postponed the elections indefinitely, fearing that the Wafd would win a sweeping majority on an "I told you so" platform.

The Sudan's return is as popular an issue to Egyptians as Kashmir is to Pakistan and to Mr. Nehru, or Formosa to the mainland Chinese. For King Farouk it means adding a million square miles—more than the whole of Europe—to his sovereignty; to the pashas it means a new area to loot. And to all Egypt it means controlling the upper reaches of the river on which Egypt completely depends: the Nile.

WINSTON CHURCHILL wrote in The River War: "The Sudan is joined to Egypt by the Nile as a diver is connected with the surface by his air pipe. Without it there is only suffocation. Aut Nilus, aut nihil." This was written in 1899, when Britain finished conquering the Sudan in Egypt's name. In order to acquire de facto possession of the area for Britain, Lord Cromer—who really ran Egypt from 1883 to 1907—devised the condominium of the "Anglo-Egyptian Sudan." Technically, the Sudan came under the joint sovereignty of Egypt and Great Britain, but in fact the Governor-General and his top officials have been British.

From the outset real power was in Britain's hands; Egypt's early responsibility was chiefly that of paying the annual deficits in the Sudanese budget. As Egyptian nationalism came to life, Britain further reduced Egyptian participation. When, in 1922, Egypt was recognized as "an independent sovereign state" (with defense and foreign interests retained in Britain's hands) Britain insisted on retaining control of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan as well. In 1924, when Egyptians assassinated Britain's General Sir Lee Stack, Governor-General of the Sudan and Commander of the Egyptian Army, Britain seized the opportunity to insist on the withdrawal of all Egyptian troops from the Sudan, and the unlimited increase in the use of water for the irrigation of British cotton plantations in the Gezira portion of the Sudan.

These 1924 actions showed the twin bases of Britain's Sudanese policy. By controlling the Sudan, Britain always has the whip hand over Egypt's chief resource, Nile water. "British imperialism in the Sudan," concluded Tom Driberg, leading Laborite M. P., after his recent trip there, "has been an indirect imperialism; our presence there . . . has given us a powerful hold on Egypt, a hold which we have kept for other, bigger strategic reasons." The present strategic aim, of course, is to secure Egyptian participation in a Middle East military pact.

By controlling the Sudan and raising there Egyptian-type cotton, Britain also prevents Egypt from monopolizing the cotton needed for Britain's fine-quality textiles. Commented Malcolm McCorquodale, Conservative M. P. and cotton printer in the November 20, 1951, debate in the House of Commons: "I say without any hesitation that it would be a major tragedy not only for the cotton industry and for employment in that industry in this country but for our whole export trade and our balance of payments, if Sudanese cotton were to come under the same sort of control as Egyptian cotton is at the moment, with the manipulated markets, the wild gambling, the barter to Russia, and all the rest of it."

Britain's objectives in the Sudan have, from the beginning, been overwhelmingly imperial—including the original hope of a Cape-to-Cairo railway. But the manner in which the Sudan has been administered has been outstandingly enlightened, albeit paternal. The Sudan has been very fortunate in attracting high quality British imperial administrators of a kind which inspired the epigram of the late H. A. L. Fisher: "The Sudan, gentlemen, is a large country populated by blacks and governed by Blues."

Their outstanding accomplishment is the "Sudanese TVA"—the famous Gezira project. This 1,000,000-acre cooperative cotton project between the Blue and the White Nile, is the economic heart of the Sudan, providing two-thirds of its exports and virtually the whole of its governmental revenue. The government settled over 25,000 Sudanese families in the area; seeds and technical advice are provided and those families who do not follow the advice are ousted. At the end of the season the crops are cooperatively marketed at world prices. The peasant gets 40 per cent, the Sudan government 40 per cent and the Gezira Board—now nationalized—which manages the project, gets 20 per cent. The Gezira settler is comparatively prosperous.

British administrators have long taken full credit for their achievements in the Sudan. As early as 1912 Lord Kitchener claimed "there is now hardly a poor man in the Sudan." But even today there is plenty of poverty; the Gezira only affects a fraction of the total population of 9,000,000. And the British cannot take much credit on the educational side. Only every seventieth person is literate; there are scarcely 100 Sudanese with a full university education. Even today, on the eve of self-government, there are only 2,000 students in secondary schools.

Meeting educated Sudanese, one is struck by the fact that they seem the least frustrated of colonial intelligentsia. This comes in large part from the fact that the small minority of educated Sudanese have had a full opportunity to participate in administering their country. Fully 85 per cent of the government service is now Sudanized, with only 1,000 Britons left in key positions.

Britain's problem in settling with Egypt over the Sudan is that two generations of British administrators and their Sudanese subordinates have developed an anti-

Egyptian bent which promises trouble if anything but the most nominal suzerainty is accorded King Farouk. British administrators would probably resign en masse in protest against their work being despoiled by Egypt's pashas. And the anti-Egyptian Umma Party, which provides most top Sudanese administrators, would react violently against the government—which they have been groomed to inherit—being taken over by the Egyptians and their Sudanese confederates. In short, no matter how willing Britain might be today—or how hard-pressed by the State Department—to appease Egypt to build up the Middle East's anti-Communist defenses, a half-century of triangular politics has its own logic.

Norway's Little Point Four

BY ERLING BJOL

Copenhagen

THE giving of technical assistance to backward areas has been a function of the United Nations for several years now, but action has been sadly limited by the very modest appropriations which have been made available. The current budget is about $20,000,000, a drop in the bucket compared to the needs, and microscopic when compared with the military budgets of the great powers.

Undoubtedly inspired by Secretary General Trygve Lie, a firm supporter of the idea, Norway has now decided to launch a unique experiment in the field. A group of Labor members of the Storting, the Norwegian parliament, has worked out a plan for "adopting" a backward area which would then become the beneficiary of a technical assistance program financed and executed in partnership by the government and the people of Norway.

Supporters of the plan lay stress on the fact that technical assistance should involve the cooperation not only of governments, but of peoples. Thus, under the proposed scheme, Norwegian agricultural organizations would undertake the modernization of agriculture in the "adopted" area, Norwegian teachers and school children would gather educational material and help build schools, Norwegian trade unions would take over the job of improving social conditions, Norwegian engineers would contribute their skill to basic capital improvements.

The area to be adopted has not yet been decided upon, but logic calls for an Asiatic region, mountainous and with unexploited water power and access to the sea, which would present problems of a kind with which Norwegians are familiar. Negotiations to this end are now going forward with Secretary General Lie.

Initially the Norwegians plan to spend about 20,000,000 kroner (approximately $3,000,000) on the project, half of which would be supplied by the state and half by popular subscription. In an absolute sense, this is not a large sum, but for Norway—struggling with financial problems left from the German occupation—it is a great deal. It is fifty times as much as Norway is now called upon to contribute annually, on a pro rata basis, to the United Nations technical assistance fund.

Supporters of the plan have no doubt that the Norwegian people will accept their share of the financial burden. "I spent a good deal of last winter lecturing throughout the country on technical assistance," said Haakon Lie, secretary of the Norwegian Labor Party. "This project has aroused more popular interest than anything since the campaigns in behalf of Finland and Republican Spain."

Another of the plan's sponsors, P. Mentsen, vice president of the Norwegian Trade Union Council, said recently:

We consider the assistance for underdeveloped areas a very important part of our defense preparations. To abolish poverty and misery is the best kind of defense.

The Norwegians are a realistic people and they know exactly how far their very modest $3,000,000 could be made to go. Obviously they are hoping that their action will set an example for other countries to follow. Only in such a case would their own action be given real meaning in terms of the world's needs. And in this connection they are aware that their own Little Point Four has been fashioned in the spirit of a policy long advocated in the United States by such men as Justice William O. Douglas.

Steelworkers Will Fight

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Philadelphia

THE most striking fact about the sixth biennial convention of the United Steelworkers here was the apparently unshakable confidence of the delegates that, whatever their difficulties of the moment, they would eventually win their wage fight with the steel companies.

The business of this convention was to serve notice on a hostile press, a hostile Congress, the hostile steel companies, a perhaps hostile Supreme Court, that steel workers were not going to be kicked around indefinitely, that they would not work indefinitely in 1952 "for 1950 wages," that if necessary they would strike the basic steel industry harder and faster than ever before whenever their freedom of action was restored.

American union members are, by and large, an orderly group, respectful of constituted authority. Contrary to Arthur Krock's dreary misstatement in the New York Times, the convention did not "threaten to strike while the Supreme Court is weighing the seizure of the industry." Not a syllable embodying such a threat was uttered in the Convention Hall.

Every speech by a leader or delegate acknowledged that legal issues were pending which made a strike temporarily impossible. The emphasis was on what would happen after the high court rules on the disputed question of Truman's seizure powers. Let the decision be adverse, let the court rule that the seizure is illegal, and the union's position is clear. If steel workers are not, even in theory, "working for the United States," then they have a right to strike—and strike they will unless they get a satisfactory contract.

The issue, as the steel workers see it, is simple. They abided by all the ground rules set up to moderate industrial disputes, to check protracted work stoppages during the period of Korean fighting and remobilization. They submitted their wage and security demands to the umpire named by the government. The steel companies also accepted the umpire's jurisdiction and argued their case. But when the decision came down, and the companies did not like it, they shouted, "Kill the umpire."

Congress, it seems clear, is in the process of obediently killing the umpire—the Wage Stabilization Board's authority to make recommendations in disputed cases.

The delegates aren't lawyers and they have no desire to abandon permanently their cherished system of collective bargaining and see their interests subordinated to rulings of government boards. But they are well aware that "precedents" for seizure as a weapon against unions already exist. They know that they may still be "Taft-Hartleyized" and enjoined from a strike for 80 days. They know that the coal mines were seized by Truman in 1946, that the United Mine Workers were enjoined from striking and fined for contempt for disobeying the injunction. They know that as long ago as 1941—before we were at war and in the absence of a statute—Roosevelt broke a strike by using troops to shatter a picket line and seize an airplane plant.

What the steel workers' convention wanted to know was whether seizure as a weapon is always and exclusively to be used against unions, to keep them from striking for higher wages, or whether seizure can also be enforced against management trying to keep wages down or force prices up. Patiently waiting for the Supreme Court, the delegates were by no means disheartened by the union's position. They remembered that in 1950 the mine workers found a way to beat even Taft-Hartley by individually refusing to work despite union orders in obedience to an injunction. The steel workers have complete confidence in the strength and integrity of their own union.

Clarence Randall, president of Inland Steel Company, a few weeks ago charged on the air that the steel recommendations resulted from "a corrupt political deal" between Murray and President Truman. Nothing in recent years has so infuriated Murray, a mild-mannered gentleman whose tongue can nevertheless scorch the angels when his anger is aroused. Murray grimly told the convention that at the White House a few days earlier, he had asked Randall to repeat this charge to his face. Murray quoted Randall as replying, "I did not say that about you, Phil. I think you are a good citizen, and I cannot charge you, I never did charge you, with any kind of corrupt deal."

Randall might have been disagreeably impressed with evidence in the convention that the pro-Republican steel managements had blundered politically in this struggle, that Truman's personal prestige had skyrocketed, that the magnetic attraction of the Democratic Party for large groups of workers had been restored and strengthened just at a moment when it seemed to be breaking down.

Speakers included Vice-President Barkley, Secretary of Labor Tobin, Senator Humphrey of Minnesota, all stalwart Democrats. Without exception they endorsed the union's fight for the wages and working conditions recommended by the WSB.

GOD, MAN, AND STALIN

BY IRVING HOWE

THAT Whittaker Chambers told the truth and Alger Hiss did not, seems to me highly probable. Personal tragedy though their confrontation was, it had another, almost abstract quality: the political course of the 'thirties made it inevitable that, quite apart from this well-groomed man and that unkempt one, there be a clash between two men, one a liberal who was recruited from the idealistic wing of public service, the other a former Communist who repudiated his past and then, as "Witness"* testifies, swung to the politics of the far right. If not these two, then two others; if not their shapes and accents, other shapes and accents. And that is why most of the journalistic speculation on their personalities proved so ephemeral: for what did it finally matter whether Hiss was a likable man or Chambers an overwrought one? what did it matter when at stake was the commitment of those popular-front liberals who had persisted in treating Stalinism as an accepted part of "the Left"? and why should serious people have puzzled for long over the private motives of Chambers or Hiss when Stalinism itself remained to be studied and analyzed?

Now Chambers has told his story and put down his ideas. "Witness" is a fascinating grab-bag: autobiography, account of underground work, religious tract, attempt at an explanation of Stalinism. As confession, it has an almost classical stature: whatever opinions Chambers may now superimpose on his memory, the narrative itself demands the attention of anyone interested in modern politics. As autobiography, the book is embarrassing: Chambers' memoir of his family seems a needless act of masochism while the portrait of his adult self suggests a man whose total sincerity is uncomplicated by humor, irony, or persuasive humility.

The most remarkable fact about "Witness" is that as a work of ideas it should be so ragged and patchy. In all its 800 pages there is hardly a sustained passage of, say, five thousand words devoted to a serious development of thought; everything breaks down into sermon, reminiscence, self-mortification, and self-justification. Service in the G. P. U. is not, to be sure, the best training for the life of the mind; but there is something in Chambers' flair for intellectual melodrama that seems particular to our time and to the kind of personality always hungry for absolutes of faith. Writes Chambers: "I was not seeking ethics: I was seeking God. My need was to be a practising Christian in the same sense that I had been a practising Communist." A little time spent in "seeking ethics" or even a breather from "seeking" anything, might seem to have been in order.

The world, as Chambers sees it, is split between those who acknowledge the primacy of God and those who assert the primacy of man; from this fundamental division follows a struggle between morality and murder, with communism merely the final version of the rationalist heresy; and the one hope for the world is a return to Christian virtue, the ethic of mercy. These views Chambers announces with an air of abject righteousness. Indifferent to the caution that the sin of pride takes no more extreme form than a belief in God as one's personal deus ex machina, he several times acknowledges a Mover at his elbow and declares the appointment of Thomas Murphy as government prosecutor in the Hiss case to be evidence that "It pleased God to have in readiness a man." From "Witness" an unsympathetic reader might, in fact, conclude that God spent the past several years as a special aid to the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

In reading this book one is nonplussed by the way its polemics violate its declared values. A few illustrations may suggest the quality of Chambers' thought:

Again and again he declares himself interested in presenting the facts. Without questioning his personal story, I must doubt his capacity as historian and social observer. It is not true that Trotsky "led in person" the Bolshevik troops that suppressed the Kronstadt rebellion. It is not true that "Lenin gave up listening to music because of the emotional havoc it played with him"; the man merely said, if Gorky's report of a casual remark be credited, that music made him want to stroke heads at a time when he felt it necessary to make revolutions. It is not true that "Communists are invariably as prurient as gutter urchins." It is an exaggeration to say that in the 1927 faction fight in the United States Communist Party, dirty as it was, each side "prompted" scandalous whispering campaigns, in which embezzlement of party money, homosexuality, and stool pigeon were the preferred whispers." And it is a wild exaggeration to assert that the Communist agents in Washington, dangerous as they were, "if only in prompting the triumph of of communism in China, have decisively changed the history of Asia, of the United States, and therefore, of the entire world (italics mine—I. H.)." Mao, alas, recruited his armies in the valley of Yenan, not the bars of Washington.

Chambers' extreme political turn has dizzied his historical sense. By noting that Alger Hiss was counsel for the Nye committee during the 'thirties, he tries to discredit its exposure of the munitions industry. "The penetration of the United States government by the Communist Party," adds Chambers, "coincided with a mood in the nation which light-heartedly baited the men who manufactured the armaments indispensable to its defense as 'Merchants of Death.'"

* Random House. ■

But surely more was involved: the Nye committee revealed that some arms manufacturers had not hesitated to sell in bulk to Hitler, that their profits had been unconscionably high, that some had pressured both sides in the Chaco to buy their products and thus to prolong the war. The truth of these disclosures does not depend on whether Hiss was counsel for the committee that made them.

Chambers complains bitterly, and with justice, about the smears he has suffered from many Hiss supporters. Unfortunately, he is not himself above the use of similar methods. One of Hiss's attorneys was Harold Rosenwald, about whose face Chambers darkly pronounces: "I had seen dozens much like it in my time." The notion that people can be "placed" politically by the shape of their faces, is both preposterous and, at least in this century, sinister. It may be that Rosenwald does hold the political views Chambers hints at, but this attribution must seem completely shabby when it rests on nothing more than the fact that Rosenwald worked for O. John Rogge in the Attorney General's office and that Rogge "is now the legal representative of the Tito government."

In the course of breaking away from Stalinism, Chambers came to feel that "it is just as evil to kill the Czar and his family . . . as it is to starve two million peasants or slave laborers to death." What, if anything, does this highly charged statement mean? Coming from a pacifist, it would be perfectly clear, for it would suggest that killing is forbidden under any circumstances. We might then hope to hear as a sequel that "It is just as evil to kill 60,000 civilians in Hiroshima as it was to kill the Czar and his family." But Chambers is not a pacifist, he is willing to "struggle against [communism] by all means, including arms." So the evil of killing the Czar cannot for him be simply that it was a killing, but must be that it was an unjustified killing—which leaves him with the moral enormity: "Several unjustified killings are just as evil as two million unjustified killings."

Throughout the book Chambers praises the Christian virtues of humility and meekness. Unfortunately, this credo does not prevent him from declaring "the left-wing intellectuals of almost every feather" to have been Hiss supporters and then from calling them "puffins, skimmers, skuas, and boobies." These delicate designations prompt one to remind Chambers that a good many "left-wing intellectuals" of one or another feather—those who truly deserved to be called "left" and "intellectual"—fought a minority battle against Stalinism at a time when both he and Hiss were at the service of Messrs. Yagoda and Yezhov.

WHAT IS STALINISM? It is evil, declares Chambers; a proposition neither disputable nor enlightening. Nowhere in his 800 pages does he attempt sustained definition or description, nowhere does he bound the shape of the evil. He seems unconcerned to examine the workings of Russian society, the social rule of the Western Stalinist parties, the relations of the Asian parties to native nationalism. And with good reason. If you believe that the two great camps of the world prepare for battle under the banners, Faith in Man and Faith in God, what is the point of close study and fine distinctions? You need only sound the trumpets.

Almost unwittingly, Chambers moves toward the view that the source of our troubles is the Enlightenment: "The crisis of the Western world exists to the degree in which it is indifferent to God." The French Revolution becomes the villain of history, its progeny every godless society of our time. Chambers accepts, of course, the common, crude identification of Stalin's totalitarianism with Lenin's revolutionary state; both seem to him forms of fascism; the New Deal was a social revolution which crippled "the power of business"; and the motto of "the welfare state" is best expressed by his former associate, Colonel Bykov: "Who pays is boss, and who takes money must also give something." Everyone might thus be lumped together: Voltaire, Jefferson, Lenin, Roosevelt, Hitler, Stalin; not all equally evil, but all, apparently, "indifferent to God." A man who thinks in such patterns can hardly be expected to notice—or have much reason to care—that Stalinism and fascism, while symmetrical in their political devices, have different historical origins, class structures, political ideologies, and social rationales. Or that the Keynesian measures of the New Deal, far from constituting a revolution, proved a crutch for a stumbling capitalism.

Chambers' approach to history rests, finally, on no social theory at all; it is a return to Manichean demonology. Since for him everything depends on whether one takes God or man to be primary, he can write that "as Communists, Stalin and the Stalinists were absolutely justified in making the Purge. From a Communist point of view, Stalin could have taken no other course. . . . In that fact lay the evidence that communism is absolutely evil. The human horror was not evil, it was the sad consequence of evil." The first two of these sentences are historically false: various Communists opposed the purge and proposed other courses of action, among them the removal of Stalin from power. The last sentence is shocking in its moral callousness. In effect, Chambers is saying that those of us who attack Stalinism for its inhumanity are sentimental, lacking in his austere disdain for what he calls "formless good will." Is it, however, more important to attack Stalin for disbelieving in the primacy of God than for killing millions of men? If the killing is to be regarded as a mere "consequence" of first principles, specific moral criticism of it can only seem superficial. But, in fact, the purges were the result of a decision by men in power, a decision for which they must be held responsible. A society is to be judged less by its philosophical premise about God and man, if it has any, than by its actual treatment of men; "the human horror of the purge" was evil, not merely "sad." What matters is not the devil's metaphysics, but his morals.

Chambers' major insight into the problem of Stalinism—and an acute one—is his insistence that in this era of permanent crisis it provides a faith, a challenge, even an ideal. Feeding on crisis, Stalinism offers a vision. "The vision inspires. The crisis impels. The workingman is chiefly moved by the crisis. The educated man is chiefly moved by the vision." This is an important observation and a necessary corrective to vulgar theories which make of Stalinism mainly an atavistic drive for power. But Chambers, ignoring the fact that the vision of Stalinism is corrupt, treats it as if it were a revolutionary movement in the Marxist sense. He takes it as a legitimate form of socialism, and pays slight attention to the counter-revolution that occurred in Russia during the very years he was underground.

Is this an academic matter? Not at all; for the essence of Stalinism, in its Russian form, is that it rests on a new kind of bureaucratic ruling class which engaged in "primitive accumulation" by destroying the revolutionary generation and appropriating to itself total economic and political power. Outside of Russia, Stalinism utilizes the socialist tradition of Europe and the nationalist sentiment of Asia for its domestic class needs and international power maneuvers. A unique blend of reactionary and pseudo-revolutionary appeals, Stalinism attracts, in this age of crisis and decay, all those who feel the world must be changed but lack the understanding or energy to change it in a libertarian direction. Dynamic but not progressive, anti-capitalist but not socialist, Stalinism causes, in the words of Marx, all the old crap to rise to the top; under its domination, the best impulses of modern man are directed toward the worst consequences. And the problem for the historian is to determine precisely the blend of seemingly contradictory elements that Stalinism comprises.

Chambers himself provides an anecdote which dramatically confirms these remarks. His boss in the underground, Colonel Bykov, was a perfect specimen of the new Stalinist man, the Gletkin type: coarse, obedient, unintellectual, brutal. To Bykov "the generation that had made the Revolution . . . seemed as alien and preposterous . . . as foreigners. They belonged to another species and he talked about them the way people talk about the beastly or amusing habits of cows or pigs." So disgusting was Bykov that Chambers felt, before introducing him to Hiss, that he would have to apologize for the Russian. Yet, after a brief conversation, Hiss found Bykov "impressive." Why? I would guess that it was the attraction of an extreme bureaucratic personality for a mild bureaucratic personality, of one man who instinctively scorned the masses of people for another who had been trained to think of them as objects for benevolent manipulation. If Hiss had possessed a trace of revolutionary or liberal spirit, he would have shuddered at the sight of Bykov, he would have seen on Bykov's hands the blood of Bukharin and Tomsky and thousands upon thousands of others.

Where will Chambers go? His strength lies in a recognition that we live in an extreme situation; he agrees that "it is necessary to change the world." No longer a radical, scornful of liberals, convinced that "in the struggle against communism the conservative is all but helpless," he accepts, formally, the position of those reactionaries manqués who edit the Freeman. But only formally; for unlike them, he is drenched with the consciousness of crisis, he has none of their complacency, he continues a disturbed and dissatisfied man, given to extreme gestures and ultimate statements. What remains? Only the fact that estranged personality and reactionary opinion form an explosive mixture.

In his final sentence Chambers hints that he believes a third world war both inevitable and necessary. Yet he yearns for some spiritual reformation, a turn to God. What likelihood there is that spiritual or any other desired values would survive in a world-wide atomic war, he does not discuss. Would there, in any case, be much point in reminding him that religious faith has rarely prevented despots from being despotic? that many of our most precious concepts of liberty are the work of skeptics? that Stalinism thrives in pious Rome as in worldly Paris? that it wins supporters in an Orient which has not known a loss of religious faith comparable to that of the West? that if Stalin is an atheist, Franco is a believer? that the priests in Russia pray for Stalin as in Germany they prayed for Hitler?

Very little point, I fear; little more than to have told him during the 'thirties that Stalinism was betraying the German workers to Hitler or by its trials and purges murdering thousands of innocent people. Those who abandon a father below are all too ready for a father above. But this shift of faith does not remove the gnawing problems which, if left unsolved, will drive still more people to Stalinism; it gives the opponents of the totalitarian state no strategy, no program with which to remake the world; it makes our situation appear even more desperate than it already is. For if Chambers is right in believing the major bulwark against Stalin to be faith in God, then it is time for men of conviction and courage to take to the hills.

Close-up of Boswell

BOSWELL IN HOLLAND, 1763-1764. Edited by Frederick A. Pottle. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $6.

THIS is the second volume of the popular or "reader's" edition of the Boswell papers which will later be paralleled by a complete, more heavily annotated edition to consist ultimately of at least thirty volumes. It takes up the story where "The London Journal" left off and it covers that period from August, 1763, to June, 1764, during which Boswell was attempting to follow his father's wishes by studying law at Utrecht. The supplementary correspondence with "Zélide" had appeared previously in the now unobtainable "Private Papers" issued in 1928. Most of the rest of the material is new and presents us with an important addition to the vast Boswell saga.

Readers should perhaps be warned that the form is entirely different from that of "The London Journal." The latter was an artful narrative carefully worked up by the author as though intended for publication. The corresponding journal of the Dutch period was lost in Boswell's own time and what has survived is the collection of letters, practice themes, and brief diary jottings from which the lost journal was no doubt rewritten. Nevertheless its interest, though different, is hardly less great. It brings us closer to the man himself because it is more unguarded if not more frank.

Boswell had left London with a heavy heart bound for a country where he promised himself no pleasure and for studies which did not interest him. He obediently attended the law lectures and, in accordance with what was also his father's desire, introduced himself to Dutch society. Partly because of Johnson's influence he was determined to discipline himself and in the process he exhibited a determination and a fortitude of which one would hardly have believed him capable. Here, one might almost say, is Boswell trying to be someone else and all but succeeding outwardly if not inside. He flirted decorously with both Zélide and with a rich widow but he was sober and hard working. He rose usually at six and besides attending the law lectures he read methodically in Latin and Greek, learning some Dutch, practiced composition in French, and came as close as so irrepressible and ebullient a man could come to turning himself into a grind.

Most of the diary is written in the second person even when its substance is narrative. "Yesterday you did perfectly well. You read much Greek and finished 'The Anabasis.'—You was quite genteel and gay at Assembly—But you talked rather too much. Have a care of being étourdi." In addition there are hundreds of admonitory injunctions written to remind him of what he had resolved to do or not to do. "Be retenue" is the refrain and there was, of course, nothing more contrary to his nature. "Have real principles. You have acquired a noble character at Utrecht. Maintain it." Or again, "Remember Johnson."

Obviously Boswell had more of what is called "strength of character" than he is commonly credited with, but the moral of the diary remains nevertheless dubious since he may have paid a terrible penalty for the determined attempt to go against his nature. Again and again he was seized by fits of melancholy so obviously genuine as to remove any suspicion that they were part of a pose. And as he himself came more and more to suppose, they may have been connected with the denial of strong impulses, including, of course, those of his frantic sexuality. Even in London he had failed to achieve his ambition to form a liaison with a woman of fashion, but he had ranged widely among prostitutes of every class including the very lowest. In Holland he was determined—from motives which included prudence, the opinion of Johnson, and religious scruples—to permit himself no indulgences and the serio-comic history of his struggles with himself runs through the entire volume. "Go to Amsterdam," he wrote once, "and try Dutch girl Friday, and see what moderate Venus will do." But it is not clear that he did "go to Amsterdam" and when, on another occasion, he wrote "No whoring except" the last word is struck through with a pen as though to say "No exceptions." Boswell had many gifts but what religious writers sometimes call "the gift of chastity" was not among them. Since he was by now what he believed to be "a rational Christian" religious principles were important and he was already debating with himself those questions which, as readers of the "Life of Samuel Johnson" will remember, he could not keep out of conversations with the great Cham himself. The example of the patriarchs was a heartening fact but not, he seemed to feel, absolutely conclusive. "Does God forbid girls?" he asks himself on one occasion, and again, more confidently, "Concubinage is no dire sin." But then, on the other hand, there was the question of what prudence denied even if God did not. "Never do it unless some very extraordinary opportunity of fresh girl that can do no harm; and such a case is impossible"; "Hahn pronounced gravely: No metaphysics, plain common sense. No claps. Women are necessary when one has become accustomed, or retention will influence the brain."

Perhaps in Boswell's case it really did. At least the melancholy, whatever its cause, was genuine enough. In fact the whole of this journal has the effect of increasing one's opinion of the strength and the sincerity of Boswell's character. No other available document makes him appear less dandiacal and less complacent, more deeply troubled and sternly resolute.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Symbolical Apple

DOTING. By Henry Green. The Viking Press. $3.

HENRY GREEN'S new novel, written almost entirely in dialogue, is a comedy of manners of the amorous chivvying of five characters, three of them middle-aged and two young, and all of them ordinary, average, unimportant. They don't want doting and they do want loving, but they are not sure which is which, any more than Annabel, a young girl (through no fault of her own) with urgent needs (she hopes) who keeps saying in her helpless search for experience that she is "expendable," knows what she means by the word.

Annabel is expendable; loving, in the usual approximate way, wins out; marriage wins out in the usual proximate way—and all for the wrong reasons. Charles, the friend of the family, finds himself unaccountably choosing married love with Claire (whom he wanted only for doting) when during the course of the very amusing closing scene in a night club he gets drunk enough to see the dreary bickerings of the married couple who give the party as a vision of marital happiness.

The comedy arises from the lack of self-knowledge of the characters whom the reader, who is both one of the characters and the stranger who observes them, gets to know only a little better than they know themselves. The comedy is double-edged, for really no one can know anybody, and nothing ever happens—from the first sentence: "Pretty squalid play all around I thought!" to the last: "The next day they all went on very much the same."

There is nothing in "Doting" that Mr. Green has not done better before. Unlike his other novels, at least in degree, "Doting" creates no "gathering web of insinuations" which should, as he has stated, "slowly appeal to feelings unexpressed." The comedy dissolves most of the feelings, and those left over fail to spin out into the endless webs of the other novels in which apparent meaninglessness reaches out into insinuations of order and meaning, into intimations of the mystery of feeling that, transcending knowledge, can never be, must be, and somehow is inexplicably expressed.

"Doting" is significant in the development of a novelist who from the first has been obsessed with the conflict between the reality of the objective world and the unreality, the unknowableness, of the subjective world. Mr. Green wants to present the characters in "Doting" with the least possible intrusion on his part, to let them be as they are, almost as if they were objects—the literary equivalent of Cézanne's apples. The danger "Doting" fails entirely to circumvent is that Mr. Green's respect for the object and distrust of feeling—which he sees as the danger but without which the apples are only apples—may produce characters whose "unexpressed" feelings remain unexpressed.

To compare Henry Green's characters with those of Henry James is to take the measure of more than a change in literary style. James's characters, those knowing protagonists of their fate, progress from ignorance to self-knowledge through a disciplined accommodation to alien and external reality. Mr. Green's characters know nothing about themselves, and what they do know is wrong; they say only what they do not mean or feel. They never change, and if they end up happy, as they often do, it is almost in spite of themselves. They destroy the whole fiction of self-knowledge. Only the external world, and as part of it, instinctive impersonal human nature, is real. All the rest is unreal, the created, the symbolical apple. "Only crazy for what I haven't got," says one of the characters in "Party Going," "like any drowning, starving man."

HAGGIN

RCA VICTOR has issued a recording of Toscanini's broadcast of "La Bohème" in February, 1946. Not even Toscanini's performance could induce me to listen to the tear-jerking third and fourth acts then or now; but I can report remarkably clear and agreeable-sounding reproduction of his performance of the first two acts—wonderful in its buoyancy, animation, and gaiety, its plastic continuity and coherence, its precise gearing of the N. B. C. Symphony's playing with the superlative singing of Albanese, Pearce, and others of the excellent cast.

Columbia gives us on one record only a few arias and duets from Verdi's "Otello"—some, but not all, of the most beautiful and effective passages in what seems to me Verdi's finest opera. Steber's singing is very beautiful except for a shrill high note or two in the third-act duet (she should rid her Italian of its sharp American t); Vinay's also is excellent for the most part; Guarnera hasn't sufficient weight of voice in the Credo (this aria, incidentally, is for me Verdi's one failure in the opera—a failure, that is, as a musical embodiment of the ideas of the text), but is very fine in his duet with Vinay; and the singers are effectively supported by the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra under Cleva's direction. In the first-act duet the singers seem too close to the microphone for proper balance with the orchestra, and distinctness is carried to the point of unpleasant sharpness which requires reduction of treble to minimum; elsewhere the sound is good, though the orchestra lacks luster. If Columbia had issued the entire opera it would have provided the entire text; but it issues these passages without the words one needs to follow the development of the music, and with a synopsis that ranges from inadequate to inaccurate. I should mention that the Willow Song and Ave Maria were issued a year or so ago on Steber's record of Verdi arias.

Another Columbia record is devoted to the magnificent singing of the bass-baritone George London in a beautiful aria from Borodin's "Prince Igor" and less valuable excerpts from Rubinstein's "The Demon," Massenet's "Don Quichotte" (with Rosalind Nadell, mezzo-soprano), and Paladilhe's "Patrie." The Metropolitan Opera Orchestra is conducted by Kurt Adler and Jean Morel. Again treble must be reduced; and again there are no texts.

A similar Urania record devoted to the singing of the late Maria Cebotari gives us, in effect, three soprano voices. In what I would say is an over-impassioned performance of Deh vieni, non tarder from "Figaro" (in German) we hear a beautiful voice of remarkable amplitude; in Martern aller Arten from "The Seraglio" we hear a less voluminous voice of astonishing accuracy and brilliance in the florid passages and high notes; in the final scene of "Salome" this thinner voice is often tremulously shrill (the duet from "Madama Butterfly" with the tenor Walter Ludwig I didn't listen to). Artur Rother conducts the orchestra of Radio Berlin—not too effectively in the introduction to Martern aller Arten—and changes the end of the "Salome" excerpt. Treble must be stepped up for the "Figaro" recording and reduced for the others; bass must be stepped up for the "Salome" recording, which acquires a hash of high-frequency distortion. Again no texts.

As for Urania's recording of Dvorak's opera "Rusalka," it has some engaging arias separated by long stretches of less interesting material. The Dresden Opera performance is excellent and well reproduced.

Re dell' abisso from "The Masked Ball" is well sung by Cloe Elmo on a Victor 45, with an aria from "La Gioconda." Morel conducts a Victor orchestra.

Haydn's Missa Sancti Bernardi de Offida (1796), which has been issued by the Haydn Society, turns out to be an impressive work not only in its vigorous and joyous passages, like the et vitam venturi, but especially in the slow and quiet ones, like the Gratias agimus and Crucifixus. And there is fine singing by the Copenhagen Boys' and Mens' Choir with the Danish Royal Opera Orchestra in the well-paced performance conducted by Mogens Wöldike.

Columbia offers Steber's beautiful singing in I Know that My Redeemer.

Liveth from Handel's "Messiah," With Verdure Clad from Haydn's "The Creation," and other arias by Bach and Mendelssohn. Max Rudolf conducts the orchestra.

On another Columbia record are sixteenth- and seventeenth-century madrigals—many of them very lovely, and one by Gesualdo very strange in its unusual harmonic progressions—well sung by the Renaissance Singers under Lehman Engel's direction. Mr. Engel informs us on the envelope that "most of the music is minutely illustrative of the text," which is "poetry . . . of an enormously high order"; yet the texts are not provided—and they are not intelligible as sung. The recorded sound coarsens near the end of the second side.

Some fine examples of secular and sacred music of the sixteenth century are beautifully sung by the Robert Shaw Chorale on a Victor record. Again no texts.

And Columbia has issued an LP dubbing of its old recording of the excellent performance by Lyons musicians of Fauré's lovely and moving Requiem. The sound is good except for some strident fortes of the chorus.

The Pechan Act

Dear Sirs: Pennsylvania's Loyalty act, the Pechan law, in its first two months of existence has had exactly the effect its opponents predicted. Two school teachers with impeccable records have resigned their positions rather than sign the oath. A public-assistance worker has also resigned.

Hans Blumenfeld, chief of Philadelphia's Division of Planning Analysis, took the oath and resigned in protest against "second-class citizenship."

Philadelphia's District Attorney, Richardson Dilworth, refused point-blank to take the oath, branding it an "outrageous" procedure resembling the methods of the Spanish Inquisition.
 Mayor Joseph S. Clarke, Jr., signed the oath but called it "nonsense" and "a lot of red tape."

Four young doctors and a nurse at Philadelphia General Hospital were reluctantly discharged by the hospital board for failure to sign. The board chairman, acting without option, called it a "worthless law," and eighty out of 106 staff interns and resident physicians denounced the law as "insidiously dangerous in its implications and profoundly undemocratic in its implementation."

A cheering development resulted from the recent primary elections. One Democratic state assemblyman from Philadelphia, Edward Conway, had been particularly active in securing the enactment of the Pechan law. An American Legion post commander, he had associated himself with the Legion's blustering lobby and had frightened a number of Democratic representatives from voting according to their convictions. A committee was formed of teachers residing in Conway's district for the purpose of defeating him in the primaries. By taking advantage of several good breaks, the teachers split the machine and gave Conway an impressive beating. The significant thing is that all his successful opponents (in a three-representative district) campaigned on the Pechan-law issue. One incumbent had voted against the law; the two newcomers promised to work for repeal. Thus, the Legion's threats to "get" every legislator opposed to the Pechan law backfired in at least one district.

McCarthy Muddle

Evanston, Ill.

IT IS traditional at Northwestern University to hold a springtime Mock Political Convention in Presidential election years. In this rock-ribbed Republican area, the affair seldom amounts to more than the usual parades, pseudo-political machinations, and the final "bipartisan" selection of a candidate who almost invariably fails to win the following November. The only time in 44 years the Northwestern student body managed to agree with the nation at large was in its choice of Calvin Coolidge in 1924.

This year, however, the M. P. C. attracted widespread interest for two reasons: it chose General Eisenhower for the Presidency and listened to Senator McCarthy, from nearby Wisconsin, as its keynote speaker. The campus reacted strongly to the surprise announcement of McCarthy's scheduled appearance; the pages of the Daily Northwestern crackled with letters pro and con. Actually, as members of the convention steering committee pointed out, the Senator had been invited only after other notables—including President Truman, Vice-President Barkley, and Senators Taft and Kefauver—had declined. Moreover, Senators Morse and Douglas were also on the convention speakers' list, so it is unlikely that the invitation to McCarthy was impelled by anything other than a desire to get an additional "big name" for the occasion.

More than 1700 student delegates, observers and townspeople packed the gymnasium to hear McCarthy at the convention's opening. The Wisconsin delegation, blissfully unaware of possible implications, raised two huge gas-filled balloons labeled "McCarthy." Pandemonium broke loose when the Senator entered, cheers and cat-calls about balancing each other. The speaker launched an attack on "the suicidal foreign policy of this nation . . . and the extent to which that policy is dictated from Moscow." His major "case" for the evening was that of Lawrence K. Rosinger, based on Rosinger's views as expressed at the famous round-table discussion on American Policy Towards China sponsored by the State Department in 1949. Mc-

Carthy's attack consisted primarily of charges already aired by Professor Kenneth Colegrove of Northwestern University, one of the faculty sponsors of the convention, who was seated behind the speaker on the platform.

Both Professor Colegrove and Harold Stassen, who was to speak to the convention the following day, were present at the 1949 round table. McCarthy failed to point out that these two men had been in a minority at that affair; the so-called Lattimore-Rosinger group had the support of William R. Herod of International General Electric, William S. Robertson of the American and Foreign Power Company, and other business representatives—as well as clergymen—who knew the China scene intimately.

From Rosinger, McCarthy drifted into a discussion of the Daily Worker, Shakespeare, and God, spicing his peroration with a quotation from Macbeth and a dramatic account of a chaplain's last words to McCarthy's marine unit in the Pacific. The Senator bid his audience to have courage and follow him, regardless of "the filth, the mud, the scars and the pain they may make you suffer."

After most of the spectators had filed out of the hall with McCarthy, a motion came from the floor to put the convention on record as supporting the Wisconsin Senator's views. Almost immediately, a counter-motion was introduced to table the first motion. In a shouting contest, the "nays" were declared to have carried, but the noise was so great that a roll-call had to be held which McCarthy won, 543 to 387. So ended the meeting, but not the storm. Late the following afternoon, a handful of delegates were confronted with the civil-rights section of a proposed platform which specifically condemned the "character assassination" methods of McCarthy. With less than a quorum present, a "token vote" was taken which approved the anti-McCarthy plank.

Only three hundred participated in this voice-vote and at the evening session, brief consideration of the plank was squeezed in before the feature speaker of the evening, Harold Stassen. At this time a motion was presented attempting to delete the anti-McCarthy sentiments, but by a standing vote, it was defeated. It should be pointed out that there was considerable confusion among the delegates as to just what was being voted upon, particularly since this plank was in obvious conflict with the roll-call voted approving McCarthy's speech less than twenty-four hours earlier.

Viewed in retrospect, the Mock Political Convention did not speak well for the political maturity of the students. They apparently had no clear picture of the major issues confronting the nation and were swayed by the emotional shock of the speech of the moment. Thus the delegates, while giving McCarthy a handsome vote of confidence, also formally approved the speech of Senator Morse, whose opposition to McCarthyism should have been known to the students. Furthermore the Morse speech, which was given a rousing reception, was a relentless attack on the Presidential candidacy of Senator Taft; yet the delegates wrangled for four hours before they could steel themselves to vote for General Eisenhower as the convention's choice.

The students' reaction to McCarthy illustrates the way in which a college group, removed from the mainstream of political debate, can shift from a mood of skepticism, even hostility, to one of acceptance under the impact of florid oratory. This was the first formal test of McCarthy's strength on an American campus. The reception he was given suggests that youth can be considered "radical" only if it be understood that "radicalism" can be of the left-wing variety as well as of the left.

New East-West Abyss

A last effort by the Soviet Union to prevent the integration of West Germany into the North Atlantic community has failed, and on Monday representatives of the three Western powers and of the Bonn government signed the fateful "contractual agreement." Thus on May 26, 1952—seven years to the month after its "unconditional surrender"—Germany reemerges as potentially the strongest power in Europe. Warnings from the French fell on unheeding ears. Perhaps history will listen to the dramatic appeal by Edouard Herriot, chairman of the French National Assembly, urging the Americans not to precipitate an "irreparable" situation; certainly Secretary Acheson did not.

As for the British, they seem to have given up any shadow of opposition; Anthony Eden limited himself to hoping that some kind of understanding with the Russians might be worked out in the period between the signing and the ratification of the contractual agreement. Moscow, too, seems to be counting on this hiatus. The latest Soviet note on German unification, delivered to the Western powers even as their foreign ministers' pens were hovering over the agreement in Bonn, could not have been designed for immediate effect. But in the weeks ahead the peoples of France and Germany, particularly, will be able to speak out through their representative parliaments, and ratification is yet far from a reality.

As we go to press, rumors are circulating concerning the movement of Soviet troops on Germany's eastern border. Such stories should be taken with the greatest reserve. European chancelleries, while admitting that we have entered perhaps the most critical period since the end of the war, believe that what lies ahead is a great political and diplomatic struggle rather than a shooting war. In any case, May 26 marked the opening of a new abyss between East and West.

Government by McCarran

By a vote of 52 to 18, the Senate has confirmed Judge James P. McGranery as Attorney General. Under any circumstances, the Senate's willingness to brush aside the serious charges against Judge McGranery would be remarkable; for it to ignore them in view of the present low repute of the Department of Justice is truly shocking. There was, of course, no real investigation of McGranery's qualifications by the Judiciary Committee. Coached by Senator McCarran, who, as the Alsops' widely syndicated column notes, "seems to have a fellow feeling" for McGranery, the nominee had a pleasant session with the committee. The impressive testimony of Richardson Dilworth, Philadelphia's District Attorney, was disposed of by McCarran's reference to the Americans for Democratic Action, of which Dilworth is a member, as "that left-wing organization headed by Francis Biddle." Similarly, discrepancies in McGranery's testimony were waived aside with the generous comment that the events in question "happened seven years ago." Yet a few weeks back, Senator McCarran demanded the indictment of Owen Lattimore for less significant discrepancies relating to matters even more remote in time.

It was doubtless clever of the President to nominate for Attorney General a man to whom he knew McCarran would give "impassioned" support regardless of any embarrassing evidence that might be presented. But it would seem that, in view of the public's concern with "corruption" in government and Administration's promises of a clean-up, the President could have selected a nominee for Attorney General possessing more relevant qualifications for the office than the fact that he is a crony of the President and of Senator McCarran.

Franco in Unesco

The vote of the United Nations Economic and Social Council (Unesco) to admit Franco Spain to membership was a disgrace to the whole United Nations. To have accepted this fascist state into any agency bearing the banner of the "free world" would have been bad enough; to admit it to Unesco, devoted in large measure to international cultural rapprochement, was a particularly outrageous act. The leading representatives of modern Spanish culture are either dead or in exile; the culture of the Spanish people, savagely repressed by a dictator, is beyond the reach of Unesco.

By voting "no" Mexico and Uruguay upheld the best traditions of Latin America; Padilla Nervo of Mexico, president of the Sixth General Assembly, and Rodriguez Fabrigat of Uruguay were eloquent in their opposition.

But the United States, France, and Great Britain voted in favor—a painful spectacle, especially in view of the fact that the fourth great power, the Soviet Union, on this issue voted on the side of democracy.

For two years now we have been betraying the Spanish people in the United Nations, and for two years the Eastern-bloc states have been coming to their defense. One often wonders whether Western policy is not a better propaganda agent for communism than the Cominform itself.

"Political" Passports

The State Department has denied a passport to the Rev. Dr. J. Henry Carpenter, executive secretary of the Brooklyn Division of the Protestant Council of New York, secretary of the Department of the Urban Church of the National Council of Churches, and treasurer of the Presbyterian Peace Fellowship. In 1942, Dr. Carpenter undertook a trip to India and China at the request of Dr. H. H. Kung, then Vice-President of China, and with the cooperation of the State Department. A trustee of Keuka College, he also serves on the board of the League for Industrial Democracy and the International Association of Daily Vacation Bible Schools. Some two years ago, Dr. Carpenter, in a church message, voiced a warning against "the infiltration of communism" but apparently he did not voice it loudly enough.

The State Department, which has just issued a lengthy and indignant repudiation of a "red" smear of Secretary of State Dean Acheson, was at first reluctant to offer any explanation for refusing Dr. Carpenter a passport other than the familiar phrase—"not in the best interests of the United States." Later, Mrs. Ruth Shipley, chief of the Passport Division, admitted that the passport had been denied because of Dr. Carpenter's "political activities." It appears that he once signed a statement favoring a peaceful settlement with the Soviet Union and also went on record publicly opposing the Mundt-Nixon bill and military aid to Greece and Turkey—grave indiscretions, in retrospect.

The Ice Age

Coming in the wake of the denial of a passport to Dr. Linus Pauling, head of the Department of Chemistry of the California Institute of Technology and former president of the American Chemical Society, the Carpenter incident should be—though unhappily it won't be—the last count in the indictment of the State Department's arbitrary passport procedures. Dr. Pauling, to whom President Roosevelt awarded the Medal of Merit for distinguished wartime service, wanted to visit England in order to take part in a Royal Society conference on the structure of proteins. His application was rejected because of a suspicion that he was a Communist—despite his strong denial—and also because his anti-Communist statements have not been “sufficiently strong.”

Disturbed by this correlation of proteins and subversion, the American Psychological Association wisely decided to hold the 1954 meeting of the International Congress of Psychology in Montreal instead of New York. This action suggests that groups such as the World Council of Churches are now confronted with an insoluble dilemma. If international meetings are scheduled for European cities, not all the American delegates will be able to obtain passports; whereas if meetings are scheduled for the United States, some European delegates are certain not to be admitted. In the end, international gatherings of all kinds may have to be postponed for the duration of the present ice age.

The Loyalty Question

The tragic results of the President's loyalty program in terms of needless suffering, wrecked careers, and a sabotaging of our traditional American liberties is nowhere more succinctly covered than in the recent pamphlet “Loyalty in a Democracy” published by the Public Affairs Committee. Summarizing various viewpoints, the pamphlet reviews the abuses which have developed in legislative and private investigations, and in the enactment of loyalty oath requirements. If the experience thus far shows anything, it holds, it is that grave abuses are almost inevitable once you begin inquiring into men's minds and possible motives.

The darkest aspect of the civil liberties picture, the pamphlet states, is to be found in the reluctance of many of our foremost citizens to oppose the witch-hunt lest they be called subversive. On the positive side, the pamphlet describes numerous local struggles in which individuals and groups have successfully stood up against the forces of repression and suggests that the loyalty problem might be solved by giving the average individual a more significant role in our economic and political life, thus strengthening the fabric of our democratic society.

Freedom for Whom?

An organization calling itself Freedom Clubs, Inc. has come to the defense of Senator Joseph R. McCarthy in a ten-page document denouncing the investigation now being conducted by the Senate Elections Subcommittee as “one of the most vicious smear campaigns in American history”—a statement that strikes us as being extremely unfair to Senator McCarthy. Mailed in envelopes bearing the return address of Alfred Kohlberg, leading figure in the China Lobby and close friend of Senator McCarthy, the pamphlet was written by Dr. Kenneth Colegrove of Northwestern University who recently testified against Owen Lattimore before the McCarran Committee. Among the members of the advisory committee are: Bing Crosby, Dr. Roscoe Pound, Fulton Lewis, Jr., Lieutenant-General Albert C. Wedemeyer (now active in Senator Taft's campaign), Dr. Robert A. Millikan, Erle Cocke, Jr., past commander of the American Legion, Cecil B. DeMille, Edgar Goodspeed, Rupert Hughes, Dean Clarence Manion of the University of Notre Dame Law School, Felix Morley, Dr. Norman Vincent Peale, Eddie Rickenbacker, and George Sokolsky.

But the principal figure behind Freedom Clubs, Inc., according to Dr. Roscoe Pound, is the inimitable Dr. James W. Fifield, Jr., of the First Congregational Church of Los Angeles, founder of Spiritual Mobilization. James P. Selva, public-relations counsel for the club, is also public-relations advisor to National Citizens for Taft, the committee headed by General Wedemeyer. A member of this committee, Felix Wittmer, wrote the vicious attack on Secretary of State Dean Acheson which appeared in the April issue of The American Mercury. According to the New York Times, over 250,000 reprints of this article have been distributed, some by the National Republican headquarters “and at least one other Republican organization.” The Senate Elections Subcommittee should be encouraged to find out who is financing the public-relations activities of Freedom Clubs, Inc.

Hopping Mad

Rear Admiral Francis C. Denebrink has exonerated the skipper and chief executive officer of the U. S. S. Reclaimer, against whom seventy crewmen had filed charges of harsh and unjust treatment. During the five-week hearings in Honolulu, Admiral Denebrink seemed more interested, as we have already pointed out [The Nation, April 19], in discovering how the press learned of the charges than in investigating them. In particular, the Admiral's ire seems to have been aroused by the fact that Seaman Bruce S. Hopping, who in civilian life manages a lumber firm grossing $3,000,000 annually, had retained counsel to represent himself and the other crewmen who had filed the charges. Shortly after the Admiral's report was made, Hopping was convicted by a special court martial of soliciting complaints from seamen and of conspiring with them to embarrass his commanding officer. Given a “bad conduct” discharge, he was immediately confined pending a hearing on his appeal. Judge Delbert Metzger has, however, ordered navy officials to show cause why Hopping should not be released.

Our concern with this case was first aroused by the generally “hush-hush” atmosphere in which the hearings were conducted. This concern has not been lessened by Admiral Denebrink's report which on its face ignores the central issue on which the charges were based—the question of morale—nor by the promptness with which higher-ups accepted the Admiral's recommendation that Seaman Hopping should be court-martialed. We predict that the navy will not hear the last of this case for a long time.

Nation Associates Conference

In many respects the Nation Associate's all-day conference last Sunday on Freedom's Stake in the Middle East and North Africa was the organization's most successful affair to date. It brought together 600 delegates from ten states to hear an especially distinguished list of speakers including Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and (by proxy) Senator Estes Kefauver, who at the last moment wired that he was detained in California by the Presidential primary campaign there. His speech was delivered by the chairman of his New York campaign, Boris Kastelanetz. Among the other speakers were Ambassador L. N. Palar, Permanent Representative of Indonesia to the United Nations; David Goitein, Minister Plenipotentiary of Israel; Dr. S. R. Shafaq, member of the Iran Senate and now a visiting professor at Columbia University; M. Jean Louis Manderaeu, Director of Missions Division of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration; Professor E. A. Speiser, chairman of the Department of Oriental Studies of the University of Pennsylvania, and Kingsley Martin, editor of the British journal The New Statesman and Nation.

The proceedings of the conference—representing, we believe, a constructive contribution to the solution of a vital subject—will be covered more fully in next week's Nation. We'd like now, however, to quote Arthur Garfield Hayes who, presiding at the final dinner session, took the unusual step of introducing the audience to the speakers. "You have before you," he told the occupants of the dais, "the intellectual elite of New York and surrounding areas." Geographically, Mr. Hayes' assertion was on the modest side; delegates came from as far away as Utah, which was represented by Chief Justice James Wolfe of the State Supreme Court. The directors of the Nation Associates feel that so long as they can command the support of so dynamic and significant a section of the American community, nobody need worry about the future of the true liberal tradition in this country.

Let 'Em Eat Fresh

On the same day that Congress defeated a bill to increase federal old-age insurance payments to enable the aged to meet higher prices, the Office of Price Stabilization raised the price of canned vegetables by one to two cents a can.

Second Round: Battle for Schools

WITH the publication in the June issue of the American Legion Magazine of an article attacking the National Education Association, the "battle for the schools," to which we devoted a series of articles last fall,* has entered a new phase.

In itself the article—Your Child Is Their Target, by Irene Corbally Kuhn—is unimportant. It simply repeats and elaborates standard charges used in all recent attacks on the public schools: failure to emphasize the three R's; the use of Communist-influenced textbooks by "subversive" teachers; and the evils of progressive education. The importance of the article stems from two facts: it appears in the official publication of the American Legion and it directly assails the National Education Association. The largest and most influential of American educational organizations, the N. E. A. has an active membership of 400,000—made up of teachers, principals, and superintendents—and a total or affiliated membership of nearly 800,000.

While Miss Kuhn's article attempts to drive a wedge between the membership of the N. E. A. and the top echelon of its leadership, and concentrates its fire on the N. E. A.'s National Commission for the Defense of Democracy Through Education, it can only be read as a direct attack on the N. E. A. as a whole. "One of the strongest forces today in propagandizing for a socialistic America," she writes, "is the hierarchy of the National Education Association." And in a reference to the organization itself she says: "Some of its performances have been more typical of the tactics of a captured labor union, complete with goon squads, than of a respectable national organization." To appreciate the significance of the appearance of an article using such language in the Legion Magazine, it should be recalled that the Legion and the N. E. A. have been active allies since the establishment of a joint committee on educational problems some twenty years ago. What exactly has happened, then, to prompt this aggressive and provocative attack by the most influential veteran organization in the United States on the largest educational organization in the country?

THERE is more to the developing feud between the Legion and the N. E. A. than meets the eye. For example, certain sub-surface tensions have been growing over the question of federal aid to education. The N. E. A. has, of course, steadily maintained that federal aid should only be granted to public schools, while the Legion has been under great pressure from a section of its membership to favor federal aid to parochial schools as well. But this issue, on which no real break has yet occurred, hardly accounts for the present all-out attack on the N. E. A.

The key is probably to be found in the success of the N. E. A.'s counter-offensive against the enemies of public education. Drawing a sharp distinction between honest criticism of the schools, however drastic, and organized attacks on public education, the National Commission for the Defense of Democracy has effectively alerted communities from coast to coast to the dangers, and has exposed the activities, of such groups as Allen Zoll's National Council for American Education, the American Education Association, Lucille Cardin Crain's Committee on Education of the Conference of American Small Business Organizations, and other groups which, under the pretext of opposing progressive education and other symbolic targets, are out to capture control of the public-school system. The N. E. A.'s counter-offensive, which Miss Kuhn denounces as "an all-encompassing-umbrella smear campaign," has been so effective, in fact, that in not a single test engagement have the enemies of public education been able to win a clear-cut victory. In Pasadena they did succeed in forcing the resignation of Superintendent of Schools Willard E. Goslin, but only at the cost of alerting the community and the nation to the dangers of their campaign. In Scarsdale, New York; Englewood, New Jersey; and in Denver, Minneapolis, and Palo Alto the "enemy" has been forced to retreat if not to capitulate.

At the same time, there has been a tremendous growth of citizen interest in the public schools; Benjamin Fine, writing in the New York Times, estimates, for example, that some 5,000 citizens' organizations concerned with education have been formed in the last five years. Now that the first assaults have been thrown back and this formidable body of public opinion has been organized, the "enemy" cannot resume the battle to capture control of the schools without first bringing into play new forces powerful enough to impose "coordination" upon the N. E. A. If this can be done, then the next objective will be to capture control of the grass-roots committees and organizations that have come into being since 1947. Miss Kuhn hints, for example, that these groups will be "linked together at the appropriate moment." One can readily surmise that the appropriate moment will be when the N. E. A. has been forced to repudiate or disband its National Commission for the Defense of Democracy. As a matter of fact, the Legion attack on the N. E. A. was foreshadowed by a report which the Sons of the American Revolution issued last summer, blasting the N. E. A. as "the chief culprit" in a conspiracy "to force socialism and communism on the United States." A copy of the report was submitted to the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

The forces that launched the "battle for the schools," of which Pasadena was the first major skirmish, have not been able to break through the defenses which were so quickly and effectively thrown up by the N. E. A. and other bodies. These forces are now being regrouped for another assault, the full force of which will not be felt until this fall. The strategy, however, is already clear. It will aim, first, at removing the roadblock which is the N. E. A.'s National Commission, and second, at capturing control of the various citizens' grassroots committees and fusing them into a mass movement under Legion auspices and control. The new congressional committee that was recently established to investigate the foundations will doubtless inquire into the various grants that the N. E. A. has received—a matter which is touched upon, incidentally, in Miss Kuhn's article. It would be difficult, therefore, to exaggerate the importance of the second offensive in "the battle for the schools" of which the Legion article is the first major fusillade.

How Wrong Was It?

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

IF ANY paper other than the Monde had published the "Fechteler document," the whole thing would have been forgotten in a day or two. The hullabaloo over it, not only in France but also abroad, is certainly a tribute to the Monde's authority, influence, and unique position in European journalism. To see it tripped up no doubt embarrassed all those who think the Monde not only one of the most courageous and independent, but also one of the best-informed papers in the world; while its enemies were filled with such glee that some screamed for government action and some even for police action. As if there were a paper in the world that had never made a mistake!

But how big a mistake was it? The article written recently in The Monde in self-defense by its editor, M. Beuve-Mery, though rather lame in spots, made a number of direct hits. Why, he asked, did the Americans, including Fechteler, dismiss the whole thing as "fantastic" when in reality a large part of the report was a direct transcript of an article in the U. S. Naval Institute Proceedings by Commander Talerico, an associate of Admiral Fechteler and of Admiral Carney? Why also did Talerico lie low until a bright Dutch journalist discovered where large parts of the "Fechteler report" had been "cribbed" from? And how very inefficient of Fechteler's own men to have "spent a whole week-end searching for any possible basis" of the Monde document when all they had to do was to look up a few back numbers of the semi-official U. S. Navy publication.

As far as the top-priority to be given to the Mediterranean in the next war against Russia was concerned, the only mistake the Monde made was to attribute the smoke to a slightly wrong fire; a much bigger mistake was to assume that Fechteler had written the passages concerning the almost instantaneous collapse of the European army, the invasion of England by 150,000 paratroopers, and so on. If this was not part of the Talerico document, where then had it come from? Had it been added by the "editors" of the "Fechteler document" on their own initiative, or had they found it in some other American military or naval expert's article? The most Beuve-Mery found to say on that score was to quote the self-same U. S. Naval Proceedings which recently published an article by Commander C. S. Arthur, advocating a "scorched earth" policy throughout Western Europe in the event of a Russian advance, and adding that, from the standpoint of United States strategy, "it would be far better if Europe did not exist at all."

Finally, Beuve-Mery said that if he was "taken in" by the "Fechteler document," which had been procured by somebody in the Secret Service (no names were mentioned), it was because certain important French officials who knew about it had also been "taken in."

What Beuve-Mery's defense amounts to in the last analysis is that if the publication of the "document" was a bad technical mistake, it was not a major political mistake. The truth is that American military and naval experts undoubtedly have been messing about with all sorts of dangerous ideas involving the fate of Europe, and yet anxious that Europe should not know anything about it. And when sometimes Europe does learn about American strategic plans, it is often too late to avoid trouble.

What Beuve-Mery apparently feels is that it would be better if in Europe, at any rate, we did not have a repetition of the "obscurities" of American policy in the Far East; and that Europe is entitled to know a little more about American planning for the next war. The fact remains, however, that the Monde made a bad technical mistake.

Switzerland—Cradle of Neutralism

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

SWITZERLAND does not often make the headlines in the American press but its position in the ideological world conflict is worthy of thoughtful attention. For Switzerland is the neutral country par excellence. Its neutrality is not a static dogma; it is a subject of controversy not only abroad but among the Swiss themselves.

Officially Swiss neutrality has been understood and respected ever since the Declaration of Paris on November 20, 1815, which stated that "The signatory Powers recognized the neutrality of Switzerland and proclaimed that her inviolability and her independence from any influence are in the interest of all Europe." When, in 1848, Switzerland adopted a federated political structure, neutrality was made the foundation of its foreign policy. The country has remained remarkably faithful to this policy ever since.

Neutrality does not mean isolation. On the occasion of Switzerland's ratification of the Covenant of European Economic Cooperation signed in Paris on April 16, 1948, the Swiss government stated this plainly: "Placed at the center of Europe, our country can neither isolate herself economically nor remain indifferent to the events that take place on our frontiers." A year earlier, when invited to participate in the Paris conference to examine the Marshall Plan, Switzerland declared its conditions for participation: (1) that collaboration would not be incompatible with neutrality; (2) that the country would not be tied by decisions of an economic character taken without its approval; (3) that Switzerland must be free to maintain its present agreements and conclude any new ones it might desire with countries not participating in the organization created at Paris. The last point was to insure freedom of action in regard to Russia and other Communist countries. In the case of China, in a gesture of loyalty to the principle of political neutrality, Switzerland extended recognition to the Mao Tse-tung government as soon as its authority over the country appeared definitely established.

Western Europe is an important factor in Swiss trade policy, imports traditionally having the upper hand over exports. But since the commercial treaty signed in Moscow on March, 1948, there has been an exchange of goods between Russia and Switzerland, though not on a large scale. Since 1950 trade with Poland has increased, especially the import of Polish coal. Swiss exports to Czechoslovakia rose in 1951. With Rumania and Hungary a normal though modest commerce has also developed. Certain Western powers frown upon this trade; the Swiss government, however, insists that it has taken all kinds of effective measures to prevent strategic goods sent to Switzerland from the West from reaching the Eastern countries. Neutrality does not prevent either the government or the press, the latter one of the best in the world, from openly criticizing certain trends in European policy, such as the Schuman Plan or the frivolous attempt in the Council of Europe to adopt a program of federation—a subject on which the Swiss speak with some authority!

There was at one time a lively debate in the Swiss press as to whether Switzerland, in view of the growing world tensions, should join the United Nations; but the idea was overwhelmingly rejected on the ground that the charter imposes upon members the obligation to support armed sanctions against aggressors. In a poll of 52,000 persons of both sexes, 58.8 per cent of those questioned supported unconditional neutrality; 38.2 per cent voted to maintain the principle of neutrality in the event that Switzerland should decide to join the United Nations, and only 3 per cent called for the abandonment of neutrality.

Neutrality in Switzerland does not imply any lack of determination to defend the country. Great sacrifices are made to maintain a first-class army. The sum of 1,464 million Swiss francs, an enormous total for such a small country, has been voted for military purposes for the years 1951 to 1954. The policy of "armed neutrality" has the solid support of the Swiss people.

Large sections of European opinion enrolled under the banner of "neutralism" have found justification and encouragement in the example of Switzerland. The movement started in France; at the outset it appeared destined to remain the intellectual platform of a group of historians, professors, and writers. The planners of Atlantic defense strategy paid almost no attention to the campaign by Claude Bourdet in the Observateur, to an article by the academician Etienne Gilson in the Monde, or a single challenging essay by the late Emmanuel Mounier, founder of Esprit. Neutralism suffered a reverse when war broke out in Korea but regained impetus as the general international situation worsened.

THE mistrust with which the Communists at first regarded a movement which, in their view, confused the issues, gradually vanished. The Soviet note of March 10 on Germany offered the extreme Left a chance to soften their hostility to neutralism. In Action, Pierre Hervé, who had previously used his satiric talent to poke fun at the neutralists, wrote: "The Soviet plan may create in the center of Europe a neutral power that will prove that the neutrality of a great nation is not only possible but beneficent." But even before a change of attitude was registered by Communist spokesmen, neutralism was assured of Left-wing mass support. A recent study by the French Institute of Public Opinion reveals that the average French Communist voter is a "neutralist." Only one in five replied "yes" to the question: "Do you believe France should participate in a war between the U. S. S. R. and the U. S. A. if given opportunity to remain neutral?" Sixty-five per cent said "no." An American news agency stated: "This neutralism is the strongest current in French political thought today and the one most difficult to overcome in a push for a defense build-up."

The movement is no longer exclusively a French product. In Italy it played a considerable role in the campaign prior to last Sunday's elections. It is spreading in Britain and the Scandinavian countries; in Germany it is tied up with the idea of unification and the withdrawal of the occupying powers. It has been particularly strong during the far-reaching events of recent months—the signing of the new "contractual agreement" with Germany, the signing of the treaty to pool the military strength of France, Italy, West Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg, and the signing of a protocol to extend to Germany the territorial guaranties of the North Atlantic Treaty. Neutralism is bound to become still more active in the period just ahead, when all efforts to avert the consequences of these events will multiply.

Neutralism has crossed the ocean, though the word is less used in this hemisphere. We see it in the Mexican refusal to enter into a military pact with the United States, in the position taken by such popular leaders as Frondizi of the old Radical Party in Argentina, in the feeling against making precise military commitments which prevails throughout most of Latin America as well as in large parts of non-Communist Asia.

Neutralism is not merely, as has been suggested, fear of an atomic war, cowardice, selfishness, reluctance to pay taxes for rearmament or to exchange butter for guns. It is also the revolt of the best spirits against the hypoc-

La Tribune des Nations, Geneva

Mr. Eisenhower Says Farewell to General Eisenhower

risky of a policy that asks people to be ready to die for principles that are daily betrayed by the very governments that issue the call to arms. An outstanding neutralist—and anti-Communist—explained to me in France last January the reasons for his position:

I simply have come to the conclusion that there isn't any appeal to decent impulse in our foreign policy. They speak of democracy and support Franco in your country. They praise self-determination and identify themselves with the traditional colonialism. They talk of Point Four and withhold the funds necessary to put it into practice.

My friend told the story of how thousands of posters that had been prepared by the United Nations for distribution during the Assembly had been suppressed because they carried the picture of a dove, which might be mistaken for the Picasso "peace dove." "We have even allowed the Russians to steal from us the symbol of peace," he repeated bitterly.

Not every country is in the privileged situation of Switzerland which has not been invaded since 1815 and has been able to combine neutralism with the most agile and alert preparedness for defense. Only six weeks ago its War Office urged all householders to be ready for any emergency and arranged for the sale of a package containing a one-person ration, as if war were going to break out tomorrow. The Swiss do not fear immediate war but neither do they wish, in this era of growing neutralism, that the significance of Swiss neutrality be wrongly interpreted.

Revolution Is Our Business

BY WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS

THERE is much talk these days of war. I, of course, am not in a position to know, but I have a feeling that the fears of America are often misplaced. I have a feeling that we have misinterpreted and misjudged some of the forces in the world.

Soviet Russia, with its hungry appetite for imperialistic expansion, is a military threat, and America must be prepared, of course. But I don't think there is going to be war with Russia at this time. And why?

I think the stakes involved, the immediate stakes are the stakes of Asia and the Middle East. I think that Soviet Russia will not move in a military way until it has on its side the balance of the people of the world. Freedom and justice and equality are the bulwark against any form of totalitarianism, the most virulent of which is communism. . . .

The great struggles for the world today are at the political level. The battle for Asia is at the political level, and in that sense, I think we in America have misinterpreted the signs of the times. It is my deep conviction that the peoples of Asia cannot be won by guns or by dollars. The peoples of Asia must be won, if they are to be won, with ideas.

I suppose that each of us projects into his personal relationships and into his community relationships, the conflicts he has within himself.

That is inevitable because, after all, we are all human beings. If you do not believe in free speech, if you are afraid of new ideas, of course, you will be panicky and alarmed at people like Nehru of India, who believes in experimentation.

If you are suspicious that every one who has a new idea may be a secret Communist agent representing the Kremlin, of course, you will be suspicious of the peoples of the Middle East who are speaking and working and striving for a higher standard of living for themselves. And, if you practice racial discrimination, if you do not believe that a man is entitled to the same opportunities, whatever his religion, whatever his race, whatever his creed, when you turn to the colored people of Asia, you will be confused and in trouble, because you who are not able to recognize equality at home will not be able to recognize equality abroad.

The worst provincialism of which America can be guilty is the provincialism of prejudice, racial prejudice, prejudice against new and challenging ideas. . . .

The most powerful things in the world are ideas, more powerful than all of the atomic bombs, all of the big guns, all of the airplanes. They are the most dangerous things in the world too.

What is this hold that communism has on people? Mostly ideas, and rather shabby ones at that—ideas borrowed from the West and perverted to the Communist goal.

What is the great, powerful thing of which we are proud in America? What is it that we represent? . . . It is our Declaration of Independence, it is our Constitution, it is our Bill of Rights. Those are the things that set us apart, not our television sets, not our bathroom facilities, not our motor cars, not our buildings, and paved streets. And when the atomic dust settles, if it ever does, we will still have our ideas of brotherhood and freedom and justice and we will go on from there and not turn back.

This article is a condensation of an address by the Hon. William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, at the 18th biennial convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (C. I. O.), held recently at Atlantic City.

There are revolutions that are sweeping the world and we in America have been in a position of trying to stop them. With all the wealth of America, with all of the military strength of America, those revolutions cannot be stopped. Those revolutions are revolutions against a form of political and economic organization in the countries of Asia and the Middle East that are oppressive. They are revolutions against feudalism. It is feudalism that is feeding the fires of communism in the Middle East and Asia.

When I say feudalism, I mean a system of economic organization in which a few men own the wealth of the country, where a few men run the politics of a country and where there is a government of the landlords and by the landlords and for the landlords. We do not have that in America. We have in America a broad base for participation in all affairs by everyone. We in America are not perfect. We have much to do, but our standards are right and our ideals are good, and we are striving to live up to them.

But out there in the Middle East and Asia, people like us who have come from the bottom of society, as all of us have, would not have any opportunity.

We would have no schools for our children; we would have no doctors or dentists to take care of ourselves or our families; we would have no hospitals; our income would be barely enough to live on.

We would be tied into a farm-tenancy system in which the owner of the land would get a net return of about 90 per cent or 95 per cent on the crop and we would get 5 per cent or 10 per cent—a bare subsistence. He would own our land, our houses, our oxen, our plows, our water. He would own our souls.

That kind of a system is not going to survive.

People are on the move. I did not fully appreciate that until I got to the Middle East and spent three summers there and saw what was happening in the villages. People are on the march.

Who are their champions today? The underground Communist Party. Why aren't we their champions? Why aren't we in America standing in the villages of the Middle East and Asia and saying we are for economic justice and social justice and we are going to help you, the peasants, achieve your revolution? Not by throwing bombs, of course. Not by smuggling in guns, not by leading armed insurrections. But through revolutions in the political sense.

What do we do instead? We have been supporting corrupt reactionary regimes, putting money behind governments that are vicious governments, reactionary governments, wasting the wealth of America, trying to underwrite the status quo, trying to stabilize the situation, as our officials sometimes say.

The situation cannot be stabilized with all the wealth of the world, with all of the guns of the world. Things are on the move. Revolutions are in the making. The stakes are civilization. Russia is not going to move in a military way, in my opinion, until the balance of power politically swings to Russia in Asia. So I say, let us concentrate our thinking upon Asia and the Middle East and decide, as a result of our own soul-searching, what we do really stand for. . . .

This is a great country and the people are generous and warmhearted and idealistic. There is today, I think, a great groping for something that is constructive and positive. There is a growing feeling in this country of futility, of frustration. What we are doing is not succeeding while Russia seems to be having political success after political success.

Russia has been winning by default. With very few exceptions, there is no such thing in the Middle East as political parties as we know them. The only political alternative that the people have had, who have been trying to escape from their misery and their poverty, has been the Communist Party. There are exceptions, but the exceptions are not many. We, in our generosity, go to these countries with a vast Point Four program from a technical point of view. With all our medical skills and public-health services, we can move into the Middle East and Asia and we can improve conditions substantially.

of ten babies die before they reach the age of one; and it would not take very many American technicians to move through that part of the world and to stop that, by cleaning up water supplies, by teaching vaccination, and so on.

But if that is all that is done, if all you do is keep the babies from dying before they reach the age of one, you have done nothing but increase the number of people among whom you will have to ration the poverty.

You can move in to your agricultural areas of Asia and the Middle East with our wonderful Point Four program and increase the production of the land. But if the net return to the tenant is still only 5 per cent, all you are doing is making a few landlords richer.

I am not exaggerating. I do not think we have any idea of the extent to which the feudal system has fastened itself upon that part of the world. It is about the way Europe was before 1000 A. D.

I met men out there who own farming land greater in acreage than the entire state of Switzerland. One man owned 1,600 villages lock, stock, and barrel. Go into those villages with your Point Four program and increase the production of the land and if the owner takes 95 per cent, what have you gained in the struggle against communism?

There are many raw materials in Asia and the Middle East. There are tremendous industrial possibilities there. Those industrial possibilities fill men like Nehru with alarm and deep concern. Why? Your unskilled labor in that part of the world gets around 25 cents a day. Your skilled labor in that part of the world gets about $1 a day.

The standards are not the same as they are here. Conditions are vastly different. Of course, Asia needs industrialization. Of course, the Middle East does too. But it will take years and years to get it, in the American sense, unless there is going to be tremendous exploitation.

It cannot be done quickly. It cannot be done in the typical American way of doing things. It must be slow. One of the things that must be imported along with capital is the organization of unions for the protection of the rights of labor. . . .

When one sees how far back in the train of things the peoples of Asia are, industrially speaking, one begins to appreciate the wisdom of Gandhi when he was arguing for the development of home industries and village industries, rather than these tremendous social cancers that would fasten themselves on Asia and India for the benefit of a few men.

Yes, we must go to the Middle East and we must go to Asia. We must help them. We must go with technical programs. We must also go with social and political ideas. If we do not go with social and political ideas, our technical program will be of little value in saving that part of the world from Soviet imperialism.

Abraham Lincoln said that the Declaration of Independence was an instrument forged not only for the benefit of Americans on this continent, but one destined to lift the weight off the shoulders of men the world around. That is what people in the backward areas think.

Let us be true to our great traditions. Let us go to the world with ideas of freedom and justice. Let us make the revolutions. Let us make sure that when our technical people go into the villages of the Middle East and Asia the people of the villages know on which side America stands.

You cannot go into those villages and be there a week without taking sides. You are either for the landlord or you are for the peasants. Before we go, let us make up our mind whom we are for; and if we cannot make up our mind, we should not go. If we can hitch the few dollars that we have and the much knowledge that we have to a few simple ideas of economic democracy and political democracy and social justice, and be heard in that part of the world as the advocates of economic and social and political democracy, the red tide of communism will turn. Then we of the West will make a political victory; we will have Asia and the Middle East on our side; we will save those people from the curse of Soviet imperialism. Those are things that we must go to the world with.

We have been hesitant, we have been afraid. We have poured billions of dollars into Europe, and we did necessarily, I think; but we have never hitched much of our European dollars to ideas.

Why do you think the number of Communists have been increasing in France and in Italy? Why do you think they have been growing? Because we have not hitched our dollars to ideas. Unless we hitch our few dollars to ideas, unless we are forthright in our dealings in the Middle East and in Asia, we are going to go down in history as identified with the worst reactionary imperialistic forces, apart from Soviet Russia, that the world has known. That is not fair to America nor to her people, because America is not made up of people who want to do that kind of thing.

We believe not in terror, but in tolerance; we believe in justice for everyone, regardless of his political faith, his racial origins, or his religious creeds. Those are the strongest ideas that have ever been let loose in the world.

The Depressing German Press

BY MANFRED GEORGE

UNDER Hitler the German people learned to distrust the printed word. The avalanche of lies which Goebbels unloosed practically blotted out any distinction between fact and propaganda. When the Allies marched into Germany they needed a reliable press which did not exist. Most of the old newspapermen had been Nazis and had fled or gone underground. The younger generation had had no political or technical training for the job. The few members of the German press who had belonged to the resistance movement or, being stout Social Democrats or Catholics, had disappeared from the scene during the Hitler period, were therefore pressed into service. In addition, there were numerous prominent journalists who had left Germany in the thirties and returned with the Allied armies.

At present the West German Federal Republic has only one daily with national circulation—the Neue Zeitung, published until recently in Munich but now removed to Frankfurt and Berlin. Edited by Hans Wallenberg, a brilliant German exile who became a major in the United States army during the war, it is read by everybody in public life. Its coverage of political and cultural events is of the highest quality. But the Neue Zeitung—and this is the important thing—is the official mouthpiece of the American authorities. Although it is widely read and discussed, it is considered a “foreign” paper by the politically-minded German public.

Other German dailies are more or less local papers. Their distribution is confined to the town or city in which they appear, or at the most, to the province. Newspapers in cities like Frankfurt, Munich, and Cologne have of course a fairly large circulation, but it cannot be said that they exercise a definite influence on political opinion. The most important are Die Welt (Hamburg)

the Frankfurter Rundschau, the Stuttgarter Zeitung, the Süddeutsche Zeitung of Munich, the Rhein-Neckar Zeitung of Heidelberg (one of the owners is President Heuss), and the Berlin Tagesspiegel. West Germany is strictly decentralized; the federal government plays a lesser role than the governments of the Laender, or states. For that reason most papers have a narrow provincial outlook, their interests centering in municipal or state affairs.

Almost all the larger newspapers have remained in the hands of the men who started them in 1945. The Nazis who returned to the newspaper field a few years ago have as yet been unable to reconquer it. Although the Allies no longer require Germans to obtain a license for putting out a paper, the liberals have held their own against resurgent Nazi competition. In the midst of a rising tide of Nazism, the dozen leading dailies are still unequivocally anti-Nazi.

Does this mean that the German mind gets healthy nourishment? A look at the average German newsstand will furnish the answer. Slick magazines and cheap “yellow” journals crowd out everything else.

The best approach to a German is still the emotional one. Stories supported by pictures are the chosen medium. Among the weeklies only those that are illustrated and cater to German sentimentality have a country-wide circulation. To increase their appeal by playing on hidden sentiments and suppressed ambitions, these papers soon adopted the nationalist line. The two largest, Quick and Der Stern (The Star), each with a circulation of some 600,000, are definitely nationalist, displaying even a Nazi tinge. Two others are democratic in tone—the Neue Illustrierte of Cologne and the Frankfurter Illustrierte, whose editor-in-chief is Friedrich Kroner, in pre-Hitler days editor of Germany's best magazine, Uhu. Until very recently the Münchner Illustrierte also belonged in this group. Hans Habe, the well-known novelist, author of “A Thousand Shall Fall,” edited it, but he has now resigned, and the magazine has become non-political.

MANFRED GEORGE, editor of Aufbau, New York German-language weekly, is also American correspondent for the well-known Swiss daily, the Basel Nationalzeitung. He visited Germany last year.

(Habe himself has just started publishing a weekly, Echo der Woche, with the characteristic subtitle Independent European Magazine.) Each of these three weeklies has a circulation of about half a million. Revue, which closely follows the nationalist line, sells perhaps 400,000 copies weekly.

To show how the facts are all too frequently distorted: on October 6 last Revue carried two letters to the editor which termed the figure of 11,000,000 for the victims of Nazi occupation fantastic and impossible. One letter said the "Quarterly Report of the United States High Commissioner" gave the total number of Nazi victims as 2,000,000. The editor of the "Quarterly Report" replied that the figure of 2,000,000 referred only to victims of the S. S. occupation troops. Revue carried this explanation but in a carefully abridged form and surrounded by four other letters which painstakingly quoted obscure sources to prove that Jews always grossly exaggerate the losses suffered under Hitler.

These illustrated weeklies tell more about the German temper than any Gallup Poll could possibly do. After a surprising number of stories about life and happenings in the United States—some giving a false picture of the "American way of life" and some outspokenly hostile—their main features are evocations of the "good old times." For the democratic magazines the "good old times" are the era of the Kaiser. A serial entitled "My Grandfather the Kaiser," written by a granddaughter of Wilhelm II, had tremendous success and increased the paper's circulation by 10,000. The nationalist magazines, under the pretext of presenting documentaries of historical interest, glamourize the Führer and his lieutenants. One series, "Behind the Walls of Spandau," depicted the sad life of war criminals in the military prison near Berlin. A semi-documentary, "Night Without Pity," started out with the assassination of a high Allied officer. Another extremely successful serial was "Hitler's Tischgespräche" ("Conversations at Hitler's Dinner Table"), published ostensibly to show the irresponsible maundering of Hitler's talk but in the final analysis serving a different purpose which its readers were not slow to find.

In addition to the big six, there are no fewer than thirty-two smaller illustrated weeklies. A number of other periodicals, some of them illustrated, are devoted to the interests of special groups—veterans, refugees, ex-prisoners of war, and so on. During the past few months two have attracted particular attention. One calls itself Der Stahlhelm (The Steel Helmet) and shows the grim face of a steel-helmeted soldier next to its masthead. Banned by Hitler in 1935, it is again being published as the organ of the reactionary generals, clamoring for restitution of the territories lost to Poland and extolling General Mannstein, a convicted war criminal, as a kind of male Joan of Arc. Die Deutsche Soldatenzeitung (The German Soldier's Weekly) features an Iron Cross on its front page. It was this paper, incidentally, which published the outrageous demands proposed by General Friessler as the price of Germany's military cooperation within the framework of a European army.

Some of the most dangerous propaganda is spread by weeklies like Der Sudetendeutsche (The Sudeten German) and the Ostdeutsche Zeitung (East German Weekly), organs of the ten million German refugees from the eastern provinces and the German districts of Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, and the Baltic states. These refugees are full of hate against those who drove them from their homeland and support any nationalist movement which aims to reconquer the lost provinces.

On the other side of the ledger, several periodicals live up to the best traditions of the German press. Die Gegenwart, Europäische Hefte, Europa Archiv, Die Aktion, Geist und Tat, and a few others represent the politically progressive minds in Germany. Unfortunately, they are comparatively few in number, and so are their readers.

There is not much chance that this depressing picture will change. Only if we stop considering a motley crowd of full-fledged reactionaries and semi-fascists our friends just because they profess to be anti-Communist will the progressive press of Western Germany get the encouragement it so desperately needs.

California's Church School War

BY HANNAH BLOOM

Los Angeles

CALIFORNIANS will tangle with some turbulent issues in this year's elections, but none more touchy than the referendum to repeal the Waters act, which exempts from property taxes all religious schools of less than collegiate grade. Always "the great exception," California is the only state that, until the adoption of the act last spring, had never granted tax exemption to parochial schools; in fact, the state legislature had rejected the principle on three prior occasions in the last quarter century. In November, for the first time in California or anywhere else, the issue will be subjected to popular vote on a state-wide basis.

It goes without saying, of course, that a question so "hot" as this is already being debated at luncheon clubs, open forums, and on radio and television programs, confirming that "Californians adore being campaigned."

As soon as referendum petitions began to circulate, parochial-school patrons entered the lists. The Parents' Taxpayers Association and the Committee for Justice in Education blasted the petitioners as "religious bigots" and "subversives." Allowing the voters to pass on the Waters bill was condemned as an illegitimate use of the referendum; directors of the campaign were branded as "unscrupulous promoters"; persons distributing the petitions were threatened and accused of "misrepresentation"; the state Un-American Activities Committee promised to investigate charges of "subversion." A month after the referendum qualified for the ballot, with a surplus of 50,000 signatures, the Los Angeles Mirror pleaded for a four-month moratorium on the issue because an avalanche of letters to the editor reflected "irrational hatreds and bigotry."

The impetus for the Waters bill was supplied by the Los Angeles Board of Supervisors, which habitually convenes in July as a board of equalization and conducts quasi-judicial hearings on tax relief for religious, charitable, and other single-purpose institutions. Pleading hardship, necessity, or public service, such institutions had gradually won tax reductions amounting in some cases to nearly 90 per cent of the initial assessment. After a 1950 Supreme Court decision, the county counsel advised the board that such high exemptions were invalid, since its authority to correct tax inequities did not include the power to exempt. The remedy for this legal quirk, denominational advisers decided, was complete tax exemption. Legislation to this end was promptly introduced by Assemblyman Laughlin E. Waters and sponsored by fifty-seven other Assemblymen. Within twenty-seven legislative days the bill was approved by the Legislature with three dissenting votes and signed by Governor Earl Warren. It amends the "welfare exemption" of the state revenue and taxation code and extends "tax exemption to property used exclusively for schools of less than collegiate grade owned and operated by non-profit religious, hospital, or charitable institutions."

ABOUT 160,000 children, according to the New York Times, are enrolled in California's 700 parochial schools; the Roman Catholics operate about 453 schools, Seventh Day Adventists 146, and Lutherans less than 100. (The inclusion of hospital and charitable schools in the amendment was a touch of political whimsey, since none is known to exist which meets the full requirements of the exemption.) The bill gives a substantial boost to religious schools but is a boomerang to voters who supported in good faith the 1944 welfare amendment. At that time Charles W. Lyon, then speaker of the Assembly, and Thomas A. Maloney, speaker pro tem, assured the voters in the official argument for the measure that "schools other than colleges will not be exempted under this amendment because the Legislature expressly eliminated the term 'educational'." The original intent of the legislators and voters specifically to exclude elementary and secondary parochial schools from the advantages of the welfare exemption is deliberately reversed in the Waters bill.

The referendum temporarily annuls the Waters bill until the voters decide the issue. In the campaign against it prejudice and persecution have been artificially injected and recklessly used as political weapons. Those who oppose tax exemption become the devil's advocate—anti-Christian, anti-religious, or just anti-Catholic. The "character of the principal opposition" is described by the Committee for Justice in Education as "those who believe in a state monopoly of education" and "those who believe in the subversion of our free institutions by inciting distrust, disunity, and controversy." The popular position for public officials and political candidates is to support the religious schools by pleading for religious "unity" and "equity" or emphasizing that, after all, a paltry $650,000 in tax money is involved. Many will follow the lead of the Democratic and Republican parties and will duck the issue entirely.

Of major political-action groups, only organized labor has as yet taken a stand on the question. Union leaders have unhesitatingly indorsed the Waters bill and denounced the referendum. The state A. F. of L. found the exemption of parochial schools "in line with the historical position . . . to advance education every possible way." The C. I. O., referring to the opponents of exemption, was resolved to "root out this cellar society whose purpose it is to breed religious hatred." A few days after Assemblyman Waters said he had a "hunch" that such racists as Gerald L. K. Smith were supporting the referendum, a Los Angeles labor leader expressed "suspicion" of the sources of referendum funds.

While making numerous sorties in other directions, proponents of the tax exemption would like to confine the argument to an analysis of fiscal policies and revenue. If the parochial-school system did not exist, they say, and if its 160,000 students were suddenly thrust upon the public schools, the state would be forced to expend $43,000,000 in operating expenses and $150,000,000 in construction costs to accommodate the additional load. The $650,000 tax exemption is thus regarded as fair compensation for relieving over-crowded public school-rooms of a hypothetical "burden" of parochial-school children. To reward this "public service" with taxes on school property is "discriminatory" and "unfair." Indeed, the "essential functions" of these schools, according to campaign literature, are to "reduce substantially the burden of taxation" and provide a "guaranty that education will not become a state monopoly dominated by political thinking."

The natural appeal of economy is somewhat obscured by the insistence of spokesmen for the Waters bill that "it's not the money; it's the principle of the thing." Familiarity with that principle accounts for much of the determined opposition to parochial-school expansion with public funds. As sponsors and directors of the referendum campaign, the California Taxpayers' Alliance, founded in 1933 to defeat a similar proposal, considers the referendum long-range insurance against future demands upon public tax moneys for buses, textbooks, teachers' salaries, and other services for parochial schools. The Alliance represents a cross-section of opinion which is dormant except when challenged to action. It appeals alike to harassed taxpayers, advocates of a strict separation between church and state, and devoted protectors of the public schools. Prominent Masons, Christian Scientists, and leaders of other denominations participate as individuals, not as group representatives.

The agitation provoked by President Truman's proposed appointment of an ambassador to the Vatican has provided the Alliance, and numerous Protestant synods also protesting the tax exemption, with a ready-made audience. While waging a limited battle "against the continuing purposes of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to attain political power through the eventual control of all education," the Alliance stresses that the referendum "is not a question of the right of religious groups to conduct their own private schools, nor is it an attack upon these schools." Advocates of a school system "which subordinates education to religious instruction and the propagation of one faith to the exclusion of all others" are conceded the right to build and maintain their own schools. If the costs voluntarily assumed "do not justify the ends they seek, then they are free to discontinue their schools and educate their children at public expense."

After the first flood of election hyperbole, major emphasis in the tax-exemption fight will probably settle where it belongs, on the implicit threat to the public schools. California voters must decide whether they want to encourage the expansion of a private, sectarian school system at the cost not of a mere $650,000 but of loss of pride and confidence in the public-school system. Perhaps the Jesuit magazine America is correct when it states, "The Catholic and non-Catholic school systems are absolutely irreconcilable." Certainly, moral and financial support of the public schools is not encouraged when the system is described as "political education," and "the precursor of autocracy," and its defenders are associated with subversion and bigotry.

High Tariffs vs. Foreign Policy

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

DURING the next few weeks governments of many countries will be keeping an eye on Washington to see whether the United States will continue to practice as well as preach the gospel of freer international trade. Before Congress are two bills with an important bearing on this question. One is a measure, supported by the Administration, for the simplification of customs regulations and procedures which would eliminate some of the hazards and delays that now face importers of foreign goods. Protests by American interests have already led to weakening of this bill and its ultimate fate remains uncertain.

Of greater immediate interest to some of America's trading partners is the bill to extend the Defense Production Act. Although one of the primary purposes of this act was prevention of inflation, representatives of the dairy states succeeded last year in inserting a clause authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to restrict the importation of milk products. The result has been a drastic limitation by quota of cheese imports which has forced up prices of many types of cheese and brought protests from Denmark, Canada, Holland, Italy, and a number of other countries. Retention of this clause in a new Defense Production Act will suggest to many foreign traders that protectionism is making a comeback.

Another straw in the wind will be the decision of the Tariff Commission, due not later than June 15, on a request by a motorcycle manufacturer for increased tariffs. This application, like a number of others on file, invokes Section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 which instructed the Tariff Commission to investigate any complaint that a concession granted under a trade agreement has caused, or threatens to cause, "serious injury" to a domestic industry. Since the motorcycle case is the first to be investigated under Section 7, its disposition will provide a clue to the commission's interpretation of the phrase "serious injury."

While awaiting the outcome of these various legislative and administrative actions, foreign observers are also concerned about the party platforms that will be constructed at the July conventions. In particular, as there appears to be a strong possibility of a Republican victory, they are wondering whether the G. O. P. has learnt anything about the facts of economic life during its long political exile or whether it will stand pat on its traditional protectionist plank. This is a question of immediate importance since the Trade Agreements Act will expire next year.

IT WOULD be difficult to maintain that the reduction of American tariff since the first Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934 has resulted in floods of imports threatening to drown out American business. During the whole period, in fact, the United States has consistently exported more than it has imported and since 1946 its export surplus has averaged almost $5 billion annually. Although the balance of trade favors this country so heavily, any increased importation of any particular line of goods is likely to send representatives of the industry concerned howling to Washington for "relief." In the lexicons of many businessmen, farmers, and labor leaders, foreign competition is always unfair competition.

Consider, for example, the claims of the cheese-makers at whose behest Midwestern legislators sneaked Section 104 into the Defense Production Act of 1951. The flood of imports which they assert was threatening their livelihood amounted at no time to more than 5 per cent of domestic production. Moreover these imports included considerable quantities of sheep's and goat's milk cheese which are not manufactured here on a commercial basis. Nevertheless, the Secretary of Agriculture felt compelled by Section 104 to limit cheese imports for the year ending June 30 next to 30 per cent less than the 1950 total. This is a real blow to some of the best foreign customers of the United States, such as Denmark and Italy, which have depended on cheese for some 10 per cent of their export dollars. It has also been a blow to American consumers, who have seen prices of many varieties of cheese rise steeply since the quota was imposed last August. The wholesale price of domestic Swiss on May 2 was about 33 per cent higher than on August 24, 1951.

In a memorandum sent to the Department of State on April 9, the British Embassy in Washington described the anxiety caused to British exporters by the growing numbers of applications by American industries for relief under Section 7 of the Trade Agreements Act of 1951. British manufacturers, it pointed out, had been urged, not only by their own government, but by the United States, to push their wares in America with a view to reducing the "dollar gap." Now "they are perturbed by the mounting evidence that any marked success in selling their goods in the United States will be encountered by applications from American industry for further protection and the fear that some at least of these applications will be granted."

One British industry that has put both money and energy into building an American market since the war is the motorcycle industry, which has long led the world in the production of medium-weight machines appealing to young sportsmen. In this country the most important manufacturer of motorcycles is the Harley-Davidson Company of Milwaukee, which has specialized in a type of heavy machine favored by police forces and the military. This company has not hitherto stirred itself to produce sports models, yet now that British and European makers have created an entirely new market for such models, it is claiming "serious injury."

The present tariff on motorcycles is 10 per cent ad valorem, the rate fixed by the Tariff Act of 1930, while that on parts is 15 per cent. By recent trade agreements the United States has bound itself not to increase these rates. The Harley-Davidson Company wants the Tariff Commission to recommend an increase in the rate on machines to 40 per cent and in the rate on parts to 50 per cent and, pending necessary legislation, asks for a quota on imports of 10 per cent of the previous year's domestic production. In 1950—the last year for which complete figures are available—Harley-Davidson produced 17,024 motorcycles while imports numbered 9,426 (over 80 per cent of which were British). Although imports form a relatively high proportion of the total supply, there is no evidence that they have cut into Harley-Davidson's sales to public authorities: the company's established position and the "Buy American" Act afford it sufficient protection there. However, since filing its application with the Tariff Commission, Harley-Davidson has launched a new model which will have to compete with the lighter imported machines. Thus what it is really seeking is the practical exclusion of foreign manufacturers from a market which they actually created.

This seems such a flagrant bid for monopoly that it is hard to believe that the Tariff Commission will recommend any increase in the tariff. Should it do so, applications for "relief" will pour in from every industry that finds it is in the slightest degree inconvenienced by foreign competition. And foreign exporters in increasing numbers will ask: Why spend money in adapting designs for the American market, in building sales organizations, in maintaining adequate stocks, if as soon as we begin to attract customers, our trade is cut off by higher tariffs or quotas? Better to forget America and urge our governments to hustle up more trade through bilateral agreements.

Tariff propagandists argue that the industrialist who seeks additional protection is strictly within his legal rights. That is true and it is also true that Article XIX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (G. A. T. T.), which was promoted by the United States as a means of breaking down trade barriers, provides for withdrawal of tariff concessions, in exceptional circumstances, by any signatory. Nevertheless, as the British memorandum pointed out, the whole purpose of G. A. T. T. would be defeated if Article XIX were invoked frivolously, and particularly if "the major creditor country in the world were to set an example of withdrawing tariff concessions whenever they revealed their effectiveness through more vigorous competition between the imported and the domestically produced product."

It is saddening, and even frightening, that this debate should have to be continued at all. Here is a country which is the leading exponent of competitive free enterprise, which has an industrial capacity greater than all Europe put together, which rightly prides itself on its superior technical efficiency, which so consistently undersells foreign producers that year after year its exports vastly exceed its imports. Yet this country believes that unless it continues to cling to the old tariff nurse that protected it in infancy, it will be knocked out by the neighbors.

The American tariff is an anachronism. That fact has been recognized by Democratic Secretaries of State since Cordell Hull, but pressure from vested interests has forced them to move very slowly toward its abolition. As for the Republicans, a majority clearly believe that the tariff plank they nailed to their platform seventy years or more ago is as good as ever. It is almost certain to be reaffirmed at Chicago in July unless General Eisenhower speaks out boldly. He, at least, must have learned from his experiences in Europe that the Western alliance is doomed if this country pursues policies that encourage internecine economic warfare, and must agree with the Wall Street Journal's editorial comment: "It is obvious that a return to high tariff protection on our part will be glaringly inconsistent with a policy of appropriating Treasury funds to shore up the economies of other countries in the hope of assuring their political devotion to 'the West.'" It will be interesting to hear General Eisenhower on this subject.

Levittown in Bucks County

BY CHARLES R. ALLEN, JR.

Bristol, Pa.
WHEN 300 workers from the powerful Building Trades Council of Philadelphia (A. F. of L.) recently threw a picket line across the entrance of the mammoth Levittown housing project near here, it was a familiar story to builder William J. Levitt. The same thing happened to him during his debut into the mass-housing field on Long Island in 1947—and for the same reasons.

Levitt's local project is part of an industrial and general building boom which is threatening, among other things, to chase the artists and writers out of historic and beautiful Bucks county. The biggest single industrial development in the area is the $500,000,000 United States Steel Corporation plant—called Fairless after the firm's famous executive vice-president—in neighboring Morrisville. It has been predicted that the industrial boom will bring at least 100,000 workers into the area and Levittown is designed to accommodate 50,000 of them.

Levitt has been called the Henry Ford of the housing industry; he mass-produces his houses in "cycles." First a team of bulldozers scoops out a block of perhaps fifty foundation excavations; a crew follows to lay down the foundations; another crew sets up the walls in assembly-line fashion. Roof and interior soon follow, and then detail and trim. Here at Levittown the schedule calls for construction of nearly 6,000 houses a year for three years—an average of nineteen per working day.

The picketing union workers charge that while Levitt likes to deal with materials en masse, he prefers to deal with his employees on an individual basis. Specifically, members of the Philadelphia council charge that 400 of the 600 men employed in building Levittown are non-union; that skilled mechanics are made to perform a variety of jobs which cut across craft lines and thereby violate union rules; that many of the workers are paid on a piece-work instead of an hourly basis.

Ralph W. Myers, Levitt's public-relations man, admits that "some of the work is done on piece-work basis," but insists that in most cases wages are paid on an hourly scale. On the open-shop charge, his reply isn't at all evasive: "Mr. Levitt, biggest builder in the country, has been in business for twenty-two years and has never had a union shop." Presumably he never intends to have one. Last week he got a county court order enjoining the pickets. The injunction was not obeyed and state police were called out by Governor Fine to "provide whatever assistance is needed" to preserve order.

LEVITT is likely to meet trouble in fields other than labor. There is the question of racial discrimination. According to the Philadelphia Housing Authority, about a half-million Negroes live in the metropolitan area and a lot of them are going to be employed in Bucks county. Where will they live? In Levittown?

The other day I dropped into a Levittown office and applied for a house. "But," I told the salesman, "there's something I want to ask you about that's very important to me." The salesman lifted a reassuring hand. "You mean the talk that's going around about colored people living here?" he asked. "Listen, this is the point of sale—strictly between you and me—and believe me, we sell to whites only, mister."

Under Pennsylvania law, housing for Negroes is guaranteed in all residential construction aided by public funds—as is Levittown. Confronted with this issue, Levitt said he wasn't planning to make any "noble experiments" but added that, if necessary, he would build a separate community for Negroes "with their own clubhouse." The builder's efforts to maintain a "lily-white" clause in his Long Island leases were defeated by the stubborn opposition of liberal New Yorkers. But here, as there, he can attempt to keep his community white by adroit manipulation of his sales instead of his leases.

Levitt's disinclination for "noble experiments" extends into other areas. For instance, he doesn't like to mix varied economic groups in a single area. His "Country Clubber" houses, most expensive of the Levittown models, sell for $17,000, and are separated from the $10,000 homes designed for housing-starved veterans and defense workers. Moreover, there are reports that he doesn't like to mix Democrats with Republicans, either. The story is that he has assured Joseph R. Grundy, boss of the Pennsylvania Republican machine, that Levittown won't become infested with too many Democrats. It would be a neat trick, though obviously difficult of accomplishment.

Levittown is only one factor—albeit an important one—in the metamorphosis of Bucks county from bucolic retreat to factory-plus-suburb. Other similar developments are beginning to dot the rolling countryside, including one being built by United States Steel. Public-spirited citizens complain that there is no overall planning, no proper zoning, no proper conservation of the area's natural beauty. The Philadelphia Housing Association has warned:

The open green of the countryside can all too easily be changed . . . into the dirty, foul-smelling crowded landscape of badly-planned factories, hot-dog stands, service stations, and a wilderness of trailer camps and jerry-built speculative developments.

The United Automobile Workers of America (C. I. O.) and the United Steelworkers of America (C. I. O.) have expressed similar uneasiness, and not only about the physical changes in the region. Charles Ford, regional director of the Steelworkers union insists that "democratic growth" must accompany material well-being in an intelligently-planned community. Drayton Bryant, imaginative and dynamic assistant to the Executive Director of the Philadelphia Housing Authority, points out that Levittown failure to adopt a program of racial integration can mean:

. . . separate housing, separate schools, plus lines of tension in home and community facilities. . . . The steps are short from separation and ignorance to suspicion—from fear to hatred and then violence. Levittown and Bucks county have now become an outstanding opportunity and a national front line for the growth of a strong but adolescently fearful American democracy.

Acutely aware of the dangers implicit in the shattering of the Bucks county idyll, a group of representative citizens have formed a Human Relations Council under the chairmanship of Clarence Pickett, honorary secretary of the American Friends Service Committee. The council will seek to make sure that the area has enough schools, playgrounds, and other facilities and does not secede from the Bill of Rights.

That Nietzsche Book

By ALFRED WERNER

PERHAPS the most sensational book of the winter season was a volume entitled "My Sister and I" which was published, advertised, and reviewed as the autobiography of Friedrich Nietzsche which the German philosopher is supposed to have written in a psychiatric clinic in 1889. The book recounts an astonishing tale of sexual abnormality which begins with a description of an incestuous relationship between the philosopher and his sister.

The autobiography is said to have been posthumously discovered, but there is mounting evidence, circumstantial but nevertheless very persuasive, that the manuscript on which the book is based was also posthumously written. This belief is fortified by the opinion of Nietzsche experts that from 1889 until his death in 1900 the insane Nietzsche was quite incapable of writing anything which required mental exertion, especially a reminiscent and philosophical work. In addition, the book contains many ideas and attitudes which were not current at the time "My Sister and I" was written. For example, although Sigmund Freud's main theories were not published until about 1900, Nietzsche was apparently familiar with them in 1889. Nietzsche also exhibits a miraculous power of foresight. He prophesies, for instance, that his superman concept would be distorted to serve evil ends; he also predicts that "in the 20th century in a fit of nihilistic frenzy they [the Germans] will turn all Europe into a butcher's slaughterhouse and wash away their sins in the blood of Israel." Anticipating the day when Karl Marx would be put on the political index of the West, Nietzsche says, "I avoid reading Marx as passionately as I pursue every new paragraph of Heine's." (This passage is suspect on other grounds as well. There were no "new" paragraphs by Heine in 1889 for the simple reason that the poet had been dead for more than thirty years at the time Nietzsche was committed.) Incidentally, there are no references to Marx in the philosopher's collected works.

The most questionable aspect of the book, however, is the autobiographical material it presents. According to Nietzsche authorities and his contemporaries, the philosopher led a temperate, modest life except for a tragic experience in his youth. In "My Sister and I" "evidence" is produced for the first time which runs counter to this well-authenticated body of opinion. The author of the "autobiography" traces Nietzsche's sex life from one excess to another, his alleged conquests including Richard Wagner's wife, Cosima, a sadistic

"countess," and a number of women of less repute.

A third count against the authenticity of the book is the fact that it is supposed to have been translated by the eminent German-born scholar, Oscar Levy. If this occurred, according to his daughter, Maud Rosenthal, it is the only work of Nietzsche he ever translated. Since Dr. Levy was the editor of the monumental eighteen-volume English translation of Nietzsche's works published between 1910 and 1927, it seems strange indeed that he did not include the "autobiography" which Samuel Roth, publisher of Boar's Head Books, claims to have turned over to him in 1921 for translation. A host of other questions spring up around the authorship of the translation and the introduction which is also credited to Dr. Levy. Why, for example, did Dr. Levy, who lived in England, use so many Americanisms? Why, to quote Dr. Levy's son-in-law, is there "complete nonexistence of any written or verbal allusion to the work during the twenty-four years in which Dr. Levy is said to have had knowledge of the 'text'?" How could a scholar of Dr. Levy's reputation and vast knowledge commit the simple academic errors which appear throughout the preface? Is it really possible, as the publisher insists, that the original manuscript was lost when John S. Sumner, head of the Society to Maintain Public Decency, raided his office in 1927? If so, where is the manuscript of the translation? Why did Samuel Roth tell this reporter when he was trying to authenticate the translation that Dr. Levy had died a bachelor? If the publisher would produce the translation it could easily be proved whether it was typed, as Mr. Roth claims it was, on Dr. Levy's typewriter (still extant) and whether the spelling of various words was originally British rather than American as they appear in the book.

If these questions could be cleared up and the apparent errors and distortions in "My Sister and I" satisfactorily explained then the book would be, as it has been called by so many critics, one of the most sensational literary discoveries of the last fifty years. On the other hand if they cannot, as this writer firmly believes, then the evidence would seem to indicate that, as Walter A. Kaufmann of Princeton and other Nietzsche scholars insist, a malicious hoax has been perpetrated.

Among many important books to be reviewed in The Nation during coming weeks are Reinhold Niebuhr's "The Irony of American History," to be reviewed by Francis Biddle, and two works by important British writers: Chester Wilmot's "The Struggle for Europe," to be reviewed by H. A. DeWeerd, and D. W. Brogan's "The Price of Revolution," to be reviewed by Philip E. Mosely.

BOOKS and the ARTS

AN UNDISCOVERED LANGUAGE

BY HELEN M. LYND

ONE reason for wanting to be alive five hundred years from now is curiosity about how future generations will appraise the interpretation of human nature which stems from Freud.

No such curiosity disturbs Andrew Salter. He has no doubt of the verdict. He says of his recent attack on psychoanalysis,* which follows his earlier "Conditioned Reflex Therapy": "There is no need to lie or to quote out of context. The truth is preposterous enough, . . . Freud himself provides the evidence that refutes him . . . [the] underlying theories of [psychoanalytic therapy] are not only incredible but . . . unsound, the therapeutic principles derived from them can only . . . serve as guideposts on the road to . . . futility."

The book sets out to show that Freud himself has made such a burlesque of psychoanalysis that attempts by his critics to demonstrate its absurdity are superfluous. It is not difficult to select statements from Freud which can be presented in a ridiculous light. Salter does, nevertheless, find it necessary to suppress counter-evidence and to isolate quotations from context and implication in order to carry through his burlesque. He relies heavily on Robert R. Sears's "Objective Studies of Psychoanalytic Concepts," a survey singularly lacking in imaginative grasp of the materials it deals with, and making use of piecemeal methods as inadequate for appraisal of psychoanalysis as elementary algebra for dealing with quantum physics.

Salter's way of treating evidence appears in his use of the 1940 symposium on "Psychoanalysis as Seen by Analyzed Psychologists." Eight well-known experimental and clinical psychologists all of whom had been analyzed contributed to the discussion. Of these Salter quotes only two, Carney Landis, the one most critical of psychoanalysis, and Edwin G. Boring, who expressed grave doubts about the personal benefits and the scientific value of psychoanalysis. He makes no mention of the other six, all of whom, although they made specific criticisms of method and theory, were in varying degrees favorable to psychoanalysis because of the personal insights they had gained from it and of their belief in its contributions to the science of psychology. Henry A. Murray, for example, says: ". . . Psychoanalysis . . . furnishes—despite its logical fallacies and omissions . . . the best cornerstone for the future development of psychology." Elsie Frankel Brunswick, David Shakow, and the others make similar statements about the importance of psychoanalysis for psychological theory and of the experience of personal analysis for the academic psychologist. All of this Salter ignores.

Similar biased selection and juggling of evidence appears in the use Salter makes of Freud's own writings. He blames Freud severely for saying that all people are alike in suffering from an Oedipus complex, but later he himself makes an equally over-simplified judgment of all people: ". . . in essence Pavlov's conditioned reflex therapy declares that fundamentally everybody has the same problem and the same cure (italics in original)."

His quotation from Freud's "The Question of Lay Analysis"—"Among the causes of and occasions for neurotic complaints sexual factors play an important, an overweening—even perhaps a specific role"—is taken from a section where Freud's main emphasis is on the moral responsibility of observing confidence in analysis because of the intimate nature of the material. He says that "psychoanalysts are of the opinion that the only way to cure patients is to influence them by sexualized suggestion—transference, as they call it," although this contradicts what Freud explicitly said in the passage quoted above and elsewhere about the necessity for the analyst not to introduce "sexual suggestion" and what he has said elsewhere about "transference."

This slippery treatment of evidence is bolstered by invective and vulgarizing figures of speech: the patient lies on the analyst's couch "as in an undertaker's parlor"; "Freud made no fundamental change in his recipe. The psychoanalytic cake remains completely sexual. Only a few scattered raisins of death instinct and aggression have been added." ". . . the psychoanalytic grab bag of conceits has had new booby prizes added to it."

The most significant questions raised by Salter's book, however, do not concern its obvious defects in taste and accuracy; they do not prove anything one way or the other about Freudian theory. Eulogies by ardent pro-Freudians have shown similar lack of discrimination. Furthermore, all misrepresentation aside, there is still the fact that Freud did at times speak of id, ego, and super-ego, of Oedipus complex and death wish, as if they were not figures of speech attempting to describe elusive phenomena, but as if they had a kind of substantial existence established by some equivalent of scientific proof. And it does not need Salter to point out people for whom psychoanalysis has been a failure.

What then? We do dream. We are beset by anxieties, compulsions, and seemingly senseless errors whose source we can not readily trace or control. Our illness and our health appear to contain psychological as well as physical elements. If such "irrational" phenomena are not to make cowards of us all we must seek some way of understanding them. Freud with a wealth of clinical observation attempted to explore this undiscovered country and to establish a continuum between these aberrant aspects of human behavior and "rational" waking life. He developed bold hypotheses to explain what he found and shaped a new vocabulary or extended the meaning of older words to express his theories. It is easy enough to ridicule, as Salter has done, his words, any particular theory or metaphor, or any particular outcome of therapy. But what are we to do with the phenomena Freud attempted to explain? We must either deny that dreams, fantasies, neurotic illness have any meaning in relation to other human experience or attempt to discover what that meaning is.

Two books* by Dr. Marguerite A. Sechehaye, a Swiss psychoanalyst, record such an attempt at discovery. The main difference between Salter's and Sechehaye's approach is not that the one is anti-Freudian, the other pro-Freudian (Dr. Sechehaye is not pro-Freudian in any rigid or orthodox sense); not that the one resorts to misrepresentation to prove a case and the other is a careful descriptive account (there are doubtless errors as there are clearly omissions in Dr. Sechehaye's record). The difference lies in the contrast between thinking that the explanations of "irrational" human experience are easy or self-evident and the recognition that they are incalculably difficult; between thinking that only the more obvious and observably repetitive aspects of human existence are of serious importance and the belief that no human experience however unusual or rooted in the "foul rag-and-bone shop of the heart" is without meaning or can be excluded from the attempt to understand.

"Reality Lost and Regained" is the autobiography of a schizophrenic girl from her first recalled disturbing experience of unreality at the age of five to her resumption of normal life in her late twenties, with an interpretative note by Dr. Sechehaye, who supervised or carried on her treatment from the time she was eighteen. In "Symbolic Realization" Dr. Sechehaye gives a more detailed account of the various methods of therapy attempted during a period of ten years, those which failed and those which finally led to recovery. This book also includes a series of drawings by the patient which portray her systematized fantasies at various stages of her illness.

In one sense there is nothing new in these books. There have been other accounts by a patient of a mind that found itself. Other analysts, Harry Stack Sullivan, Frieda Fromm-Reichmann, Kurt Eissler—not to mention their historical antecedents—have made similar attempts at exploration. They, like Dr. Sechehaye, have shown almost infinite imagination and patience in their attempts to learn the language and to understand the imagery of schizophrenic individuals in order to establish the communication which must be the preliminary to recovery. They have, also, shown the error of the earlier assumption that the schizophrenic is either happy or without feeling, and the difficulty of understanding with each individual the meaning of his particular expression of feeling. But I know of no other records which bring together in the life history of a single person the autobiography of the patient, the drawings which present different stages of the illness, and the account of the analyst of successive efforts to reach communication.

This is by no means to say that these accounts leave nothing to be desired. There is naiveté and stiffness in Dr. Sechehaye's phrasing, which may be due in part to defects in translation. Her use of "symbol" is not clearly enough distinguished from sign, image, and certain types of concrete experience. In some places there are omissions where fullness of detail would be particularly desirable. Dr. Sechehaye's theoretical explanations are not as convincing as her descriptions of what took place.

But the inadequacies do not lessen the importance of attempting to understand what these records represent. From the side of the patient they give a poignantly vivid description of the shifting appearance of the world of unreality which gradually encompassed her: the "illimitable vastness, brilliant light and the gloss and smoothness" as well as the hardness and separateness of material things; the horror of being unable to find ways to communicate the altered sense of space, size, and detail which so frightened her. She relates, too, why certain seemingly slight changes in treatment brought to a full stop her sense of hope of being understood and helped, and why other changes gave her the confidence to try to surmount alienation and find ways to express what she felt. She explains how what appeared to the doctors as delusions were, in some instances, attempts to make less frightening what she could not find words to describe in any other terms which would be understood. It must be remembered that this is the record of a person whose illness would until recently have meant the abandonment of all hope, who had to be forcibly fed, subjected to restraints, and who was for long periods without any means of communication whatever.

Dr. Sechehaye's report on the various methods of treatment which failed (hypnosis, Freudian methods, and adaptations of Freudian methods) show that trained analytic skill, patience, love, and consistent efforts at understanding may not in themselves be adequate to the treatment of severe mental illness. For six years she tried all of these in various combinations and failed, failed sometimes after much progress had been made because she did not interpret correctly a cue from the patient, or because she did not take sufficiently into account the patient's hypersensitivity to any hidden, unspoken mood of the doctor. It was only when she had learned the language of her patient (including the special meaning to her of certain gestures, colors, tastes, and objects) that she could find ways of translating her skill and patience and love into ways of communication which would reach the schizophrenic. This was a learning process for the doctor. Only after this process had been mastered so that she could enter into the total world of this particular patient was there the confidence and interchange which made it possible for her to begin to bring her patient back to the language of "reality."

Specialists in the treatment of serious mental disorders will appraise this account in terms of its technical value to them. For others, psychotherapists dealing with milder difficulties, teachers; and parents, its chief value lies in what it suggests about the art of communication in the broadest sense. The schizophrenic forces upon the analyst the need to learn a new language; if he is to communicate at all the more conventional and less discriminating rubrics will not serve. Although analysts may appear to get by without this effort in dealing with less disturbed individuals, it is coming to be more recognized that comparable although less dramatic diversity is present in the linguistic expression and emotional life of all persons. The patience and imagination which Sechehaye and Fromm-Reichmann use with schizophrenics need not be confined to treatment of the most severe disorders. As analysts are able to use similar methods with neurotics their treatment may give less basis for the complaints of Salter and others of fitting each patient into the mold of a particular analytic school, and the results may show as marked improvement as there has been in the treatment of more severe illness.

In much the same way education of normal children has often benefited from methods first developed with the ill or retarded; and teachers still have much to learn from such accounts as Dr. Sechehaye's. Would the aims of education and child rearing be more fully realized if more imaginative effort were used in learning the language of the individual child (not just the language which Freudian or any other theory assumed in advance that he has) before teaching him the language of the adult or of the assumed child world? Such studies as Jean Piaget's and Ernest Schachtel's "Memory and Childhood Amnesia" suggest that this may be the case, and that all the recent emphasis on seeing the world through the eyes of the child still fails to take full account of the possibilities. Stress on learning the language of individuals does not contradict Sullivan's statement that we are all more simply human than we are diverse. But it does suggest that we may have prematurely classified differences, and that we are currently at a stage where inductive study is once again needed. Only after we have learned how to become at home in the world of a particular child, a particular schizophrenic, a particular neurotic can we begin once more the search for common human elements.

The question of finding ways of testing Freud's hypotheses still remains. It cannot be solved by viewing them wholly from the outside as Sears and Salter do, nor wholly from the inside as some Freudians have done. It is no criticism of Freud's theories that he himself changed and criticized them and that later workers have continued to do so. Any future appraisal of Freud and his work must give full weight to such records as Dr. Sechehaye's. There is a world and a language which lies outside the range of rational adult life, and the exploration of the meaning of this language is no insignificant part of the human endeavor.

World Government

HOW TO CO-EXIST WITHOUT PLAYING THE KREMLIN'S GAME. By James P. Warburg. The Beacon Press. $3.

IN AN up-to-date and pungent analysis of the perilous state of world affairs Mr. Warburg has pointed out what he regards as the strong and weak points of American foreign policy and urges his fellow-citizens to do something, or various things, about it. His comments and criticisms are often penetrating, and in speaking out he is performing a patriotic duty. Certainly, American foreign policy, if it is to receive widespread support among democratic allies, must be, basically, a coalition policy. Undoubtedly, racial discriminations are a tragic anachronism in America, and abroad they make millions of enemies for this country. Granted, American foreign policy cannot rest (when has it?) solely on military power, but must make plain, for people everywhere to see, that it seeks to promote self-advancement and freedom through economic and political cooperation. Admittedly, the claim of America to stand for intellectual freedom is ominously weakened when admission is denied to scholars and artists, as well as less gifted persons, on grounds which remain undisclosed and hence unchallengeable by common sense.

Even if these and numerous other correctives to a strong tendency toward national self-righteousness (called "hypocrisy" by friends as well as enemies) be accepted and taken to heart, the question still remains whether Mr. Warburg is advocating a consistent foreign policy. It is clear that he disapproves, at least mildly, the Uniting for Peace resolution, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1950, and feels that its critics are justified in regarding it as "illegal," even though he considers the United Nations a political device rather than a rule based on law. On the other hand, the United States is at fault also, he feels, in not having worked harder to strengthen the United Nations between 1945 and 1948. Apparently, the United States was at fault when it tried to work within the original concept of great-power dominance within the United Nations, and it is again at fault when it strives to make the United Nations more than a bureau for registering Soviet vetoes of actions approved by a large majority of its members.

Mr. Warburg is convinced that in 1945 it was possible, by American fiat or American force, to create "an authority superior to the nations—an authority created by all the world's peoples in order to outlaw force or the threat of force as a means of settling disputes between national governments, and in order to remove the instruments of force from the reach of any national government." And he believes that even today such an initiative would win the support of all except the Soviet and Soviet-controlled governments.

Just when Mr. Warburg's position seemed clear, though too optimistic and too much inclined to believe in a universal acquiescence in a Pax Americana, this reviewer was surprised to see a warning finger raised. Suddenly he read that "we shall never succeed in transforming the United Nations into an effective world organization, if we yield to the admittedly great and understandable temptation to renounce the principle of universality and to convert the United Nations into an anti-Soviet coalition." However it is read, this argument appears to assume that a world government (not of the Soviet type) can be established with the active cooperation of the Soviet government. Perhaps Mr. Warburg has some private evidence that the Soviet leadership may wish to destroy itself in this manner; without it, the assumption seems farfetched.

Mr. Warburg assumes that the Soviet government maintains an iron curtain through "fear of espionage and sabotage; fear of discontent, if the Russian people were allowed to compare their living standards and conditions with those prevalent in free societies; and fear that a free flow of information might expose the errors of the Kremlin and undermine the doctrine of Kremlin infallibility." These are motives which might guide any old-fashioned, slipshod, authoritarian regime. The Soviet leadership, however, feels a positive duty, not merely to exclude undesired influences, but actively to mold, direct, and exploit to the maximum the psychological or spiritual resources, which it has appropriated or "monopolized," of its subjects. It is hard to see how Mr. Warburg can expect leaders who have risen to vast power under such a system to accept and implement his proposals for establishing a universal world government based upon free consent freely given and renewed.

NEW WORLD WRITING. First Mentor Selection. New American Library. Fifty cents.

ONE of the great cultural paradoxes of our time is the increasing isolation of American writers in the midst of the largest potential audience any writers have ever had. The powerlessness of the literary intellectual, his awareness that he can no longer assume a stable audience to which he may address himself, although the mass audience for the subliterate products of mass culture is constantly growing—these have impelled critics to a number of wrongheaded conclusions.

We have had serious artists condemned for being out of step with "the masses"—whether because they would not write patriotic tracts, or proletarian novels, or kitsch—and on the other hand we have had the avant garde exhorted to stand fast against the advance of the comic-book barbarians, who attack to the sound of singing commercials. But there have been almost no thoughtful attempts, with a few honorable exceptions such as the books of Gilbert Seldes, to bridge the widening gap between serious art and popular culture. Wherefore we have cause to be grateful to the New American Library for the initiative and resourcefulness it has displayed in extending its hospitality—and its publishing and merchandising resources—to novelists, critics, poets, and short-story writers, in the manner of the British Penguin New Writing series.

"New World Writing," however, is more than merely another little magazine, if only because of its circulation as a Mentor Book, which will place it within reach of many thousands of Americans who might otherwise never have the opportunity to discover the younger writers. The sheer quantity and variety, furthermore, are closer to an anthology of current writing, or a "bazaar" as the editors call it, than to a periodical which is more restricted both in space and in range of interests.

Naturally with such variety there are bound to be corresponding extremes of quality; but among the essays, for example, Charles J. Rolo's glib and superficial revelations about Simenon and Spillane, and Oliver Evans's earnest and stuffy treatment of Carson McCuller are more than balanced by such excellent pieces as a chapter on Negro writers (although it oddly omits mention of James Baldwin and Ralph Ellison) from Alain Locke's forthcoming "The Negro in American Culture" and a well-illustrated and intriguing analysis of "The Buildings We See" by Henry Russell Hitchcock and Philip C. Johnson.

The poetry, carefully chosen so as not to overwhelm or frighten the casual reader, ranges from the cerebral to the lyrical, and presents several younger poets, in addition to Merton, Nemerov, Brinnin, Frankenburg, and Moss.

But it is the fiction that raises the most interesting questions about the nature and function of a pioneering enterprise like "New World Writing." There is an international flavor which is all to the good: French and Italian novelists are represented in translation, besides a fine cross-section of Americans, and there is surely reason to hope that future issues will bring us samples of the work of the younger English and German prose writers. There is also, however, a flavor of the excerpt yanked from its context, of the chapter from a longer work rushed into print for reasons other than its intrinsic interest as a self-contained aesthetic statement.

One reads the fourteen fiction pieces and observes that six of them are excerpts from novels (this does not include the non-fiction pieces also taken from larger works), and one wonders whether this indicates a resurgence of the attraction of the novel for young writers and a corresponding weakening of the appeal of the story form, even when writers are invited to display their wares in a perishable soft-cover periodical. Of course there are valid reasons for both editors and contributors to publish excerpts of works in progress—it has become a standard practice in the quarterlies, where chapters of novels are often the only fiction presented; but one feels bound to note that when half a dozen sections from novels are included in one volume, there is inevitably an effect of scrappiness. Certainly the most satisfying work of fiction in this volume is a remarkable long short story, Faces of Hatred and of Love, by the brilliant young Frenchman, Jean-Baptiste Rossi.

At any rate it seems apparent that he editors of "New World Writing" are receptive to writers who have few outlets for their serious work, and one can hope that this receptivity will encourage new writers to be faithful to themselves, and to grasp the opportunity to be free of the restrictions of length and style imposed by other large-circulation magazines. One of the most praiseworthy aspects of this exciting new venture is the modesty and straightforwardness with which Arabel J. Porter and the other editors have gone about their task: they neither condescend to their readers nor patronize their writers.

My major complaint is that my copy of "New World Writing" fell apart before I finished one reading, and while you can't have everything for fifty cents, perhaps the publishers will be able to devise some way for the book to hold together for the thousands of readers who may, one hopes, accept it with even more seriousness than those who were farsighted enough to offer it to them. If the public's reception makes possible the regular publication of this literary book-magazine, perhaps other paperback publishers will be encouraged to follow suit. In that case this little book may turn out to have been an important first step in breaking down the barriers separating writers from a large reading public that deserves so much better than it has been getting, and that has already demonstrated its willingness to accept the best—if it is made available.

Derelict Youth

WHO WALK IN DARKNESS. By Chandler Brossard. New Directions. $2.75.

THE young and lost have always had a peculiar fascination for American readers. It's almost as if our writers endowed us, as a people, with the immaturity, the misplaced sensitivity (so close to megalomania), the inability to focus on problems requiring adult responsibility, which characterize the enfant terrible.

Starting with World War I, our "young and lost" have always been of age, or well past it. The little lost boy in the adult male, the fragile girl-wife, these and the familiar galaxy of unregenerate, overage children who peopled the literary scene of the twenties, have chiefly occupied our writers until now (with a parenthesis for the proletarian novel and a no less valid one for the novel of war experience). Only now, after World War II, when slews of legal infants (under eighteen) are so visibly, palpably lost, have the new writers begun to train their sights not on the immature adult but on the rootless young.

This derelict youth, buffeted by every wind and unstable as soot, has been good copy since delinquency hit the front page, and lately we have had a spate of novels which, by implication, place the responsibility largely where Cocteau placed it a generation ago, on the parents terribles. Two that have packed a punch are "Flee the Angry Strangers" and "Who Walk in Darkness." The former, though the stronger, better constructed, and more absorbing, is so highly specialized in the problem it treats (drug addiction in an adolescent girl) that it somehow misses the wide target. Brossard's book, instead, hits straight to the center. A sense of waste, of betrayal, of unfocused, almost footless rebellion marks each of the principal characters.

The novel deals with a group of casual yet close acquaintances who drift from job to job or, jobless, consider which is the better choice, to continue on unemployment insurance or to find some uninvolved work, like hotel clerking, the better to preserve their intellectual integrity.

The protagonist—at least, the most irritating character—one Henry Porter, is a heel who has the unattractive habits of slickness and opportunism which permit him to get on at some minor literary activity (never specified) apparently without moral qualms. There is Porter's girl, Grace, a finely drawn Italo-American whose love for and dedication to Porter are his redeeming features (he can't be all bad so long as Grace sticks with him, and conversely he becomes all bad when at last Grace drops him, losing first, painfully, her ability to find him important). Then there is Harry, a young New Englander whose fastidious reaction to the phony Porter is one of the few authentically funny things in the book. Harry convincingly portrays the quite bright but distressed young man who goes through life apologizing for having been born solvent. There are, too, Max Glazer, ubiquitous sponger; the narrator, Blake, who falls heir to Grace (and who reminds me of no one so much as of O'Neill's Good Old Charlie); the two models, Gloria and Margaret. And, briefly, there is the world of the big fights (Brossard, having got "Who Walk" out of his system, should, please do some more work on the fighths: they too are part of the current show and on them he is all good).

Brossard's group of young people ends by being, and I think it was his intention that they be, damn dull company. Though the narration, and at times even the dialogue, are flawed and clumsy, the world he recreates pulses with a true beat. What it adds up to is that self-absorption has taken the place of self-reliance, either intellectual or moral. Impotence to love or let love, to create or appreciate, has robbed these token citizens of the juice of life. Loneliness hag-rides them into pleasureless association with one another and even their rebellion seems fruitless, as they have never stopped to define what they are rebelling against or to what end they erect their barricades.

FRANCES KEENE

Books in Brief

ALEXANDER POPE: CATHOLIC POET. By Francis Beauchesne Thornton. Pellegrini and Cudahy. $4.75. Pope's adherence to the faith of his parents was a notorious disadvantage in his own day, the early eighteenth century, when in England legal sanctions were enforced against religious minorities. In this book Mr. Thornton gives a full treatment to the poet's life and writings, attempting to wring out of them every possible drop of evidence that will show not only Pope's nominal status as a Catholic but also the devout piety that pervaded his life as well as his writings. To be reminded of Pope's religion is useful in dealing with his personality and poetry, for its influence is often overlooked; but it will seem to many that here the thesis is driven far beyond its reasonable limits. In the intellectual circles where Pope rotated, as his letters to non-Catholic friends show, dogma and faith were not taken very seriously. His most extensive treatment of religion is his "Essay on Man"; and when we consider that the poem's strongest personal stimulant was Bolingbroke, a deist, and its chief defender was Warburton, a Church of England clergyman, we get some idea of the protean character of Pope's mind in this matter. Like his "Essay on Criticism" it is a statement of many philosophical and religious currents in the atmosphere of his day; Pope's main contribution to them was to say "what oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed."

NEW DIRECTIONS 13. Edited by James Laughlin. New Directions. $5. If the contents of this anthology point to the new directions that writers are taking today, then they are knocking themselves out standing still. The best prose pieces here are conventional ones that might have been written when our grandmothers were alive—those of De Lanux, Creeley, Kerner, and Paulhan, for example. And when a new direction is actually tried, it usually turns out to be a dead end; Maude Hutchins's short play is killed by cuteness, May Swenson's story by sheer ponderosity. The poetry is more varied and more interesting, much of it sparked by metaphysical wit. And of the essays Harold Guinzburg's reprinted piece on the publishing business is good common sense, Mr. Laughlin's introduction is, as usual, full of sound and fury, and J. B. Pick's meditation giving the average Englishman's thoughts about the present war crisis is eloquently and sweetly reasonable.

A LAND. By Jacquetta Hawkes. Random House. $3.75. This original and often stimulating book oddly combines reverie with scientific fact, mystical speculations with geological data. The author, wife of an Oxford professor of archaeology and with considerable scientific experience of her own, believes like Mary Austin that the land influences the spirit of a people and also, more curiously, that they influence it. To her geologists and archaeologists are "engaged in reawakening the memory of the world." Historical personages, Newton for example, are fossils whose age could be determined by the strata in which they are found and the work of Proust is related to that of the geologists because both have something to do with the fact that "we are returning to an awareness of our unity with our surroundings, but an awareness of a much more exalted kind than anything which has existed before." The industrial revolution violently reversed an old process by removing man from the context of nature to that of the machine but it is still possible that we may find our way back. The publishers compare "The Land" with the vastly popular "The Sea Around Us" and the comparison is not too inapt though the emphasis in the one book is the reverse of that in the other. Miss Carsen presents facts with a mystical overtone. Mrs. Hawkes presents many facts but they are used chiefly to support her often elusive but often stimulating speculations.

THE WORLD OF GEORGE JEAN NATHAN. Selected and Edited with an Introduction by Charles Angoff. Knopf. $5. This is an anthology of nearly five hundred pages drawn from Mr. Nathan's thirty-nine books and published for his seventieth birthday. Besides criticism of the drama there are substantial selections from his essays on women, bachelorhood, etc.; reminiscences of Mencken, Dreiser, Sinclair Lewis, Eugene O'Neill and others; together with assorted pensées such as "Criticism is the art of appraising others at one's own value" and "I drink to make other people interesting." Those who think of the author as playboy and show-off will be surprised at the seriousness and solidity of much that he has to say. He learned his manner and assumed his more superficial attitudes in the teens of this century but he has survived as most of his contemporaries have not because his knowledge and his intelligence are genuine and impressive. Despite bad-boy flourishes he seems to have read everything even remotely connected with the drama and he remembers most of it. Despite characteristic stunts like enumerating which plays with dogs in them have failed and which have succeeded he can also quietly marshal opinions from Dryden to Shaw on any important question. Partly because he has scorned to follow changing fashions he will probably last a good deal longer than younger commentators who seem at the moment so much more serious.

DRYDEN: POETRY, PROSE AND PLAYS. Selected by Douglas Grant. The Reynard Library. Harvard. $4.25. This latest edition to the series of "compendious books" is more than usually welcome since neither the complete works of Dryden nor any other really representative collection of his prose nd verse is currently available—an astonishing fact when one considers how its virtues have been celebrated in recent years by Eliot and his disciples. The editor contributes a sound sensible introduction which Dryden himself would have approved and gives substantial representation to all the principal kinds of writing Dryden did. Nearly nine hundred pages from one of the best writers of the English language is good money's worth.

CHIVERS' LIFE OF POE. Edited with an Introduction by Richard Beale Davis. Dutton. $5. Since the days of Woodberry Poe students have made some use of the material left by Chivers but this is the first publication of all the most significant parts of it from the MS now in the Huntington Library. Chivers was a bad but enthusiastic poet who liked to believe that he had influenced Poe's style and the relations between the two were not always perfectly amiable. He was, nevertheless, an ardent champion after Poe's death and his reminiscences are of real value to the student as well as of some curious interest even to the casual reader who will find in Chivers's exalted and exclamatory style some of the charm of the what-not and antimacassar. The editor has written a sound informative introduction and provided elaborate annotation. For a book of one hundred and twenty-five pages the price seems a bit steep.

THE WILD WHEEL. By Garet Garrett. Pantheon. $2.75. An odd and interesting book on Henry Ford, "the extreme and last pure event" in the history of free private enterprise. "A divine mechanic," Garrett calls him, "who thought with his hands; the ultimate child of his era, acting upon his world with ruthless and terrible energy by instinct and intuition." A helter-skelter book, repetitious and disorganized, but with flashes of insight and passages of first-hand observation that cut deep into the Ford mystery.

THE SNIPER—the story of a sweet-faced laundry driver who compulsively murders pretty brunettes because "someone did something mean to him when he was a kid"—is a smooth, technically astute, 100 per cent dull melodrama. It was made by a progressive producer, Stanley Kramer, whose films often fight prejudice with all the usual antiquated prejudices. For example, he has gone to unusual lengths to build sympathy for the underdogs of society—the oppressed Negro, mother-fixated tenement kid, or paraplegic—while sniping at publishers, business men, government officials, etc. Here, he has cast the role of a sex offender with an actor (Edward Franz) whose nice manners and muffled personality make him appear to be the movie's most wholesome American. The only thing interesting about the figure is that he is so unlikely as a "maniac." He has a neat way with guns, cars, baseballs, and laundry deliveries. When he spots a likely victim, he picks himself out a rooftop, calmly removes a telescopic carbine from a briefcase, efficiently puts it together, and puts one bullet cleanly through the girl's temple. Then he goes home, locks the carbine in the top bureau drawer, and writes a note to the police begging them to capture him ("Stop me—Find me and stop me—I'm going to do it again."). Aside from the fact that Franz is an expert driver and takes his laundry truck into picturesque San Francisco locales, his behavior is pretty colorless in a movie where the more normal citizens knock themselves out acting angry, cocky, pompous, or mean.

Though Kramer never tires of exposing ugliness in society, his movies are peculiar for an absurdly well-organized look: they move well, have a laundered kind of slate-toned photography, and never get tangled up in any event. It is typical of his Business Machine style that when the boy is finally spotted by a painter working a block away on the top of a factory chimney, the kid brings him down with a single bullet (the body slides down so photogenically on a pulley contraption that it must have been engineered by a Phi Beta Kappa in movie stunt shots). Another interesting example of Kramer's efficiency is the way his females act when the bullets hit them. They go into a cyclonic version of Leon Errol's rubber-legged walk before smashing into a brick wall or table; this is a difficult thing to do, but it is managed with fascinating skill by otherwise wooden females. Finally, there are the scenes between aroused civic leaders and police officials, in which "liberal" and "anti-social" remarks turn up with perfect timing and placement. A newspaper publisher, played by a stock Republican type, says some asinine thing ("We want this fellow caught, and punished, punished, punished."), and is immediately put in his place with a remark that sounds like it hurried in from a Barry Gray disc-jockey show ("Your paper slants the news, exploits killings."). Because of his spic-'n-span technique and the predictable left-wing slanting of characterization, "The Sniper" is a movie that you'll have to fight to enjoy.

"The Pride of St. Louis," another ultra-civic-minded work manages to kill the idea of baseball as the national pastime. The script-writer (H. Mankiewicz) decided that Dizzy Dean is a democratic Ozark peasant, more important for his clean habits and civic behavior than for his fast ball. He has confined the movie to shots of Dizzy (Dan Dailey) glad-handing customers and developing, via talk, into a good citizen, while his career is described by radio announcers and newspaper headlines. When the movie occasionally gets around to baseball, it shows Dailey doing a hammed-up burlesque of pitching—so intricate that he doesn't seem to be throwing the ball. Odd note: Dailey, in certain profile shots with his hair dry and bushy, looks a bit like Dean's old-time rival, Carl Hubbell.

THIS comment on Roger Sessions's "The Musical Experience of Composer, Performer, Listener" (Princeton, $2.50) is late because the book (originally a series of lectures at the Juilliard School) was to have been reviewed by a composer, performer, and listener who after many months reported himself unable to produce a review. And I could understand why when I came to read the book myself: the writing is diffusely unprecise and unordered, which means that reading for continuous sense one has great difficulty in getting hold of the thought for reporting and comment.

Mr. Sessions begins with the psycho-physiological basis of musical feeling, expression, and communication—the fact, for example, that a melodic motif or phrase, which "is in essence and origin a vocal gesture . . . a vocal movement with a clearly defined . . . profile," is "sensitive to infinitely delicate nuances of tension and relaxation, as these are embodied in the breathing which animates the vocal gesture and shapes its contours"—an instance of this being the "sharp, irregular accents, or successive violent contrasts in pitch" which "call forth subconscious associations suggesting the kind of agitation which produces violent or irregular breathing." I understand Mr. Sessions to contend that awareness of this basis is necessary for the composer, the performer, the listener, and the reader of a book about all three; but to me it seems no more necessary than the awareness of what anthropologists have established as the basis of linguistic communication is necessary for the writing or reading or discussion of poetry. One can accept as fact the operation called language, and begin with its use in a poem; and one can, I think, similarly accept the operation called musical communication, and begin with what is done in or with a piece of music. And Mr. Sessions himself goes on, in subsequent chapters, to talk about the external manifestations of the operation of the composer's or performer's mind in the music or performance, without relating them back to their internal basis in conditions of his body.

It is in these later chapters, when Mr. Sessions's mind is engaged with actual music, that he produces the valuable material of his book. When, for example, he points out that a musical idea, "the starting point of a vital musical 'train of thought,' can be virtually anything which strikes a composer's imagination"—not only a theme, a motif, but a chord, a sonority, a rhythmic figure, a relation between two harmonies or keys. Above all when he illustrates this by showing in quoted passages of music what the composer's mind works with and what it does with this material. (To have Mr. Sessions seated at a piano with a score in which he points out the course of events in the music should be an illuminating experience.) And so when he discusses performance, and says that the composer indicates in his score how the outlines of the music embodying its movement or gesture can best be made clear by the performer, whose playing must reveal his understanding of the music "in terms of its articulation, its contours, and its proportions" (he must play "not so much notes as motifs, phrases, periods, sections . . . rhythmic groups") and his awareness also of "the melodic and harmonic values."

In an ordered progression the next step would be to discuss the listener's apprehension of the course of events indicated in the score and made explicit in the performance. But Mr. Sessions begins his chapter on the listener by describing derisively the enormous number and variety of books, courses, and radio programs—including some that would appear to perform a useful function—which undertake to "prepare the listener fully for the strenuous task of listening to music." Why all this unnecessary concern about the listener, asks Mr. Sessions. And his explanation is that the musical public has increased to the point where entrepreneurs and musicians ("I am of course speaking of performances rather than compositions") are involved in large-scale business enterprise as producers for a mass consumer; that the producers must therefore consider their buyers' tastes, must persuade them to buy their goods, and must "do everything possible to enhance the value of the goods sold"—which, in logical connection with what has led up to it in the sequence of thought, can mean only that the courses and books are the performance industry's means of "selling" its products to the public. Mr. Sessions himself doesn't explicitly state this implied meaning of the conclusion of the sequence in logical connection with its beginning, doesn't think back to the courses and books after they have enabled him to talk about music as big business—logical connection, in this sequence, being only a means of bringing in one thing after another that he wants to get off his chest. And the next such thing is that in the situation in which the listener is only a consumer, the musician is "no longer a cultural citizen, one of the cultural assets of the community with purely cultural responsibilities, but . . . a cog in the economic machine," with the responsibility of producing what consumer demand makes economically profitable.

In most of this I recognize one of the schematic ideas with which the late Artur Schnabel held his disciples spell-bound and persuaded them that he was one of the great minds of the century. And if I am less impressed it isn't because I am unaware of the situation today, but because I am aware that it is only one variant of the situation at all times—because I recall, for example, that the eighteenth-century musician produced for the eighteenth-century consumer what that not always enlightened consumer demanded, and was treated not as a cultural citizen and asset of the community but as a cog in the eighteenth-century musico-economic machine—that is, wore the consumer's livery and ate at his servants' table. For the rest, Mr. Sessions, as I understand him, notes the many courses and books which represent a concern with the large musical public; notes that the performance industry has a concern with the large musical public; and derives from the two observations the idea that the courses and books represent the performance industry's concern with the public—whereas actually, I need hardly point out, they represent the various concerns of schools, colleges, writers, and publishers with the public, and serve the performance industry's interest only incidentally. It appears that when Mr. Session's eye is not on the course of events in a piece of music he operates as an angry man with a muddled mind.

The muddled mind also contrives the pretexts first for having dragged in this irrelevant material and then for getting away from it and back to what the book is concerned with. If we are to understand the listener, says Mr. Sessions, "we must see him . . . not as an abstraction but as an existing and concrete figure in our musical society"—which is not the way we have had to understand the composer, and not really the way we have to understand the listener, in this book. "But it is not mainly in his role of consumer that I wish to speak of the listener. The question for us is rather his own experience of music"—which in fact is the only question in this book.

RECORD NOTES

BY ROBERT E. GARIS

Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 1; Gulda with Vienna Philharmonic under Böhm (London); Gulda for the most part first-rate, orchestra quite poor; recording badly muffled and blurred; noisy surfaces.

Piano Concerto No. 4; Backhaus with Vienna Philharmonic under Krauss (London); Backhaus fair in first two movements, brutal in the last, orchestra throughout undistinguished; piano tone muffled, and occasionally blurred.

Serenade for flute, violin, and viola, Op. 25; Baker, Joseph and Lilian Fuchs (Decca); superb performance.

String Trio, Op. 9, No. 3; Joseph, Lilian, and Harry Fuchs (Decca); superb performance.

Brahms: Alto Rhapsody; Anderson with RCA Victor Symphony and Robert Shaw Chorale under Reiner (Victor); good performance apart from Anderson's current tremolo.

Double Concerto; Milstein and Piatigorsky with the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra under Reiner (Victor); fair performance.

Symphony No. 2; Furtwängler with London Philharmonic (London); performance spiritless and slack; recording very muffled, noisy surfaces.

Symphony No. 3; Szell with Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam (London); excellent performance; recording a bit muffled, swish in the third movement.

Symphony No. 4; Walter with the N. Y. Philharmonic (Columbia); good performance, in Walter's familiar relaxed style.

Chopin: Recital by Maryla Jonas (Columbia); familiar waltzes, etudes, and the Berceuse; second class performance in the conventionally mannered style.

Dvorak: "New World" Symphony; Kubelik with the Chicago Symphony (Mercury); good performance, noisy surfaces.

Franck: Symphonic Variations; Brailowsky with the RCA Victor Symphony under Morel (Victor); effective performance in the virtuosic manner.

Handel: Sonatas for violin, Nos. 13, 14, 15; Elman and Rosé (Victor); Elman's performance vulgar almost beyond belief, Rosé undistinguished.

Liszt: Todtentanz; Brailowsky with

RCA Victor Symphony under Reiner (Victor); effective performance.

Mahler: Kindertotenlieder; Anderson with San Francisco Symphony under Monteux (Victor); sumptuous performance, a bit heavy compared with the Ferrier-Walter recording.

Schumann: "Spring" Symphony; Münch with Boston Symphony (Victor); fine performance; recording occasionally blurred.

Strauss: Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme; Strauss with the Berlin State Opera Orchestra (Decca); heavily light music; fine performance; acceptable dubbing of a very old recording.

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 4; Kubelik with the Chicago Symphony (Mercury); excellent performance except for an occasional loss of pace in soft passages; noisy surfaces.

Weber: Overtures to "Oberon," "Euryanthe," "Preciosa," and "Peter Schmolli und seine Nachbarn"; Böhm with Vienna Philharmonic (London); the unfamiliar pieces are pleasantly inconsequential; good performance.

Is Hiss a "Liberal"?

Dear Sirs: A typographical mix-up in the first paragraph of my review of Whittaker Chambers's "Witness" may lead to misunderstanding. In a context suggesting Alger Hiss, I referred to "a liberal who was recruited from the idealistic wing of public service." The surrounding quote marks that should qualify the word "liberal" were unfortunately omitted; as the review itself makes clear, I do not believe nor could I say that Hiss is, or was, a liberal. One of the few things on which I agree with Chambers is his political characterization of Hiss.

We Blush for America

- ▶ For these headlines from the May 15 issue of New York papers.
- ▶ We recall from school-day study of the Declaration of Independence:
- ▶ Men gathered to set down on paper the stirring call that was to lead them on the road to freedom, writing, "When in the Course of human events..." etc., etc., etc., "A DECENT RESPECT TO THE OPINIONS OF MANKIND REQUIRED..." etc., etc.
- ▶ In the support of their Declaration they pledged "each other our Lives, our Fortunes and our sacred Honor."
- ▶ Decent respect to opinions of mankind... sacred honor.
- ▶ In 1776, a little band of brave men without atom or napalm bombs, with only the muskets they held in their hands, could pledge their honor to a cause which they laid before the world to inspect.
- ▶ Today, a mighty nation, self-appointed leader of the "free" throughout the world, armed with the most frightful weapons, careless of honor, callous to the opinions of others, we repudiate the written pledge of a general of our army made to a group of prisoners of war.
- ▶ We blush for America—for to what heights have we risen that we can fall so low? What priceless treasure, what precious secret, did these concessions hold that we stoop to such indignity?
- ▶ We remember that one of the grievances detailed in the Declaration said: "He (King George) has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power."
- ▶ We blush for America, but we fear for our children that billions poured into war machines may once again raise the military to heights of power beyond the control of civil authority.
- ▶ War, not peace, is the use for which armies are fashioned, but peace, not war, is in the hearts and yearning of those of us who still hold honor high and desire the decent respect of the opinions of mankind.

A Report on the Nation Associates Conference

AROUND THE U. S. A.

Berkeley's Example

Berkeley, California

DENIED the use of a public auditorium in San Francisco and Oakland, the Negro Labor Council, seeking a hall for a Paul Robeson concert, requested the Berkeley Board of Education for permission to use the magnificent new Berkeley Community Theater. On May 6 the board met to vote on the request. Mrs. Eileen Ready, chairman, and member A. K. Sackett voted "no" on the ground that to permit the noted singer to appear in the school auditorium would be "giving support to communism which we are fighting in Korea." But three members of the board voted "yes": Mayor Laurence L. Cross, who is also minister of a local community church; Mrs. Mildred Brown, and David P. Smith, active Republican, who laid down the sole condition—which the Negro Labor Council was glad to meet—that no political speeches be made at the concert.

The majority vote in favor of permitting Robeson to appear created a city-wide furor. Hundreds of letters supporting the majority decision were sent to board members and to the press; on the other hand, veterans' and other patriotic organizations publicly attacked the three who had voted favorably. J. Frank Coakley, district attorney of Alameda County, warned: "If Mr. Robeson were to appear in a public school building, it is possible that a disturbance might occur that would result in injury to persons and damage to property for which your school district and the city of Berkeley would be liable." But Mayor Cross replied that he had full confidence in the ability of the Berkeley police to maintain order, and Police Chief John Holstrom added that his men would carry out their responsibility to "maintain public peace and prevent injury."

In response to pressure, Mrs. Ready, as chairman of the board, called a special open meeting for May 10 to review the case. More than 1,200 Berkeley citizens crowded into the board chamber to participate in the proceedings.

The first item on the agenda was the reading of a letter from the district attorney which said, in part: "Your board could reconsider the matter and rescind

Tuesday night's action whereby the application was granted. . . . It is common knowledge that Mr. Robeson has made certain inflammatory and highly provocative remarks and that his appearance in other parts of the country have precipitated riots and disturbances of the peace."

Members of the board then made public statements explaining their position. It was clear that no member had as yet changed his mind. Mayor Cross commented forcefully on the district attorney's letter. "I consider this letter as one which is inciting to riot. I have full confidence in the ability of the police to maintain order. Paul Robeson appeared in a concert in San Francisco only a few months after the Peekskill [New York] trouble and there was less disturbance than there would be at a Presbyterian prayer meeting."

David P. Smith asked the audience to indicate by show of hands how they stood on the majority decision to grant Robeson the hall. The vote was at least four-to-one in favor. Smith then said:

I am concerned over the spread of communism, but I do not believe we can stop it by such action as those of you in the opposition would have us take. Since World War II 600,000,000 people have been won over by the Communists without the Red Army having fired a single shot. There are still hundreds of millions wavering. . . . We cannot win this fight by guns or bullets. . . .

Why then are the Russians winning this battle for the hearts and minds of people? One of the major factors is that although we preach freedom regardless of race, color, or creed, unfortunately we do not always practice it. . . . If we turn down this noted singer, the action would be proof to the people of India and Indo-China, even to minority groups here, that Paul Robeson was denied a place to sing because he is a Negro. I beseech you . . . to prove to the world by example that democracy does work.

After the board members completed their statements, comment was invited from the audience. About fifty people spoke, most of them in support of the board majority. Several veterans—both Negro and white—read petitions signed by fellow-veterans urging the board to stand by its decision. One veteran stressed that "to allow free expression of ideas in a building dedicated to the memory of our war dead would indicate that their deaths in fighting for the principles of democracy were not in vain."

A school teacher declared: "Robeson has a special place in the cultural life of this nation. As a high school student I heard recordings of his Shakespearean roles. I checked our library shelves the other day and found three books written about him. If we deny him the chance to be heard, isn't it only a short step toward removing his recordings from the library shelves and finally toward burning books. . . ?"

A minister thus summed up the danger involved in excluding Robeson:

To my mind the real threat to democracy lies not in the ideas which Robeson may have, but in the use of the fear of communism as a justification for the undermining of all the constitutional safeguards of individual rights. It was precisely this supposed danger from Communists first, and other minorities later, which the Nazis used to silence all opposition while they hacked away at the very foundations of government in Germany.

The reason I deplore the type of argument used in the district attorney's letter is that it says in effect: our democratic processes are not strong enough to withstand the threat of force and violence—hence we must abandon them in favor of the use of force and violence ourselves. . . .

The meeting adjourned at midnight with the board's majority vote in favor of permitting Robeson to sing standing unchanged. On May 23 Mr. Robeson appeared, as scheduled, before a capacity audience. There was no trouble.

Strange Inconsistencies

One of the most disturbing things about the signing of the two European treaties last week was the absence of any important reaction in the United States. The West German peace contract and the European Army agreement, between them, committed this country to the defense of a frontier on the Elbe River. They have committed us to military expenditures of proportions impossible to estimate over an indefinite future. Perhaps the country has weighed these commitments soberly and concluded that it has no choice but to accept them; their early ratification by Congress, without important debate or partisan division, seemed assured as the week began. But if that is the case, there are strange inconsistencies in the picture, chief among them the lopping off by Senate and House of a billion dollars or so from the Administration's foreign-aid measure—a procedure totally incongruous with the agreements signed at Bonn and Paris.

It is our view that the people of the United States have neither understood nor consciously prepared themselves for the policy these fateful acts express, and that it is past time that they woke up. An election campaign is upon us and several of the men responsible for our foreign relations are seeking the Presidential nomination. Questions should be asked, and quickly, of General Eisenhower and Mr. Harriman and Senator Taft; the issue of foreign policy should be pushed to the front. It would be strange indeed if the United States were to leave the job of debating German rearmament and all its imminent consequences to the parliaments and peoples of Europe.

Another Miracle Needed

By reversing the ban on "The Miracle," the Supreme Court has made it clear that motion pictures fall within the free-speech guaranties of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. At the same time the court has given the New York Board of Regents who banned the film a timely lecture on the historically-restricted meaning of the term "sacrilegious" and the irrelevance of that concept in a nation which does not support an established church or state religion. "It is not the business of government in our nation," the court points out, "to suppress real or imagined attacks upon a particular religious doctrine, whether they appear in publications, speeches, or motion pictures."

Surprisingly enough the decision was "hailed" with delight in Hollywood by executives who had just granted the American Legion a power over the industry that Cardinal Spellman, who precipitated the controversy over "The Miracle," has never asserted. Employees whose names appear on lists submitted by the Legion must be screened and proper clearance obtained before they can work on future productions. If the craftsmen who make motion pictures must submit to political tests of this character, the obvious implication is that they had better not put out films of which the House Committee on Un-American Activities and other agencies consulted by the Legion might disapprove. Indeed censorship is implicit in the statement of James F. O'Neill, editor of the American Legion Magazine, that the Legion's program is one of "watchful observance" of persons employed in radio and television as well as motion pictures and the theater.

Encouraged by the Supreme Court's decision, the industry executives who have been entertaining Mr. O'Neill in Hollywood should permit him to return to his editorial duties in Indianapolis. Or can it be that the Legion will successfully assert a power which the Supreme Court has just decided the State of New York does not possess?

Ridgewood's Littler Point Four

Citizens of Ridgewood, New Jersey, a commuters' community of some 18,000 population forty minutes from Times Square, has launched a program not unlike Norway's "Little Point Four" described by Erling Bjøl in The Nation of May 24. Last year Octavius Pitzalis, operator of a barber shop and beauty parlor and one of Ridgewood's highly respected citizens, paid a visit to his native village of Nuri (population 6,000) in Sardinia. While there he organized a cooperative agricultural project and invested $3,500 of his own money as the down payment on a tractor and other farm equipment. Learning of this, the citizens of Ridgewood decided to back the project as a community enterprise. At the present time they are raising funds by subscription for the purchase of additional farm equipment for Nuri.

While projects of this sort could be used to divert public attention from the lack of government support for an effective national Point Four program, they can also have a quite contrary effect. Apart from their practical value they provide one of the best means of arousing popular interest in the possibilities of an enlarged Point Four. Other communities might well profit by the example of Ridgewood and Mr. Pitzalis who, instead of firing a shot heard round the world, made a sensible down payment on a tractor and a plow.

Grass-Roots Common Sense

An award for the week's outstanding contribution to civic sanity should go to Berkeley, California. Apparently concerned by local excitement over the Robeson incident (see this week's Around The U. S. A.) a group of civic leaders organized a public forum, chaired by Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, on Our National Security and the American Tradition of Freedom. Speakers were asked to address themselves to three questions: What is Freedom? How do we maintain it? And how do we strengthen our defenses against communism? Out of this meeting has come the Berkeley Committee for Security and Freedom sponsored by such diverse organizations as the Junior Chamber of Commerce, Americans for Democratic Action, Young Republicans, the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L., and the Berkeley Church Federation. The committee is not an action group and none of these organizations is involved in any commitment except to further security and freedom through full and open discussion.

It is through local groups of this sort that opinion can be organized to resist the current hate hysteria which is beginning to have dangerous "mass" manifestations. For example, the Sons of the American Revolution recently started a "grass-roots anti-subversive drive" which they claim will function through thousands of local organizations. Known as Patriotic Education, Inc., the new movement aims to capture local citizen groups concerned with public education in the manner foreshadowed in last week's editorial, The Battle for the Schools.

South African Hitlerism

Conscious of growing opposition to its plans for subverting the South African constitution, Dr. Malan's Nationalist government has brought into play the Suppression of Communism Act, an instrument of tyranny worthy of Hitler. This law, writes Mr. E. S. Sachs in his new book "The Choice before South Africa" (Turnstile Press, London), contains "a definition of communism which is sufficiently wide to embrace any liberal who advocates racial tolerance or any trade unionist who urges higher wages for workers. The question of who is a Communist or what constitutes communism is to be decided by the Minister. . . . The case will not be decided by the courts on factual evidence in accordance with recognized legal procedure."

The accuracy of these charges has been proved up to the hilt by the use of this act against Mr. Sachs himself, despite the fact that he was expelled from the Communist Party over 20 years ago. He was ordered to resign as secretary of the South African Garment Workers Union and to abstain from all political or trade union activities. When he defied this order by addressing a mass meeting of union members, the police dragged him off to jail, precipitating a bloody riot. Now he faces the possibility of a three-year jail sentence.

Mr. Sachs, whose article South African Madness, appeared in The Nation of April 12, is not the only victim of this vicious act. It has already been employed against about twenty persons and new orders are steadily being issued. A few of those concerned are known Communists: the rest are simply people like Mr. Sachs whom the government deems it convenient to tag with the Communist label. In addition C. R. Stewart, Minister of Justice, has banned Mr. Sachs's book and suppressed The Cape Guardian, a left-wing weekly. The British Trades Union Congress has protested strongly the arbitrary actions. We hope American trade unions will follow suit.

Tribute to the "Survey"

More than almost any other journal in America, the Survey expressed the faith, the ideas, even the personality of its editor. Paul Kellogg was the Survey, although he gathered around him through the years many eminent associates. To have to record its passing is like saying goodbye to a valued friend; a painful task, humanly and professionally.

Always a pioneer in the field of social welfare and social ideas, the Survey was from its beginning a member of the "deficit group" of forward-looking journals, but until recently the financial problem was successfully met by interested friends, members of Survey Associates, and a few foundations which recognized the unique contribution to social thought and education made by Paul Kellogg and his colleagues. It was the devastating combination of rocketing costs and Mr. Kellogg's serious illness that finally defeated the valiant efforts of the Survey's friends to raise the necessary funds.

Fortunately Mr. Kellogg is on the road to recovery. Knowing him as the sort of person who would never accept defeat in a personal sense, we are encouraged to believe that his great authority, wisdom, and imagination will still be put to good use; and so, also, the talents of his devoted staff. But we shall miss the Survey; it filled a place no other journal occupies and filled it with integrity and distinction.

1952 Platform for American Labor

THE anti-union offensive is gathering momentum. Almost daily some reactionary congressman comes forward with a bright new scheme for loading the collective-bargaining scales against labor. Taft-Hartley, it appears, is not enough: it must be supplemented by further legislation designed to blunt the edge of labor's strike weapon.

One proposal is to bar strikes in key industries whenever an emergency is declared. A second suggestion is compulsory arbitration of disputes affecting the public interest but this is likely to be as strongly opposed by employers as by unions. A third, discussed in an editorial two weeks ago, is Representative Smith's bill, now before the Armed Services Committee of the House, which would empower the courts, following the Taft-Hartley eighty-day injunction period, to place both unions and companies engaged in a dispute in a receivership of indefinite period during which working conditions could not be changed.

Still another plan, with which congressmen of both parties are toying, is to curb the unions by putting them under the anti-trust laws. Senator Robertson of Virginia is seeking to revive a bill to achieve this end which he introduced in 1950. And in the House, Republican Representative Gwinn of New York has brought forward a measure to outlaw both industry-wide bargaining and industry-wide strikes—a proposal written into the original Taft-Hartley law and defeated by only one vote in the Senate after winning the approval of the House.

The Gwinn bill seems to have been inspired by the Wall Street Journal which for years has been plugging for legislation to break up what it calls "labor monopolies." An industry-wide strike that cuts off the supply of some vital commodity or service, this paper argues, is really directed against the whole community. Hence if the government is not armed with legal weapons to ban such strikes, it must be endowed with the power to coerce both sides. "There is the choice. . . . Either the withdrawal of the monopoly power or the creation in the government of a greater power before which both property and personal rights lose their sanctity." (Wall Street Journal, May 1, 1952.)

Extreme proponents of this idea aim at breaking up labor organizations such as the United Steel Workers. As the U. S. News and World Report of May 16 explains: "No single union could be certified as bargaining agent for workers of competing unions. There would be one union for U. S. Steel, another for Bethlehem, another for Republic."

Senator Taft, while not at present willing to go quite so far, apparently plans, if elected President, to include "an anti-labor-monopoly law" in his first State-of-the-Union message. According to Philip Geyelin, Washington correspondent of the Wall Street Journal, he believes that such a law should not prohibit union organization on a national basis. However, except in a few industries such as building and coal which would be allowed to negotiate regional agreements, it would enforce bargaining on a company basis by forbidding any union official to negotiate labor contracts for more than one company. The Senator admits that this ban might not prevent simultaneous strikes to enforce identical demands but he believes localization of bargaining would, to quote Mr. Geyelin's paraphrase, "eventually encourage workers and employers in each company in an industry to work out their problems independently."

There is much in this outline that is unclear. For instance, when Taft talks of "bargaining on a company level," would he permit negotiations with a holding company, such as United States Steel, or would he insist on separate contracts with each operating subsidiary? Nevertheless, if some details are obscure, the objective is all too plain. Taft, like less cautious anti-labor colleagues, aims at atomization of the unions, at the sapping of the strength they derive from national solidarity by reducing them to loose federations of autonomous locals.

This is a real threat but one that can be met. As Mr. Geyelin writes: "This November's elections hold the key to what happens. If the Democrats win a smashing victory this fall, the chance of Congress passing major labor legislation next year would be slim. But if the Republicans hold their own or gain new strength in the House and Senate, it's almost certain that there will be a new effort next year to crack down on the unions." It is up to organized labor to insure against another Eightieth Congress. If it rallies its potential political strength, it can do so.

Judge Waring on the Civil Rights Issue

MORE than ten thousand people gathered in Chicago's Coliseum, at one of the sessions of the recent General Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal church, to hear J. Waties Waring pay his respects to the Dixiecrats and make an eloquent appeal for a strong civil rights plank in the platforms of both major parties. Ostracized by the "white folks" of South Carolina, Judge and Mrs. Waring were given a tumultuous reception in Chicago; among other honors the Judge was given the annual Abbott Award of the Chicago Defender. The meager accounts of this extraordinary meeting which appeared in the press are, perhaps, a measure of the pitch to which racial tensions have mounted in Chicago in the last year. When the delegates to the Democratic and Republican conventions assemble there next month, they will be visiting a community in which racial tensions are at the highest point since World War II. The city's large Negro population should be in the mood, as it certainly will be in a position, to bring great pressure to bear on the platform committees of both parties.

Judge Waring, whose decisions opened the way for Negroes to vote in South Carolina in the Democratic primaries, spoke of racial prejudice as "a cancer which cannot be cured with a sedative. . . . You must go to the source of the trouble. So long as we have legal segregation in the South, the poison will spread to the rest of the country. So you and I and the other decent people of this country have got to go to the source of the prejudice—the segregation laws of the South—and wipe them out." To all appeasers and "Uncle Toms," the Judge suggested that the reply should be: "We don't care how much money the white supremacists spend; we don't want the chains of slavery gold-plated, we want them stricken off. We don't want gifts, we want rights."

At the close of his speech, Judge Waring suggested a civil rights plank, approved by the conference, for adoption by both major parties:

We deplore and condemn all attempts to discriminate for or against any of our citizens by reason of religion, race, or ancestry, and pledge ourselves to a re-examination of those pillars of our democratic way of life, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and especially those amendments guaranteeing to all persons the equal protection of the laws and prohibiting any state from making or enforcing laws abridging the privileges of citizens or denying to any person equal protection.

We demand that the immortal words of Thomas Jefferson that "all men are created equal" be made a reality.

In furtherance of this principle, we call upon the Congress of the United States to consider and adopt rules which will allow the introduction and discussion and orderly consideration on its merits and the eventual enactment of legislation guaranteeing:

1. The right of full and equal participation in the exercise of suffrage.
2. The right to equal opportunity of employment.
3. The right of security of person and property.

We further call upon the executive departments to implement such rights as are now granted and those to be hereafter granted and assured by:

1. Directing the immediate integration of all personnel in all of the armed forces and complete and sincere elimination of discrimination and designation by color or racial origin; this is to apply to all forces whether serving in this country or foreign lands.
2. The insertion in and enforcement of provisions in all contracts made by the federal government for furnishing of supplies, construction, or labor against discrimination or designation by reason of color or racial origin.

We commend this plank to the members of the platform committees of both parties.

Six Years Too Late

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

SYNGMAN RHEE is a taunting symbol of what is wrong with American policy in Korea. From the moment he and his clique were imposed on the Korean people by the American occupation, they served as a barricade against any popular movement or any democratic development that might conceivably play into the hands of communism. As long as they performed this function, their corrupt and violent practices were regarded as peccadilloes. Now, suddenly, the United Nations command, which is to say the top American brass, is reported to be "much embarrassed" by President Rhee's recent behavior. If this is the case, perhaps one should be gratified; a change of heart might betoken a change of policy—although it might merely mean that American prestige, badly battered as the result of the prisoner-of-war fiasco, cannot stand any more slings and arrows just now. But one thing is sure: with all his manifold faults, Syngman Rhee is our man and it is a little ungrateful, and also a little late, for American generals to begin to be embarrassed by him.

They should have got round to it sooner, say in 1946 when, under the sponsorship of the American army he set up his blatantly dictatorial rule, maintained by Japanese-trained police and his own terrorists, arresting potential opponents, outlawing independent political associations, bestowing benefits—land and concessions and jobs—on his faithful henchmen. The American occupation was never more than mildly concerned with these matters; Syngman Rhee ran his little police state without serious interference, and when the elections of 1948 came along he had things well in hand. What with the people he had thrown into jail and those who had been killed and those who were in hiding or had fled to the north, he was in a position to elect a National Assembly which chose him President by a handsome majority.

Those elections were well cooked. But by 1950 the United Nations was on hand to supervise that year's voting, and while it was still distorted by government repression and corruption, the tide turned sharply against the President and from that date to this the anti-Rhee forces in the Assembly have been in a majority. Fortunately for Mr. Rhee the war began in time to save him from serious inconvenience; while the fighting raged Parliamentary government went into partial eclipse. Although the South Korean army was put under United Nations command, Syngman Rhee displayed an impressive degree of initiative. When the other U. N. forces halted briefly at the Thirty-eighth Parallel, Rhee's troops drove northward, apparently without orders. If the U. N. command, General MacArthur then in charge, felt embarrassed it did not show it; nor did it summon back the ambitious ROKs. And only a little later when the U. N. armies, defying Chinese warnings, moved into North Korea, President Rhee dispatched his terrorists and police into captured territory to "establish order," a phrase which by this time hardly needs defining. Even then we find no record of embarrassment on the part of MacArthur and his generals. But outraged protests began to be heard in the United Nations itself and in the press of the cooperating powers—and eventually the advance agents of Syngman Rhee were called back to their homes.

Is it not odd, in the light of these not too ancient facts, that on May 25, with a thoroughly hostile Assembly preparing to elect a new President in less than a month, Syngman Rhee should have declared martial law and arrested nine opposition deputies? Or that a few days later he should have announced an "international conspiracy" against South Korea, arrested a batch of ordinary citizens, and formally rejected the urgings of military and diplomatic officials that he behave in a constitutional manner? It is not odd. For he knew very well that if he did so the Assembly would presently vote out of office his whole apparatus of control. In fact, he had every reason to expect, it seems to us, that the people who put him in power and countenanced his abuses of power would display composure rather than embarrassment when he took steps to hang on to it.

So Syngman Rhee calmly ignored the resolution adopted 96 to 3 by the Assembly which demanded that martial law be revoked—though such an order is mandatory under the constitution—and the Assembly's further resolution to remain in session until the arrested members were freed. As complete justification for his conduct, Mr. Rhee pointed out that the legislators were "trying to grab political power by intrigue." He also ignored, or has up to the moment of writing, the pressures brought by General Van Fleet and various U. N. representatives, announcing that he will lift martial law when he pleases and that, instead of releasing the jailed deputies, "more arrests can be expected."

Whether the high brass will finally force President Rhee to knuckle under, we cannot guess. All we can say is that, win or lose, they have a miserably weak case. If they had really wanted democracy in Korea, in place of corruption and terror, they would have started differently. They wanted anti-communism, nothing else, and they got Syngman Rhee. Their embarrassment is about six years late.

One View of Eisenhower

BY JOSEPH C. HARSCH

Paris

BEFORE Dwight Eisenhower left Europe he was genuinely puzzled when certain of his visitors went away saying that in domestic politics he was "to the right of Taft." The visitors, coming from an America where it has become customary to tag everyone as being right or left, had seen in some of his customary views evidence of a rightward domestic political inclination. Ike himself, however, is conscious only of a desire to find the right solution to any given problem regardless of what kind of people have generated the idea.

This urge to find a right solution without finding one's self labeled reactionary or radical is the overlooked key to the man Eisenhower and might well lead to considerable confusion before Ike and the American public get to know each other better. In foreign policy Ike is a modern American. But when anyone in these black and white days adopts what is plainly a modern point of view about foreign policy there tends to be an assumption that he must be quite as modern in other areas of public affairs and therefore as easily placed in the domestic political spectrum.

That is precisely where a number of political experts are going wrong these days, because in domestic affairs Ike hasn't had a chance to become modern. He left civilian life in 1910 and has been busy ever since building an army career, waging wars, and trying to remake the face of Europe. True, he had a few brushes with modern America when he was president of Columbia University, but it is important to remember that while he resided in the general environment of a great civilian university he continued to move through it within the immediate environment of a five-star general surrounded by aides and staff sergeants.

Certainly not consciously, but just as certainly unconsciously, Ike looks ahead with the attitude of a man who is not just taking off a uniform, but who feels that he is going to move from the world of "we" to the world of "they." So far as foreign policy is concerned the transition will be easy. In that area the two worlds have not exactly merged, but have intermingled to the point where the army recognizes, albeit with sadness, that political and military affairs can no longer exist in separate compartments. In domestic affairs it is bound to be a different story.

JOSEPH C. HARSCH, Paris correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, covered General Eisenhower from the time the general was first given the NATO assignment.

This doesn't mean for a moment that Ike will move into domestic affairs unequipped to comprehend or deal with them. The America of 1910 in Abilene, Kansas, does not prepare a man to grasp instantly the subtleties of Senator Taft's relation with Joe McCarthy or the reasons why it is more respectable for a member of the N.A.M. to be seen lunching with John L. Lewis than with Philip Murray. But it isn't a bad starting point for a new look at 1952's America. After all, people from small Midwest towns in 1910 were decent people capable of tolerance for each other's peculiarities, slow to pass doctrinaire judgments, possessing faith in the general decency of mankind, and free from a certain modern tendency to feel that the other man's ideas need to be purged if one's own are to survive.

Dwight D. Eisenhower

On the other hand it is hardly surprising that some of Ike's visitors haven't seemed to be able to grasp what he was talking about or be able to agree that his political views as of Paris in the spring of 1952 make him a "middle of the roader." To them, he has seemed instead to sound like a man "to the right of Taft." The confusion really arises out of the fact that Ike is not at all to the right of Taft, but rather about 40 years behind Taft in applying his own personal inclinations to the actual problems of America today. Ike simply hasn't had a chance to apply himself to these matters. Taft has.

It is important to compare Taft's and Eisenhower's personal inclinations. On any such comparison Taft would certainly be well to the right. But over the past forty years the Senator from Ohio has found it either necessary or desirable to make certain modifications in the application of his personal doctrines to specific conditions, as has Harry Truman. This is a process through which Ike has not yet had the time or need to pass (or rather had not until he found the transition from military to political life looming ahead of him).

As an announced candidate, Ike began to do some serious thinking. But being able to regard himself with reasonable objectivity he came quickly to the realization that he was certainly not equipped at this stage to form decisive judgments on such specific current issues as the steel strike. Political instinct seemed to guide him in the same direction, warning him that he had better not mix in too many current issues until he had had a chance to do some home work. The result has been that he has talked to his visitors in the only idiom available to him; the political idiom of Midwest America, circa 1910.

The real question, however, is not where his domestic views are to be found today, but how good are the pieces of political equipment he has brought home with him as devices for evolving a useful and constructive set of views of modern America. Most of these are too well known to require more than itemization. His personality and easy friendliness are proverbial, and real. So is his ability to act as chairman or moderator of a board meeting and to lead wrangling individuals towards a workable compromise between conflicting views. No one can take from him the fact that the hammering out of the European Defense Community agreement in one year among Europeans conditioned by a thousand years of war and suspicion borders on the miraculous.

Add his ability to express his ideas with an intensity and enthusiasm which actually do arouse public confidence and light little fires of hope and faith. This derives from the fact that he is an optimist with a belief that men are decent and that mankind can move from where it is to some better place. It also derives from an ability unusual in military men to handle words. He did a lot of writing in his day—including General MacArthur's annual reports as Chief of Staff and some MacArthur speeches in the Philippines. He works long and hard at such tasks and picks words carefully. One is surprised by his vocabulary when moving from conversations with military men around him to conversations with him.

THESE are his political assets. What about his liabilities? There are several minor ones. Like Harry Truman, Ike has had some difficulty avoiding undesirable personal associations. He makes friends easily. He has found it necessary to terminate several such friendships. But unlike Truman, Ike can terminate them firmly and decisively. Then Ike moves into the political arena with a skin as yet untoughened to the vulgarities of political behavior. He has been disturbed by the black propaganda campaign waged against him. He wasn't prepared for being called Communist-lover, lecher, "Swedish Jew," and husband of a dipsomaniac. He didn't know that this sort of thing is normal in American political life and that its purpose is as much to rattle him as to influence people against him. It got under his skin and he still can't talk about these abuses without a touch of visible pain. The question is whether he will develop towards a Rooseveltian delight in collecting specimens or towards a Hoover-like persecution complex, or find a solution peculiar to himself which will be sufficient. Basically an extrovert, the chances are that he will evolve some form of defense. But before he does he may be rattled and thrown off pace several times.

PROBABLY Ike's greatest liability is his sense of being slightly apart and different from even the best of the politicians who built his candidacy. The one person he really trusts in the whole movement is his old personal friend and army associate, General Lucius Clay. So close is the natural sympathy and understanding between them that General Clay was actually used during the pre-declaration period as a sort of alter ego for Ike. The politicians, forbidden to ask Ike direct political questions, put them to Clay and Clay gave the answers he assumed Ike would give were he free to give them. And apparently they were almost always the right ones. That same identity of thinking process does not exist with such men as Paul Hoffman and Senator Lodge. They and Ike talk "to" each other rather than "with" each other. They are separated by that delicate but ever present difference between "we" and "they." They are also separated by the persisting assumption that Ike is more important to them than they to him. It will be some time, if ever, before Ike can feel as comfortable among his political associates as he does among his old military friends. This could become an asset by protecting him from a narrowly interested advocacy of special causes. As candidate and/or President, he would be better off not to trust his advisers as completely as he has become accustomed to trust his army friends.

The sum of it all is that Ike is not as complex as some people are apparently trying to make him, or as "placed" as others assume him to be. Using "good" in its best sense, Ike is a good man with strong urges to lead the country out of twenty years of internal strife along what he regards as the middle of the road. He approaches the task with an unusual personality and a real earnestness. He can contribute a fresh sense of direction just because his political roots are in the Middle West of 1910.

Can Ike locate that middle of the road in sufficient time to meet his problems? It won't be the easiest thing he ever tried to do. And of course there is some question whether the middle he finds will accord with the public's sense of where it lies. It would be a grave mistake to assume that Ike is already placed to right, left, or center. If the Republicans take him as their candidate, and the voters as their President, they will be taking a man who knows where he wants to find himself but whose present ideas of where it will be are going to sound quaint, if nostalgically charming, to our sophisticated moderns. Perhaps a touch of quaintness is what a lot of Americans really want after Roosevelt's sophistication and Truman's mixture of good decision in big things and Pendergastian cynicism in small things.

France's Fatal Indecision

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

WHILE at Bonn the Foreign Ministers were signing the Contractual Agreements with Germany and the European Army treaty, the French political parties were in a state that is hard to describe. The dominant feeling was one of anxiety; but it wasn't the kind of anxiety that produces energetic action. It was mixed up with almost everything under the sun: a spot of black fatalism; a pinch of sheepish optimism; a few idiotic illusions about the "land of Schiller and Goethe" and, at the same time, a distrust of Germany; an even greater distrust of Russia (or vice versa, according to the speaker), and a dread of American "irresponsibility." In the end everybody subscribed to some vague half-measures, half-warnings, and half-promises which meant little or nothing.

The general indecision in France can, in the end, only encourage those people in the United States who are pushing hardest for the rearmament of Germany, and those in Germany who are playing an equally dangerous game. Of course, on paper, Germany will not be able to go ahead with its rearmament; of course, in theory, the road is still open for agreement with Russia, which is expected to look upon the signing of the Bonn agreements only as a salutary warning to come to its senses. But that isn't how things are likely to work out; for the indecision shown by France, and especially by the French Socialists (or, at any rate, by most of them) is not going to create an international detente—far from it.

That was the feeling of the Socialist minority, which for two days had struggled gallantly at the party congress at Montrouge to postpone any decision on Germany. That is, to postpone it in actuality, and not merely on paper; for they knew that the kind of resolutions passed at French political congresses, though calculated to make everybody pat himself—and everyone else—on the back, are not the sort of thing that scare the State Department, the Pentagon, or Dr. Adenauer.

There was one curious thing about the congress. Tom Driberg, on behalf of the British Labor Party, read out to the delegates the famous resolution of April 30 of the National Executive on German rearmament. He was loudly cheered and later treated to drinks; but there the matter ended. For the question of the Labor Party's German policy had already been thrashed out on the two previous days. Marceau Pivert, of the left wing of the Socialists, had spoken at length, saying that here was at least a serious attempt to call a halt—at least temporary halt—to this deadly course down the slippery slope. Depreux also had spoken about it; he had said that he "preferred talks with Russia about a world armistice, talks which might be difficult but would be better than a third world war, even if they lasted a year, two years, three years. . . ." The British Labor Party had seen the light. And he added that he was not prepared to rearm

Robert Schuman

Germany just in order to get Taft defeated. But no, Felix Gouin wouldn't have it. What was the good, he asked, of taking any notice of the British? They had let France down in 1940. Britain, he suggested, didn't really come into it at all. To him Russia was enemy No. 1, and the integration of Germany in the West was the only hope of saving Germany—and France—from being swallowed up by Uncle Joe.

Gouin's speech was the most extreme thing heard at the Congress. But the much more moderate speech by André Philip, wrapped up in a mystical cloud of Strasbourg Europeanism, was not really very different in substance. And, in the scales of French socialism, all the speeches in favor of German integration as a "lesser evil" finally outweighed the impassioned speeches of the other school, including that of Naegelon, who said that not a single one of the five conditions laid down by the National Assembly before Schuman went to Lisbon had been fulfilled—no genuine British support, no gradual incorporation of the French army into the European Defense Community, no exclusion of Germany from the Atlantic Pact, no guaranty that the German forces would never grow greater than the French, no guaranty of the size of the German units; and those of Daniel Mayer, Grumbach, Pivert, or Jules Moch.

Moch's political line over the last few years has zig-zagged fantastically; yet one must take his speech at the Socialist Congress with the utmost seriousness. For Moch had come to Montrouge from the United Nations where he had represented France on the Disarmament Commission. He at least had a real understanding of the international atmosphere—and of the prevailing atmosphere in New York, which he described as "atrocious."

Since returning to France a few days ago, he said, many Socialist comrades had laughed at him, saying he had been "wasting his time in New York."

Yet I maintain, [he continued] that we have no right to ignore the Disarmament Commission—even though it has not produced any tangible results yet. . . . Things have gone more smoothly than at the Palais Rose, and, without revealing any secrets, I maintain that the French delegation has good hope of bringing the Russian and American standpoints more closely together. All problems in the world are linked. What is German rearmament but the terrifying antithesis of general disarmament? If German rearmament is to be agreed on, all hope of disarmament will have to be abandoned. The Socialist Congress must either take the plunge, or else postpone any decision. . . . As I see it the European Army, as at present envisaged, contains none of the guaranties we demanded before Lisbon, and the present plan is an act of sabotage by the experts against the original Pleven Plan.

The impression he gave was that, on disarmament, the Russians were less difficult than the U. S. A. And after saying that Adenauer, with American encouragement, was becoming more and more insolent; that the present EDC plan would place France in a position of hopeless inferiority vis-à-vis Germany; that the German army would have all the dangerous features which the Pleven Plan had tried to exclude, Moch went on:

The greatest danger to Europe is the revival of the Wehrmacht. For what if the Russians, who are already on the road of big concessions to Germany, were to offer her territorial revision in the East? The German army would pass, lock, stock, and barrel, to the other side. . . .

And then came his most important conclusion:

All problems today are linked. . . . If the Bonn treaty is ratified, it will be a fait accompli which once and for all will ruin every chance of a general settlement. The important thing is to wait—to wait at least for the election of a representative German parliament and for the American Presidential election. Both of them can change everything.

Moch remarked that there was an idea widely current in the United States—the policy of Ultimatums. "This is a policy that we as Socialists and Frenchmen cannot accept. We rearm, but not for that. We rearm in order to negotiate; and we are already strong enough for that. Let us pursue our efforts for a general peace settlement." And, alluding to President Auriol's speech at the opening session of the last U. N. Assembly, he concluded: "Let there be a statesman who will call a conference of the Big Four. This cannot be done now. But it must be done after the United States election. And meantime, let there be no German rearmament, which can only ruin the last chances of world peace." On the same day, eighty-year-old Edouard Herriot was saying at the Radical Party congress: "Americans, I must appeal to you. Do not repeat the mistakes you made between the two wars in building up German military strength. . . . Think of what a third world war will mean. As Americans and democrats, and as human beings, you have no right to expose our country to this mortal danger."

Yet the man representing France at Bonn is not Herriot, with his old-fashioned common-sense and historical understanding, or hard, "mathematical" Jules Moch, but flabby, uninspiring Robert Schuman, with his idée fixe of "Europe," a non-existent Europe, yet one in whose existence well-meaning provincial Socialists still like to believe in their sloppy way. And hence all the woolly compromises and resolutions, which can only confirm Adenauer in his view that France doesn't know its own mind. . . . Oh Land of Descartes!

Germany, Germany!

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

FOR five years I have been repeating that peace or war would be decided on the issue of Germany. When momentous events like Korea diverted attention toward Asia, I urged a return to the main point on which East and West could either agree or finally break. The events of the past week have unfortunately justified this preoccupation. Secretary Acheson was right in describing the signing of the contractual agreements in Bonn and of the European Army Pact in Paris as a "big event." It was also a personal victory for him if one takes into consideration the fact that these documents were signed in face of the bitter hostility of a large part of European public opinion, with the French government, in particular, fully aware that their acceptance, marking a sharp defeat for France, had been accomplished only under the heaviest pressure of American diplomacy. The threat that if the French refused to sign American military aid would be cut, this time proved totally effective so far as the French people were concerned.

But as in the case of every victory, especially one followed by a period between signature and ratification when the entire controversy will be re-fought, an objective analysis of its consequences is due. I am not thinking so much of the problem of Berlin. Measures already taken and others that may be adopted in the course of a retaliatory campaign against West Germany and the Three Western Powers will certainly capture the headlines, but these will not be the most serious developments. The parallel with the 1948-49 blockade of Berlin is inaccurate. For now that the Potsdam agreement has been tossed out of the window by the ceremony at Bonn, the Russians consider themselves as having regained full jurisdiction over the city. It is not likely that they will ask the Western powers to quit Berlin, but without doubt they believe themselves fully entitled to do so. East German measures adopted immediately after the signing at Bonn—including the partial blocking of telephone communications as well as transport between the Soviet and Western areas—were designed, at least in part, as a demonstration of strength.

No, the most serious consequence of last week's acts is that the natural area of eventual agreement between East and West has been blown to pieces. Once determined upon, the policy of making Germany the "hard core" of the European military alliance against Russia will impose more and more concessions, greater and greater aid, increasing dependence upon West German armed might. The fact that only twenty-four hours after the signatures were blotted, it was announced that the Bonn Republic would be allowed to fabricate tanks and artillery of all sizes, indicates all too clearly what is going to happen. It might even come about in the end that the overwhelming opposition of the Western European peoples to war would leave only two real instruments of anti-Russian strength available for a shooting war: the West German army and the industrial, financial, and atomic power that the United States is in a position to master.

In any case the developments at Bonn and Paris have made a return to diplomacy more difficult than ever. The moment of his triumph may also have marked Secretary Acheson's swan song as a negotiator for peace. The way is now open for the generals and the marshals—including the many hungry, out-of-work Nazi officers for whom this represents the long-awaited day of resurrection.

Italy: Danger from the Right

BY WILLIAM MURRAY

Rome (by cable)

AFTER nearly three months of furious campaigning the second round of Italian local administrative elections is over and clerical democracy has won a precarious victory. The elections, which affected some 2400 municipalities mainly in southern Italy, were considered important primarily as an indication of which way the political wind is blowing; Italy's first nationwide general election since 1948 is scheduled to be held next year. If the indications are to be relied upon, 1953 will be the year of crisis for Italian democracy. These relatively unimportant elections of a purely local nature have emphasized one major trend: an upsurge of the neo-fascist Italian Social Movement. Everyone expected the Communists and their Socialist allies to gain in strength as they have in every previous election since the war's end, but no one was prepared to see entire city administrations pass into the hands of the fascists and their monarchist allies. The Demo-Christians and their allies kept control over ten provincial capitals including Rome but the fascists have taken over political control of at least six key southern cities: Naples, Foggia, Bari, Benevento, Salerno, and Avellino. The extreme Left, although piling up the largest single vote, has managed to win only five of the provincial capitals and none as important as either Bari or Naples where the Right is in full and arrogant control. In Rome itself the Socialist-Communist coalition outvoted the Demo-Christians by over twenty thousand votes but the neo-fascist block was appealing enough to gain the vote of one out of every four Romans. In Naples the Right picked up over 208,000 votes, some fifty thousand more than the Demo-Christians and about seventy-five thousand more than the Left.

The question then arises who are the voters who are getting behind the "Missini"? Actually one can break down the party into three component parts. First there is the hard core of nostalgic and belligerent ex-Fascists. In the old days under Mussolini they were mainly lesser functionaries and obscure party members holding some minor local post. With them are the ex-soldiers, the fanatics who still claim that Italy could have won the war if she had not been betrayed by her own countrymen. Secondly there are the students and the young men and women who have been trying unsuccessfully to find employment. Many of them are in their middle twenties and are still unemployed. They are the ones that have suffered most from the scarcity of work in large urban areas. Their memories of fascism are vague but pleasant. Most of them did not fight in the last war, but they can remember that until the early nineteen-forties life in Italy was kinder at least to college graduates. Thirdly there is that large mass of underpaid white-collar workers, state employees, and all those people who are having a hard time making ends meet, but who can find no comfort in the Communist appeal to the proletariat. Together the "Missini" dream of a return to the "good old days" when Italy was a world power and the laboring classes knew their place and had better manners.

Strong as they are the neo-fascists have two serious weaknesses: they have no political program and they have no popular figure, no man on horseback to lead them into power. The high party functionaries are either amnestied criminals like Valerio Borghese or unsuccessful traveling salesmen like Giorgio Almirante. The only man with the stature to lead the party is Rodolfo Graziani the discredited old marshal who has already served six years in jail. But he is too old to provide the kind of virile leadership that could fill the Piazza Venezia with screaming fanatics. Even more serious is the absence of any program but nostalgia. In the gallery of the Piazza Colonna in Rome where political agitators have been haranguing crowds of passersby as well as each other, the fascists were always stopped by the question "What is your program?" If the fascists fail to come up with either a man on horseback or a program, there is no question that eventually they will collapse of their own inadequacy just as the once powerful "Uomo Qualunque" (Everyman's Party) collapsed five years ago. One can already detect signs that this decay is taking place: there are several diverging currents of thought within the party and two splinter groups have already broken away to form their own parties, although they have remained allied to the "Missini."

The political campaign itself here was long and bitter. It began several months before the election and each of Rome's sixteen political parties held at least one rally in every section of the city. The Communists campaigned behind another one of their political fronts; this one calling itself the "citizens list." As the figurehead of their campaign they chose eighty-four-year-old Francesco Saverio Nitti, until yesterday an opponent of communism and now the butt of many an Italian political quip. The selection of Nitti to head the left-wing list was a real surprise. Nitti's one claim to fame is that he was head of a short-lived democratic government immediately after World War I. Since then his time has been spent in a futile attempt to get back into power apparently on any ticket which could promise him victory. The enlarged photograph of him which the Communists plastered all over the walls of Rome bears an unfortunate resemblance to all those well known Communist cartoons of pig-faced capitalists wallowing in barrels of dollar bills and hundred-thousand-lire bank notes. The Communist-sponsored political rallies were also strangely apathetic and badly attended. Nevertheless their new political issue—the corruption of the Demo-Christian government—was sufficient to gain them an increase of nearly one hundred thousand votes in Rome alone.

The Demo-Christians lavished fantastic sums on an American-style campaign with parades, loudspeaker trucks, and marching bands. The police cooperated ably in keeping order while the Demo-Christians held their rallies and staged their parades. No other political parties were allowed the luxury of a parade. The smaller democratic parties allied to the government were unable to wage any kind of effective campaign. The Social Democrats are suffering from their usual diseases: lack of money and internal dissension. The Republicans failed to come up with a program. The Liberals at least had money to spend on their campaign, but on the issue of freedom for business interests they had a platform with no voter appeal at all. Both Communists and fascists were able to wage a most effective campaign against the Christian Democrats mainly on the issue of corruption and its dependent evils: lack of housing; the exorbitant rates charged by public services; the unfair taxation; the administration of necessities such as gas and electric current by companies charging outrageous rates, and so on. Unless the Demo-Christians clean house before next year the 1953 elections can only worsen the already serious plight of Italian democracy. The tone of the campaign can best be grasped through the following story: All over Rome the Demo-Christians erected huge campaign posters. In one poor section the Communists erected much smaller posters in the shape of a hand pointing at the mammoth Demo-Christian posters. On each hand was written "It cost the Demo-Christians thirty thousand lire to erect this poster. Who paid?"

IT IS easy to demonstrate that there is discrimination against racial minorities in medical education, medical practice, and medical institutions in the United States, but it is not always easy to find and understand the causes. To some extent, certainly, discrimination in medicine is a result of discrimination in society generally. It is important to remember that the doctor and hospital engaging in discriminatory selection are often victims as well as culprits.

It is by no means true, however, that the medical profession is helpless to do anything toward eliminating discrimination. Indeed there is heartening and increasing evidence to the contrary. Before considering this evidence, however, we should make some attempt to measure the problem.

The basic facts of medical discrimination against Negroes are apparent in a few simple statistics: With 10 per cent of the nation's population, Negroes have only a little more than 2 per cent of the nation's physicians and occupy only 2½ per cent of the nation's hospital beds. The physician-population ratio for the whole population is 1 to 750; for the Negro population the ratio is 1 to 3500, substantially below the 1 to 1500 ratio commonly accepted in our country as the minimum necessary for adequate medical service. Of 26,000 students enrolled in medical schools, 660—less than 3 per cent—are Negroes; of these, three-fourths are enrolled in the two all-Negro institutions, Meharry Medical College in Nashville and Howard University in Washington, D. C. Negro graduates are eligible for appointment to fewer than 200 internships of which more than half are in segregated Negro hospitals. (There are about 10,000 internships available altogether.) Of some 12,000 residency appointments on hospital staffs, a little more than 100 are available to Negro physicians and three-fourths of these are in segregated hospitals.

It is neither necessary nor desirable that the Negro population should look only to Negro physicians for needed medical care, or that Negro physicians should limit their practices to members of their own race, yet the existence of racial barriers in hospital staff appointments makes it difficult to break this pattern of segregated medical care in most communities. A current report of the Provident Medical Associates of Chicago states:

ROBERT M. CUNNINGHAM, JR., is the editor of Modern Hospital magazine.

Few Negro physicians have hospital staff appointments at any but all-Negro hospitals. Thus they must take their patients to Negro hospitals or turn them over to the care of white physicians in the hospitals to which they themselves do not have access. In all the United States opportunities for internships and residences are limited, and hospital and clinical facilities are segregated or denied. And in most of the South, membership in county medical and other professional and scientific societies is refused. To a greater degree than in the case of his white confreres, the average Negro physician becomes a general practitioner, isolated professionally and serving a low-income group.

Many of the difficulties faced by the Negro physician are interrelated. The bylaws of most hospitals provide that staff appointments shall be made only from among members in good standing of the local county medical society; with society membership denied him, the Negro physician is thus effectively barred from hospital practice. In fairness, it must be emphasized that the American Medical Association, often a target for abuse by liberal groups, is not responsible for such exclusions. The A. M. A. is made up of constituent local and county medical societies which lay down their own qualifications for membership. Where Negro doctors are denied admission, it is the local society and not the A. M. A. that is at fault. Many societies, of course, do have Negro members who are also members of the A. M. A., and a number of county societies have opened membership to Negro physicians in recent months. Several of these are in the South.

Inevitably, discrimination in the admission of hospital patients emerges from these discriminatory aspects of medical education and practice. Ordinarily it is doctors, and not their patients, who initiate the demand for hospital service and make the request for admission. Where segregation exists in education and housing and employment it exists inevitably also in the private practice of medicine. Where segregation exists in the private practice of medicine and the Negro physician has no hospital staff appointment, there aren't many Negro hospital patients.

Unfortunately, hospitals are businesses as well as medical institutions; voluntary hospitals must earn most or all of their operating expenses. The accident victim whose condition is perilous is commonly cared for without question about payment, but it is necessary and, in a business sense, prudent, for the hospital to raise the question of payment in the case of a patient who could be removed to a public institution without danger. This is done right along in some emergency cases. When the patient is a Negro it is often concluded that rejection has been for racial rather than economic reasons. Frequently this is an injustice to the hospital. On the other hand, in some cases the economic circumstance is a screen behind which discriminatory practices are hidden. The same act is involved in either case; it is the motive which is in doubt.

In Illinois and elsewhere, hospitals have opposed licensure laws with provisions which would jeopardize the license of any hospital turning a patient away because of race, creed, or color. Such opposition does not mean, as some observers have concluded, that hospitals generally favor racial discrimination. It means simply that they are fearful that failure to admit any patient for any reason—including the professional and economic reasons that have been described here—could be interpreted as discriminatory. Until the law can be written in such a way that discriminatory practices can be eliminated without forcing the hospital to relinquish control of its own medical and financial policies, hospitals will probably continue to oppose it.

Two other aspects of discrimination in medical institutions should be mentioned here. One is the placement in the hospital of Negro patients who do gain admission, and the other is in the employment of Negro nurses, technicians, and other personnel. Common hospital practice leaves a great deal to be desired in both areas today. Many hospitals, in the Chicago area and elsewhere, admit some Negro patients but insist on placing them in single rooms, or in semi-private or ward accommodations occupied by other Negro patients. Only in the large wards of public hospitals and a few of the medical teaching centers is it common to see Negro and white patients occupying adjacent beds. When challenged about this practice, most hospital people reply that it is done, not because the hospital or the doctors wish it so, but because white patients object when they have to share hospital accommodations with Negro patients. Time after time, it has been demonstrated that such excuses are fictitious.

It has also been demonstrated beyond any doubt that nothing happens when white and Negro nurses work together on hospital floors, or when Negro nurses care for white patients and white nurses care for Negro patients—another of the situations that many hospital, nursing, and medical people fear. As a matter of fact, discrimination against Negro nurses and other hospital personnel is breaking down rapidly today. This is a case of arriving at the right answer for the wrong reason: the shortage of nurses and other personnel has become so severe that many hospitals which formerly barred Negroes from all except menial positions have been forced to accept them.

These few facts and relationships may suggest the extent to which discrimination exists in medicine. The causes of discrimination reach back into the segregated pattern of our whole social structure. While some discrimination is certainly chargeable to the management of hospitals, it seems plain that a much larger share emerges from the failure of hospital governing boards to appoint Negro physicians to attending staff positions. In any given situation, of course, this may be because the board frankly discriminates against the Negro physician, or because the staff itself discriminates by failing to recommend its Negro colleagues for such appointments.

BUT it may also be due to other causes. In a particular hospital or community it may be because there are no Negro physicians who can qualify for such an appointment. Many hospital staffs, for example, limit attending appointments to qualified specialists. As we have seen, the opportunities for residency training for Negro physicians are so limited that comparatively few can qualify themselves as specialists. Of 29,000 certified medical specialists listed two years ago by the National Advisory Board for Medical Specialties, 101 were Negroes. The Provident Medical Associates of Chicago has been devoting its resources for several years to financing graduate medical education for qualified Negro physicians in an effort to improve this situation. This group has also been providing scholarship aid for undergraduate medical education for qualified students, and plans to increase this phase of its activities during the coming years. The problem is a perplexing one, however, not only because of the limited number of Negro students who are financially able to meet the heavy costs of professional education, but because of the limited number of Negro students who are educationally qualified. The roots of medical discrimination are buried deep in our segregated educational system.

If inequalities resulting from segregation in medical and hospital care are not always their fault, doctors and hospital people can often eliminate the inequalities when they have the will to do so. As part of a community-wide program in betterment of race relations, the medical staff of one of the hospitals in Gary, Indiana, four years ago invited applications for appointment from qualified Negro physicians in the community. Up to that time, the practice of Negro physicians had been limited to a totally inadequate hospital located in the segregated district. Two Negro physicians qualified at once, and five more have accepted appointments since then, with the result that more than 20 per cent of the patients in the hospital today are Negroes. This has been accomplished without any unpleasant incidents. In the Phoenix, Arizona, Memorial Hospital, Negro and white patients, doctors, nurses, and other hospital workers are treated as complete equals. This is also the case at New York City's Sydenham Hospital, one of the first truly interracial institutions to be established in this country.

The experience at Sydenham, incidentally, illustrates how the economic problems that result from discrimination in housing and employment are reflected in medical care. Established as a voluntary hospital in the Negro section of New York City several years ago, Sydenham went broke in three years and had to be taken over by the city department of hospitals. Other cities have had the same experience: The Provident Hospital in Chicago engages in heroic fund-raising efforts, year after year, to meet mounting deficits. With 20 per cent of its patients Negroes, the Methodist Hospital at Gary reports that 50 per cent of its unpaid bills are in the Negro group. The University of Chicago Clinics has had a comparable experience in the last two years.

Nevertheless, the number of hospitals around the country accepting Negro physicians as interns, residents and attending staff members is steadily growing: In Chicago, Negro doctors are on the staff at Cook County, Children's Memorial, and Michael Reese hospitals. Elsewhere, Negro physicians have been appointed at such representative institutions as Philadelphia General, Newark City in Newark, N. J., Queens General in New York, Allegheny General in Pittsburgh, and Los Angeles County. Especially noteworthy are developments in the South: the Emory University medical school at Atlanta, Georgia, has established a post-graduate clinic for Negro physicians; the Johns Hopkins school of medicine at Baltimore has admitted Negro physicians for post-graduate education; community hospitals in Virginia and Arkansas have admitted Negro physicians.

LESS important but surely significant of changing attitudes in the profession are several recent events: The American Medical Association switched its forthcoming December meeting from Houston to Los Angeles when it became known that the headquarters hotel in Houston would not accept Negro delegates as guests. At the American Hospital Association convention in St. Louis last month the association found, to its embarrassment, that Negro members were not accepted at downtown hotels. It was too late to act this year, but the association immediately made a public announcement to the effect that its meeting would not return to St. Louis until all members could expect equal treatment in living and eating accommodations. When several Southern nurses walked out of a Catholic hospital in West Virginia a few months ago because the Sister Superior refused to discharge three Negro nurses who had been added to the staff, the hospital stood its ground and received full support from the community, the newspapers, the Mother Superior of the Order running the hospital, and the Bishop of the Diocese. When the professional magazine with which I am associated published a portfolio of articles a few months ago urging an end to discrimination in hospitals and medicine, we received the largest volume of mail in years—and the response was overwhelmingly favorable.

Of course, there are less encouraging indications, too. Negro hospitals are still being built throughout the South, and federal funds are being used to build hospitals which evade the anti-discrimination clause in the federal law by using the false doctrine of "separate but equal" facilities. A huge, all-Negro hospital is being built in Philadelphia; another is projected for Washington, D. C. A hospital is being built in the Negro section of Evanston, Illinois. Sponsors of the project claim it will be "interracial" in character, but many observers think it will be segregated, in fact if not in name.

Except where positive action is taken by physicians, as in Gary, Indiana, and in the case of Provident Medical Associates in Chicago, elimination of discrimination in medicine generally is likely to come about only as discrimination comes to be abolished in other phases of life. The physician does not practice in a vacuum. More than he as ever had to do in the past, the physician today must integrate his activities with those of other groups in society in order to be effective. The organization of the modern hospital is more than anything else an outgrowth of the practicing physician's ever-increasing dependence on the judgments and skills of his professional associates.

As his scientific problems have grown constantly more complex, the physician has also had to lean increasingly on the staff of technically trained assistants that is organized for him at the hospital or clinic, and on the elaborate plant and equipment facilities that only the hospital or clinic organizations can purchase and maintain for him. Finally, as medical science in recent years has revealed the relationship of illness and health to the individual's entire life circumstance, as opposed to specific disease processes only, the physician finds himself in closer and closer contact with groups entirely outside the medical profession—with public and private welfare agencies and their staffs of administrators, social workers and psychologists; with schools, churches and others concerned with various aspects of the human being and his environment. The lone doctor and his little black bag are a fond memory, perhaps, but they are only a memory today. Laissez faire medicine, like laissez faire government and laissez faire capitalism, is gone for good. When society eliminates racial and religious discrimination, medicine will eliminate it. To expect otherwise is to expect the impossible.

Battling the Private Power Lobby

BY BARROW LYONS

Washington, D. C.
THE propaganda machine which private power utilities have built in the last several years at a cost of millions of dollars has begun to backfire. Last week some 500 representatives of farm, labor, and consumer organizations met in Washington, D. C., in a fighting mood. The mood was sharpened by some of the most skilful oratory heard for sometime—even in Washington—and the delegates went to work at once on their representatives in Congress.

The objective of the delegates was not merely to defeat the assault which utility companies are making with telling effect upon all forms of publicly-generated, transmitted and distributed electrical energy; they used the conference as a counter-attack to extend the benefits of public power systems.

Labor leaders saw in the conference an opportunity to build a sounder alliance with farm leaders, particularly in view of the coming political campaign, and sent some of their most persuasive speakers. At the banquet session Walter Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers (C. I. O.) spoke on one of his favorite themes, The Road to Abundance, and Paul L. Phillips, president of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, (A. F. of L.) enlarged upon The Wage-Earners' Stake in Public Power. Non-labor speakers included Senator Wayne Morse, who emphasized the interest of all groups in the problem of preserving and enlarging our public power plant; Senator Lister Hill, who directly attacked the power lobby of 1952, and Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman, who pledged support of the conference objectives.

The initiative in calling the conference came from leaders of public-power groups in the Northwest, where they are attempting to develop a public-power grid that will more adequately serve the region. In this area there is as much underdeveloped hydro-power as in all of the presently-developed power in the nation. Leaders of the public utility districts, R. E. A. cooperatives, and municipalities want to tap more of it. Private companies have operating costs, which the ultimate consumer must pay in his monthly billing.

BARROW LYONS, a former New York financial writer, went to Washington fourteen years ago as financial economist for the Securities and Exchange Commission. He was for several years Chief Information Officer of the Bureau of Reclamation, and is now a free-lance writer.

The public-power agencies of the region have been blocked in Washington, D. C., and in Washington state. They have been told that they could not build new lines because of the scarcity of materials required for the defense effort. They have been told that to construct their own projects through borrowing would be inflationary. But they have seen the private utilities, unchecked by such restrictions, build plants requiring at least as much material and which will produce considerably more costly energy. They became angry; and when their desire to call a national conference in Washington was communicated to public agencies and cooperatives elsewhere, they found other people were angry for similar reasons. In comparing grievances and talking over the best way to carry the war to the enemy, wise counsel suggested that the effort be made to bring in representatives of the consumer. And thus labor groups joined the effort.

A COMMITTEE of sponsors was formed in which the following groups were represented: American Public Power Association, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, Communications Workers of America, Congress of Industrial Organizations, Cooperative League of the United States of America, National Farmers Union, Northwest Public Power Association, International Association of Machinists (A. F. of L.), International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers (C. I. O.), Judson King Foundation, Inc., National Rural Electric Cooperatives, Public Affairs Institute, Tennessee Valley Public Power Association, Textile Workers Union of America (C. I. O.), United Auto Workers (C. I. O.), United Steel Workers of America (C. I. O.).

It was calculated that the distributing agencies among the sponsors served about 6,000,000 electric meters in every state, and, represented possibly three times that many persons.

President Truman addressed the opening session and made it obvious that he recognized the political importance of this gathering of grass-roots consumer and cooperative groups. He charmed with a speech that was partly read, partly extemporaneous. He promised cooperation. He said he was thinking of asking his new Attorney General, James P. McGranery, to investigate whether power companies are violating the Corrupt Practices Act in charging their propaganda expenses to power consumers and at the same time using them to reduce their taxes by accounting for them as necessary costs of operation.

The President alluded to the "millions and millions" of dollars that the utility lobby and individual companies throughout the country are spending to bend the public-power program to their own purposes and check the growth of municipal and cooperative enterprises. He mentioned the full-page advertisements run by the utilities in "Mr. Claire Boothe Luce's Life magazine" costing $17,000 each, and one in "the big corporation-controlled Saturday Evening Post" costing $12,000.

But what seemed to irritate him most was the strategy advised by the utility-advertising agencies. He had been studying their "literature" and its effects. One agency boasted, he said, that its technique was so successful that ministers included its propaganda in their church notices and obtained its posting on bulletin boards of the Boy Scouts. The President declared:

Their own manuals say their purpose is to influence the mass mind in this country by playing on people's emotions. The mass mind—what a horrible phrase. I think it is one of the most horrible phrases in the language. They think of the individual human being in this country as part of a mass mind. They set out to play upon the emotions of churchgoers, boy scouts, and school children. They try to control people's thoughts by using slogans and scare words, taking a leaf out of the books of Karl Marx and Adolph Hitler. They are following the Soviet and fascist line.

Mr. Truman's audience appeared to feel as he did. Repeatedly the desire was expressed by scheduled speakers and from the floor that the Federal Power Commission enforce the law which prohibits propaganda and money used to influence legislatures from being charged to operating costs, which the ultimate consumer must pay.

Murray D. Lincoln, President of the Cooperative League, CARE and Farm Bureau Insurance Companies, under whose name the call for the conference went out, urged the delegates to make certain that the message developed by this conference reaches the people.

A committee chaired by Dr. Dewey Anderson, Executive Director of the Public Affairs Institute, drafted a statement of policy and plan of action, which was adopted at the end. It placed emphasis upon preservation of the preference clause in power contracts which gives cooperatives and public bodies first call upon power generated at federally-owned plants; it defended government-built transmission lines, and advocated the coordinated development of river basins. Its preamble asserted: "The American people's heritage of power resources is threatened today by unreformed private power monopolists, defending their high-cost, scarcity-supply policies by the immoral use of rate-payers' funds to corrupt sources of information, educational institutions and democratic processes themselves."

To implement the program the sponsors of the conference were named to a continuing committee authorized to visit the President and to maintain contact with Congress. The committee is headed by Clyde Ellis, executive secretary of the National Rural Electric Cooperatives Association, one of the dynamic figures at the conference.

FREEDOM'S STAKE IN NORTH AFRICA AND THE MIDDLE EAST

Four hundred delegates coming from forty-four cities in ten states, among them representatives of thirty-six national organizations, took part in the all-day conference of The Nation Associates on Freedom's Stake in North Africa and the Middle East, held on Sunday, May 25, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York. Seven hundred persons attended the closing session that evening, a dinner-forum on Arab-Israel Peace—Key to Stability in the Middle East.

A distinguished group of speakers participated in the conference. They included Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt; Senator Estes Kefauver;* Ambassador L. N. Palar of Indonesia; David Goitein, Minister Plenipotentiary of Israel; Senator S. R. Shafaq of Iran; Jean Louis Mandereau, director of the Missions Division of the U. N. Technical Assistance Administration; Dr. Clarence E. Pickett, honorary secretary of the American Friends Service Committee; Professor E. A. Speiser, chairman of the Department of Oriental Studies of the University of Pennsylvania; Roger Baldwin, chairman of the International League for the Rights of Man; Kingsley Martin, editor of the New Statesman and Nation of London; Dr. Dewey Anderson, executive director of the Public Affairs Institute; and Freda Kirchwey, editor of The Nation and president of The Nation Associates. Arthur Garfield Hays presided at the closing dinner forum.

From the addresses by the speakers and the discussion

* Senator Kefauver was detained in California and his speech was read by his New York campaign manager, Boris Kostelanetz.

DAY SESSIONS

Imperialism, Nationalism, and Feudalism

Friendly Nationalism

By L. N. PALAR

Permanent Representative of Indonesia in the United Nations

It is my contention that the struggle of any country whatsoever to free itself from foreign domination—with the paramount purpose in mind of giving its own people every possible opportunity for political, economic and cultural development—can certainly not be qualified as being hostile to democracy.

Let us consider the matter of Egyptian nationalism, but let us first establish that Egypt is presently being ruled in accordance with current procedures of parliamentary democracy. Concerning the question of the Sudan, the Egyptian nationalists contend that the majority of the Sudanese wish to belong to the Egyptian kingdom. If this is so indeed, and I personally have no reason to doubt that, then Egyptian nationalism coincides with Sudanese nationalism and there is no violation of democracy. If it should be proven, however, by plebiscite or by whatsoever other procedure might be chosen, that the majority of the Sudanese people do not want to be included in the Egyptian kingdom, then it would have to be said that Egyptian nationalism is an imperialistic current and would have to be branded as the foe of democracy.

The Egyptian demand for the evacuation of the strategic Suez Canal Zone is certainly not anti-democratic. To the contrary! But this endeavor is directed against those countries which have dominating positions in the Middle East. The tragedy of the whole affair lies in the fact that these countries form the nucleus of West European democracy. This struggle, necessary to the proper development of democracy in the Middle East, is undoubtedly weakening the position of the Western democracies in the present raging cold war. However, the situation need not be perpetuated. If the democracies are prepared to abandon their politically obsolete, dominating positions in the Middle East—if they are prepared to abandon their from the floor there emerged ■ the consensus of the sessions the following points respecting the policies of the Western democratic world in the highly strategic area under discussion:

1. That there is need for ■ revision of those policies in terms of an understanding that security cannot be achieved through military arrangements alone.

2. That security is indivisible: for the Middle East, and consequently for the world, security lies in winning the loyalty of the people.

3. That the loyalty of the people cannot be won without a recognition of the profound revolution against feudalism and colonialism which is taking place in that area.

4. That the dynamics of democracy should be applied through an over-all plan of assistance to countries of the Middle East, based on recognition of the meaning of that revolution.

5. That the stability of the area, indispensable to security, cannot be achieved unless there is a settlement of the Arab-Israel war.

6. That the Western world, while recognizing that Arab-Israel peace can come about only as the result of direct negotiations between the interested parties, should encourage such negotiations by offering assistance in the development of the area.

In the pages which follow we publish condensations of the principal addresses.

imperialistic, nationalistic policy, an anti-democratic element in these great democracies—they can rest assured that they will no longer be troubled by Middle East nationalism. Rather, they will find there support and friends in the defense of democracy.

Hostility to the West

By ROGER N. BALDWIN

President, International League for the Rights of Man

If the United States had invested as much in pro-democracy as in anti-communism, we would not be confronted as a nation with the unpopularity of our foreign policy. To Arabs the struggle between communism and democracy seems wholly secondary to their struggle against colonialism. They feel that if we really mean to stand by democracy we must stand by national independence.

Everywhere in the Middle East this issue of national independence has gained unprecedented strength. And everywhere in the Arab states I found hostility not only to the great colonial powers but also to the United States as the backer of French rule in North Africa and of British intervention in Egypt. It is a startling fact that while the Arab states have outlawed the Communist parties and regard communism as an enemy of the Moslem religion, they tend to turn toward Russia as their ultimate hope if the West fails them.

Human rights for the Middle East, where religious intolerance makes life difficult for minorities, cannot be achieved until foreign influences are removed and the road thus cleared for internal reforms of feudal oligarchies. Popular forces for those reforms are now weak. Human rights will be able to develop only under independence and with the aid of the United Nations.

Moroccan Bases

By DR. BENJAMIN RIVLIN

Professor of Political Science, Brooklyn College

In their feverish haste to establish American air bases in Morocco, United States military planners have neglected to take into account one very important factor—the loyalty of the native population. The United States negotiated the agreement for the Moroccan bases with France as if it were negotiating the establishment of bases in Brittany, Normandy, or any other part of France. No recognition was taken of the fact that Morocco was a Protectorate of France, possessing a sovereignty entirely separate and distinct from that of France.

The United States should have found it wiser to consult with the Sultan, the legitimate sovereign of Morocco, so as to get his accord for this unprecedented and very special request. Instead the Sultan heard about the decision to construct United States air bases in his country through the press. The undermining effect that these developments had on United States prestige among native populations and their leaders throughout French North Africa cannot be overestimated.

The American act has been justified as a matter of expediency and as part of a policy of "first things first." Time magazine, writing of the American bases in Morocco, rationalized the situation with an analogy: "After some misgivings, Americans on the scene have now pretty well convinced themselves that to be distracted by colonial problems in the present emergency would be like a fire engine's crew on the way to a fire noticing that the streets are dirty, and stopping to clean up the litter." As an American who was on the scene, I want to register my most emphatic disagreement with this conclusion. Colonialism is not litter on the street—it is part of the fire.

The only way in which the United States can win is by identifying itself with the struggle of colonial peoples all over the world for a better life, and for self-government. This is the tradition of American policy of long standing which is being disregarded. It is the distinct impression that was left with me, and which I daresay is shared by many others who have been in North Africa recently, that the Arab nationalists are taking a cue from the French neutralists and are biding their time. When the chips will be down, they will hardly rally to the side of the United States, for nothing has been done to make them like us. Under these circumstances, will not the effectiveness of our bases in Morocco be undermined?

Iran's Problems

By DR. S. R. SHAFAGH

Member of the Iranian Senate

Iran's freedom is at stake primarily because of economic reasons. Due to various factors—power politics, imperialism from without and a sort of feudalism from within, and two world wars—Iran is seriously hit by poverty. To fight this desperate situation we need religious insight, faith, and real appreciation of human values with the moral support of the free world. But also we are in urgent need of economic help.

Once the economic problem of the country begins to approach solution, a series of radical reforms is bound to come. Let us not forget that Iran and the rest of the Middle East countries have not had much time for improvement; the movement toward modernization and democratization in the Middle East is hardly half a century old. The Orient is backward and under-developed, but it is no longer slumbering. Among the reforms urgently needed and bound to come is the land reform. Distribution of extensive property holdings among small proprietors is one method. His Majesty, the Shah of Iran, has personally initiated this idea in Iran by actually distributing his own royal lands. But there are enormous social, psychological, and economic obstacles in the way which time alone can solve.

To those of Iran's friends in great countries like the United States, who sometimes ask somewhat petulantly what else and what more can they do to help the Middle East get on its feet, I would answer, "Use perseverance and patience, help with all means, for there is no 'I' and 'you' in the world any more, but there is only 'we.'"

The Way to Strength

By KINGSLEY MARTIN

Editor, The New Statesman and Nation

One great underlying difference between America and Western Europe is that war seems to you a great evil that you would survive, while to us it would be a final catastrophe. In short, Great Britain is a base for United States bombers and, as such, expendable. If such considerations apply to Britain, how much more do they apply to many other United States bases!

The most important fact of our period of history is the revolution in Asia and the revolution that is shaping all over Africa and among colored peoples all over the world. In the Middle Eastern countries, which I've visited recently, arms-giving does not produce "positions of strength." I asked one dictator, who complained that the West did not arm him more thoroughly, why he wanted arms; he replied that he needed them to secure himself against the Jews, and it took little more inquiry to discover that he also needed an army to guard against possible revolt among his subjects and that the Moslem movement which is now sweeping over all the territory from Morocco to Pakistan, would ultimately use the arms to turn the Western powers out of the Middle East. The idea of using them against Russia has not remotely occurred to these people. Why should it? Russia has not harmed them and to them our "defense of the Middle East" means merely domination and occupation by Western imperialists.

The world situation is not simply a sharp division between two great blocs. This is illusion. The truth is that a very large part of the world is only anxious not to be involved, not to be conquered by Russia and liberated by America or conquered by America and liberated by Russia! They want no part of it. In some circumstances of course they would fight; the circumstances are their own liberty. And here comes a complication. Liberty to the mass of colored people of the world means first owning the land they themselves cultivate and, secondly, not being dominated by a foreign power. Our job then is to accept this revolution and see how far we can cooperate with it and perhaps influence it into democratic channels.

How do you make "positions of strength"? First, you aid, if you can, governments which genuinely represent popular feeling and which have a chance of creating progressive economies which will improve the standard of living of the people and make them believe in their own future. Then there is a chance of that internal strength which is the real strength—the difference between France and Britain in 1940! That means less arms and more

Point Four and a much less dictatorial and more modest effort to understand and help. It means cooperation with the popular and sometimes actually revolutionary forces which are nationalist and Socialist and anti-Communist. There have been such instances in Asia, and I should add as the most spectacular examples of recent policy the two new free countries which are coming to birth in West Africa where communism is nothing because the hope of economic and social freedom is before the people. This is the only sound anti-communism because it offers a better alternative hope.

Technical Assistance

By JEAN LOUIS MANDEREAU
*Director of Missions Division of U. N.
Technical Assistance Administration*

It was after World War II that technical assistance took the shape we know today—one of the major developments of the centuries, and I should say a turning point in the history of relations between countries. The new approach is international instead of national or private. It is a decision of most of the nations of the world to get together and to bring into a common pool expert knowledge, what each of them can contribute, with the idea that each country could draw from this pool all the technical help it needed. It becomes a world-wide enterprise, a chain of good will, where each country gives what it can and expects to receive what it needs. It is the United Nations Technical Assistance program.

In this expression the word "united" takes its real meaning. They are united not to meet in a General Assembly once a year, or in commission or committee, to quarrel or argue, but they are united in a common fight against poverty, illiteracy, disease, to build together a better world to live in.

The United Nations, at the time they launched the program, set down a certain number of guiding principles. I want to draw your attention to two or three of them.

Technical assistance shall be rendered by the participating organizations only in agreement with the governments concerned and on the basis of requests received from them. United Nations does not try to impose some type of help to governments, and full responsibility for requesting the help lies with the government alone.

An important principle of the technical assistance program is that the technical assistance furnished shall not be a means of foreign economic and political interference in the internal affairs of the country concerned and not be accompanied by any considerations of a political nature. I want to draw your attention especially to that principle because that makes all the difference between the United Nations Technical Assistance program and the other bilateral programs. Our experts are sent as technicians only, not as ambassadors. During their mission they forget as much as possible their nationality, to be exclusively at the service of the country which has requested their help.

Technical assistance cannot solve all problems confronting underdeveloped areas, but it is a necessary element in the solution.

Healthy Nationalism

By DAVID GOITEIN
Minister Plenipotentiary of Israel

For four centuries all the Middle East countries were part of the Turkish Empire, and national movements in the true sense scarcely existed. Any signs of nationalism in the twentieth century were ruthlessly crushed. In the First World War English romanticism on the one hand, and the collapse of the Turkish Empire on the other, did much to make possible the rise of Arab nationalism.

The Sword and Ibn Saud, with the Koran, made Arabia free, and the discovery of oil in that country and its exploitation by United States companies made it rich. But the wealth is very largely in the hands of a handful. Nationalism today means the throwing off of foreign interference. It is more concerned with flag-flying than with the raising of the standard of living. It has not yet shown that broadness of outlook which would allow it to recognize the validity of a national movement other than its own. This explains the Arab countries' failure to recognize Israel.

Israel has shown that democracy can flourish in the Middle East. There is hope from the example of Israel for a healthy nationalism in the Middle East.

Arab-Israel Peace—Key to Middle East Stability

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt was given a standing ovation by the audience which filled the Starlight Roof of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel for the closing dinner session of The Nation Associates conference. Prompted by attacks against The Nation prior to the dinner, Mrs. Roosevelt prefaced her address with a challenge to those who are undermining American democratic practices and with a reaffirmation of her own belief that American freedoms must be preserved. Her prefatory remarks follow:

"I thought that I could not be with you tonight because I had so many things that I had set out to do today. But I decided that it would be wise to come since I understood that there had been some attacks made. And I believe that it is a great mistake not to stand up for people, even when you differ with them, if you feel that they are trying to do things that will help in our country."

"I think we have become a little too much afraid of what certain groups may say. It is true that sometimes we may make mistakes; sometimes people nowadays have to think more carefully than they used to. I can remember a time when you didn't really have to worry very much about the people you happened to meet. You do now, apparently. But I don't like that.

"I think we should try not to make mistakes. Having tried to avoid mistakes, if we decide to do something which certain groups may attack us for, the attack should not be accepted without proof. This is one of the things that I think we are suffering from in these days—accusations which do their harm before they can be disproved."

"One of the things we must be concerned about today is to preserve our own freedom. I think that it is essential to learn that while we have to fight against things that we consider wrong, we should not do it through fear. We should do it through intelligent education."

First Need: Resettlement

By MRS. ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

The subject of the evening is one in which I am very much interested because I have just been briefly in three Arab states and in Israel. I could not possibly know a great deal after the short time that I was there, but I have had considerable contact with people from those countries in the United Nations and through that contact I have learned some things.

Reason no longer really operates when you arrive at a point of emotion such as has been reached between the Arab States and Israel. Israel, strangely, is more objective—though perhaps it is not really so strange, because it is always easier for persons to remain objective when they have the edge in their favor. And I think that, in the war between the Arabs and Israel, probably Israel had the edge in its favor.

I sit in a United Nations committee, the Humanitarian, Educational and Cultural Committee, where I think we should behave as charitably as possible and at least preserve the amenities. The U. S. S. R. and the U. S. A. representatives manage to say good morning to each other, even though as a rule, between times, we attack each other quite vigorously. The Israeli delegate sits between two Arab delegates and I have never known the Arab representatives to say good morning, or apparently to recognize that the Israeli delegate exists. That is not exactly conducive to the best sort of cooperation!

But once you have been in the Near Eastern countries, the impression you come away with is that if the United Nations succeeds in resettling those poor, wretched Arab refugees, who are in worse camps than almost any I have ever seen, then there would be a chance of getting somewhere. And there is nothing to be done but to resettle them. They have been trained both by Communists who have come in and by the Arab leaders to get hold of you wherever you meet them and to tell you: "We want to go home." You know it is a slogan, because they say it in unison. Most of them do not talk English, but you walk into a school room and all the little boys get up together and say "We want to go home." And you know quite well there is no home for them to go to in most cases.

If finally they are resettled, I think the logic of the situation will gradually bring about Arab-Israel cooperation.

And nothing is more desirable, because Israel has a great deal of administrative and organizing ability, and would be in a position to help.

In the Arab states there is a stirring. Here are countries that have just recently become free; they are very nationalistic because their freedom is a new thing. The leaders have not had much training as yet in administration and organization. Their people as a whole want not just to exist any longer; they want to live. Their governments know that, but they do not quite know how to meet these desires for an improved standard of living. I think if one could just transfer a little of the ability to administer and organize into the Arab governments, their business circles, their agriculture, one would find the problems of the Arab countries solving themselves very rapidly.

Israel at present probably has the greatest capacity in the area for using any aid that comes to it, and if the Israelis could help in the development of other countries, I think it would be the way to remove the fear that the Arabs have. The Arabs are not very logical because in one breath they tell you, "We are impressed by the fact that Israel is receiving all this immigration. Israel is a very small country and some fine day they are going to be crowded and they are going to take us over." Then in the next breath they say, "Ah, but the Arabs have long memories and some day we will drive the Israeli people into the sea." Well, the two just do not go together. It is not logical.

So you are left with the feeling that you have to live through the present period, you have to put everything you can into trying to clear up the refugee situation, and then perhaps, with help from the rest of the world, you may get the cooperation which will make of the Near East a stabilizing element which is badly needed in that area. Once you have cooperation, I believe Israel can make its best contribution and the Arab States can develop and be a real factor for peace in the world.

Need for Boldness

By ESTES KEFAUVER

U. S. Senator from Tennessee

Peace, like the world, is no longer divisible. That is why unrest in any part of the world carries with it the seeds of danger to all of us. Today, in an area of over one million square miles, there are seeds of unrest which profoundly endanger our own peace and security.

An armistice exists between Israel and the Arab states, but it is significant that although that armistice has been in existence for four years, no formal settlement of the Palestine war has taken place.

It is clear that the democratic world, especially the United States, has a role to play in this situation—a role which it has not yet played with either boldness or imagination. That role is to create a policy which makes it clear that the democratic world is deeply concerned with the Middle East and with the settlement of the Palestine war. Obviously, that settlement can come about only by direct negotiations between the parties in interest. But the democratic world can make it clear why it wishes that settlement to take place and thus to influence, in a constructive way, the approach to a settlement by both sides.

The Western world needs both Israel and the Arab world. If there is a price on peace in the Middle East, that price must be no less than security.

The power of resistance is in the minds of men and not primarily in their weapons. Until we have captured the loyalty of the Arab peoples, we have not arranged for our security or theirs, simply through the acquisition of military bases. The way to capture the loyalty of the Arab peoples is through a demonstration to them of the vitality, resiliency, adaptability, and dynamics of democracy at work for their benefit. A bold, imaginative program, initiated by the United States, based on the concepts of democracy and adapted to the needs of the backward peoples, could, at one and the same time, fulfill the needs of the peoples, develop one of the richest areas of the world, and satisfy our strategic needs.

Because this can be undertaken, two things are necessary: (1) That the concept of the democratic world should be geared to security, not alone in terms of military bases, but in terms of the loyalty of peoples. (2) That stability be established in the area itself to make such a plan possible.

A first requirement for stability is the settlement of the Arab-Israel war. The time has come for both sides to recognize that each exists and is there to stay.

With respect to Israel, it seems more than foolish to me to think that a country four years old, still struggling to maintain its economic balance, occupying a tiny quarter of the world of some 8,500 square miles, and with a population of less than 2,000,000, could be a threat to seven Arab states occupying an area of more than 1,000,000 square miles, with a population of some 36,000,000. If the fears are real, then there is one way of assuring that the so-called expansionist aims of Israel shall not be realized. It is to settle the Arab-Israel war by formal agreement.

Arab-Israel peace is indispensable to the Western world if only on the narrow grounds that the Western world cannot depend upon military arrangements which do not include both the Arabs and the Israelis. And it is clear that the Arab world will not, assuming there are no other reasons, be a party to a regional pact including Israel as long as it believes that a state of belligerency exists.

Up until now the Western world, wishing for peace, has done little to promote that peace. It can no longer delay taking sides for peace, not by way of favor to Israel or the Arab world. It can take sides for peace in the interests of the people of the whole area and the relevant security of the rest of us. It can place a price on peace—the offer of helping the Middle East to emerge into the twentieth century by the road of democracy.

Steps to Stability

By Dr. E. A. SPEISER, Chairman,
Department of Oriental Studies,
University of Pennsylvania

The Near East is the world's traditional center of gravity. Freedom and sanity have the greatest possible stake in the global center of gravity. The precarious balance between an uneasy truce and a total war can be upset most readily in that sensitive region. Continued tension between Israel and the Arab states is an irritant that should not be underestimated. Peace in the Near East is not just a dutiful slogan but a doubly urgent need.

A patient may be cured when his illness has been diagnosed correctly. This has not been done by and large so far as the ailing Near East is concerned. The situation is made to order for political medicine men. They may be inspired by ulterior motives, ignorance, or honest conviction. In any case, the results are doomed to be negative. In 1947 these healers knew but one theme: Palestine. Cure that sore and all your troubles in the Near East will vanish! When the Anglo-Iranian dispute reached its climax last year, the label on the cure-all was changed to promise relief from oil troubles. And a little later, when the scene had shifted to Egypt, the old Suez formula was dusted off.

It should be amply clear by now that none of these three diagnoses could be the exclusive answer to the problems of the Near East. Common to all the Arab states is the stark poverty of the vast majority of the people.

In the world of today stagnation can only mean steady retrogression. With conditions growing progressively worse instead of better, even docile and apathetic populations cannot always be counted upon to remain in check.

The stability of the Near East is vital to the stability of the world; any help towards the goal is no more than a question of enlightened self-interest. We must face the problems of the Near East in the order of their importance. The Arab-Israel issue has knocked things badly out of focus. Responsible magazines in this country still sound as though little else mattered. Millions of their readers have been given the impression that Israel won the war only because of the active help of the United States and Britain. They have forgotten that diplomatic recognition alone does not win wars; that Britain backed the Arabs to the bitter end; and that in the last analysis it was internal Arab weakness more than any other factor that caused the Arab defeat. For the same reason it is the Arab states rather than Israel that can now be seen gravitating toward communism in spite of the confident predictions to the contrary which we all heard five years ago. Nor is the frequent claim justified that our influence in the Near East suffered an irreparable blow as a result of the Palestine war. Britain's die-hard pro-Arab policy utterly failed to produce the expected dividends. The prevailing hostility to the West cannot be ascribed to any single factor.

In terms of foreign policy, two extreme moves have recently been proposed in regard to the Near East. One looks to arming the Arabs to the teeth in a desperate move to stop the spread of communism. Nothing is less likely to have the desired effect. Even if the Arabs could be made ten times as strong as they now are, their combined armies could not hold up Russia for many days if it came to a show of arms. The only ones to benefit, although no more than temporarily, would be the forces now in power. A good method, in short, to make the Near East ripe, if not safe for communism.

The other policy has found a persuasive advocate in Justice William O. Douglas. Mr. Douglas wants us to declare ourselves openly in favor of a revolution against feudalism and to promote such a revolution actively. But by completely repudiating the existing ruling elements we can only precipitate chaos, and with it the very kind of power vacuum that beckons to the 'isms which we wish to contain.

It follows that a constructive policy for the Near East must envisage two stages. The first would be a transitional one, designed to stop the existing imbalance from getting worse. The cry of interference is certain to be raised but could safely be discounted in advance. The next stage would involve a long-term scheme calculated to aid and develop liberal forces—accompanied by the hope that the lid will stay on long enough.

But neither plan can succeed unless based on a full and resolute agreement among the major Western powers. The real change, of course, must come from within, preferably through gradual evolution. Only then could the Near East and the West meet on a basis of mutual respect and understanding, as partners in a common enterprise.

Peace Program

By CLARENCE PICKETT

Honorary Secretary, American Friends Service Committee, 1947 Co-Winner of the Nobel Peace Prize

In the eyes of the Arabs we have surrendered the position of neutrality. But this is no excuse for our not doing everything we can to bring peace to the Middle East. For it is quite true that there will be no stability in that part of the world until there is peace there. And so long as there is no stability in the Middle East, this cannot but disturb the peace of the entire world.

Clarence Pickett

It is my judgment that peace will come between these two contending parties by piecemeal, and the most important first step I should consider to be a settlement of claims to property owned by Arab refugees now remaining in the state of Israel.

I have talked with an Arab merchant who lived in Jaffa who told me that he left behind a dry goods store with a stock valued at $100,000. He was told by the Arab radio that the Jewish-Arab war would only last a short time, perhaps two weeks, that the Arabs would drive the Jews out of Palestine, when he could return and continue in his business, but he has never heard anything of that business since that time. He ought to have compensation for his loss. I am fully conscious that a much larger number of Jews who left Europe are in a similar position. The move now under way to determine compensation to Jews for property loss, especially in Germany and Austria, must not be allowed to fail. I know that Jews have left Iraq with no adjustment thus far for their possessions left behind. This whole question of compensation is one of international significance.

Closely allied to this is the question of boundaries. A permanent settlement of this question will no doubt be difficult. The Arabs look upon the heavy immigration coming into Israel with apprehension; they fully expect that there will be attempts to push those boundaries outward, under the claim of lebensraum. I am not saying that they are justified in this belief, but the conviction is there; it will not be allayed until boundaries are settled.

Equally important is the resettlement of the Arab refugee. He is now starting his fourth year as a pauper and a wanderer. At the sixth assembly of the United Nations, authorization was given to expend $250,000,000 over the next three years, not only in providing relief for those refugees but in enabling the United Nations agency caring for them to resettle them. But the resistance of the Arab states to such resettlement continues. It is not only because of lack of facilities. Iraq and Syria could to their national advantage absorb most of these families on land most of which is now unproductive. But Arab states have continued their propaganda that the refugee must be permitted to return to his home in Israel. I do not myself see how it is possible for any considerable number to return because of the heavy population already settled there. I suggest that a commission made up of refugees themselves, selected by the United Nations, should be permitted to visit Israel to see what is going on, determining for themselves whether it would be feasible, wise, or possible for Arab refugees to resettle inside the state of Israel. It is my expectation that it would further the willingness of the Arab states to permit resettlement elsewhere of those who say that they have concluded they do not want to return to Israel, but wish to establish themselves in one or the other of the Arab states.

It seems to me that the suggestion of Charles Malik of Lebanon might well be taken seriously by both government and private groups in the United States, in thinking in terms of a very great expansion of modern education.

Closely allied to this is the importance of missions of religion of various kinds in this part of the world. It is my conviction that there will not be peace in the Middle East as long as we think purely in terms of economic and political development and secular education.

The development of what we usually know as technical assistance or Point

Four in this part of the world is of very great importance; and yet, if it is simply carrying technical skills to the Middle East without a recognition of the sensitivity of those to whom the representatives of technical skills go, it is likely to be resisted. Certainly it will be resisted, and in my judgment appropriately so, if it is put in terms of purchasing their allegiance as allies in a power struggle.

United Nations Role

By FRED A KIRCHWEY

Editor of The Nation

Peace between Israel and the Arab states would be a bulwark against international intrigue, against the attempt of various partisan interests to use the miseries and wrongs of the peoples as cards in the game of Cold War. Security in that region is not to be found in bases, by themselves, nor in deals and pacts, nor in the control of oil resources or sea routes. These may look substantial and reassuring to the nations that control them, but they are in fact no stronger than the human situation that surrounds them: the political stability of the countries themselves, the relations among them, and the health and well-being and prospects of the peoples in them.

External activities looking toward peace or toward social and economic improvement should be centered in the United Nations—including those financed by the United States. The United Nations is still the only viable instrument for mediation, conciliation, and also for the technical and financial assistance so desperately required by the countries around the Eastern Mediterranean.

I do not excuse the stubborn and unreasonable attitude of the Arab states when I say that their intransigence on the issue of peace with Israel is partly grounded in justified resentment at the reluctance of the great Western nations to accept the meaning of the revolution that today threatens colonialism and imperialism in all their forms.

Only the Western powers themselves can end that resentment and, in the effort to do so, the United States must inevitably take the lead. What we need is a new foreign policy in that whole turbulent and sensitive area, one which backs the struggle against colonial control and foreign financial domination and at the same time encourages, within that process, the even more fundamental revolt against ancient and evil practices of land ownership and human exploitation.

The tragic aspect of the Arab attitude is that in the matter of Israel it tends to defeat its own quite legitimate end. For peace with Israel would bring to the Arab states many benefits and few sacrifices. Once peace was achieved, these states would find that they had no stronger support anywhere for their proper national ambitions than in Israel itself, while the stimulus to trade and to other sorts of economic progress would be beyond computation. Today these facts are obscured by the fog of resentment and hostility that hangs over Arab-Israel relations.

How is this fog to be dispelled? The first and most important step would be the opening of direct negotiations on specific issues between Israel and its neighbors. The last two years have surely proved that no real agreements can be achieved until Arabs and Israelis sit down together, whether in the presence of a mediator or alone. Through direct diplomatic interchange, I am convinced, common interests would emerge, producing workable compromises on the main points dividing Israel and its neighbors.

A settlement of the refugee problem can be arrived at only on the basis of recognition by the Arabs that no considerable number of Arab refugees can be repatriated in Israel.

A most earnest effort must be made by the Israelis to convince their Arab neighbors of what, to be sure, they long ago officially promised, namely, that a generous program of compensation for properties lost by refugees—a reciprocal program, of course, since Jewish refugees from Arab countries must obviously be included—will promptly be formulated and carried out.

The Israelis must remove any honest fears that may still exist among the Arab states that Israel intends to try to expand by force its present uncomfortably narrow boundaries.

Admission that Israel does and will continue to exist, combined with willingness to meet and to talk, would provide the first bit of convincing proof that the Arab world does want peace rather than a state of suspended war.

The British Case

THE STRUGGLE FOR EUROPE.

By Chester Wilmot. Harper and Brothers. $5.

WE HAVE now reached the reverse-lend-lease stage in the matter of military criticism. Until recently accounts of the war in Western Europe such as those of Ingersoll, Eisenhower, and Bradley presented it largely from an American point of view. Two of these authors, Ingersoll and Bradley, were sharply critical of British strategy, tactics, and military leadership. In the five published volumes of Churchill's monumental "History of the Second World War," he has been critical of American political and military leadership only in the fifth volume. The Prime Minister has been careful, however, to make his criticisms of military operations solely on military grounds. Thus it remained for Mr. Wilmot, an Australian war correspondent, to make the first presentation of what has been called "the British case."

Reduced to its simplest terms, this case holds that while we Americans were excellent producers of military machines, we lacked military sophistication in the matter of their employment. In plain language we did not know where to operate the planes, tanks, ships, and divisions we produced during the war in order to gain the greatest political advantage and military security after the war. The Marshall-Eisenhower strategy of a cross-channel attack and a broad-front advance into Germany made it impossible for the Allies to defeat Hitler in 1944. Our northern route into Germany allowed the Red Army to occupy every capital in Eastern and Southeastern Europe except Athens. The destruction visited upon Western Europe in the course of our campaigns prevented the emergence of any balance against Russia after the war. We defeated Hitler in such a way as to ensure the triumph of Stalin. In the Far East (which is not properly within the sphere of Mr. Wilmot's volume) our determination to prevent a revival of colonialism hampered the British. Thus, in one way or another, most of the evils of the present-day world are traceable to the strategical blindness and military ineptness of Roosevelt's war-time advisers: Marshall, Arnold, King, and Eisenhower.

In dealing with a book as massive, as thoroughly documented, and as clearly written as that of Mr. Wilmot, three warnings may be in order. First, one should remember that the size of a book has nothing to do with the soundness of its message. Secondly, the fact that an author has read all the printed literature in a given field does not automatically make him a dependable guide to that literature. And finally, it is helpful to recall that "clearness is so preeminently a characteristic of truth that it often passes for truth itself."

Mr. Wilmot has given us one of the finest accounts available of operations in Western Europe, but he has attempted to use this splendid operational history as a scaffolding to hold up the superstructure of an untenable political thesis.

The Wilmot thesis that the triumph of communism in Eastern and Southeastern Europe was primarily due to the refusal of Roosevelt and his military advisers to follow British strategical advice simply will not bear examination. He criticizes the action which men took in 1941-45 on the basis of the knowledge they possessed at that time but he makes his criticism in the light of fuller knowledge in 1951. Mr. Churchill, a writer with considerably greater experience in the field of military history, long ago adopted a policy of never criticizing any politico-military decision after the event unless he had submitted a warning against it in writing before the decision was taken.

What man in Britain or America knew enough about Russian capacities and intentions in 1941-43 to justify basing our fundamental strategy for 1944-45 on the assumption that Communist Russia would present an immediate post-war threat to Western Europe? Did Mr. Churchill, who helped Tito to attain control of Yugoslavia, know that communism was going to be a more dangerous menace than fascism? Did the journalists, the men of Mr. Wilmot's profession, warn us at that time against the Communist threat to come? Some, I am sorry to say, of those who screamed for a second front in 1942-43 out of fear that Russia might succumb to the German attack, now complain that Marshall and Eisenhower should have conducted the war primarily to check Russia.

Mr. Wilmot's book stops with the end of hostilities in Europe in 1945. He therefore does not cover the period of Allied demobilization which contributed much more to the triumph of communism in Eastern and Southeastern Europe than the matter of where our armies fought during the war. The fate of Czechoslovakia in 1948 plainly shows that unless Britain and the United States were willing to maintain armies large enough to offset the effect of the Red Army, and unless we were prepared to keep large bodies of troops in long-term occupation of these areas, it would not have helped much to have liberated the countries concerned. It was the power vacuum created by the demobilization of the Allied armies that permitted Soviet Russia to dominate Eastern and Southeastern Europe.

Mr. Wilmot really knows this. For, after writing seven hundred pages of special pleading to make a case against Roosevelt's administration of the war, he admits that there was "an element of the inevitable" about the Soviet triumph after the war. He is forced to conclude that neither the British nor the American governments could have won public support for a policy of conducting the war against Hitler with the secondary objective of checking Stalin. In the last few pages of his book, Mr. Wilmot actually draws some comfort from the American blunders during the war. For, he says, "the Americans had to find out for themselves that to strive for victory alone is not enough and that the balance of power must be the basis of peace. They had to learn from their own experience the difficulty of dealing with the Russians. They had to extend the hand of friendship and have it spurned. . . . In the years following the war, Truman's policy of firmness and preparedness—and of generous economic and military support for Europe—would hardly have commanded such wide public support in the United States, if Roosevelt had not so diligently and sincerely sought to win the trust and cooperation of the Soviet Union."

If Mr. Wilmut had said this at the beginning of his book and then devoted his unmistakable talents to writing a strictly operational narrative, all students of military affairs would have been indebted to him. They would even have forgiven him for his marked bias in favor of Field Marshal Montgomery.

Men and History

HISTORY AND HUMAN RELATIONS. By Herbert Butterfield. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THE comments of an urbane and cultured man upon his craft almost always make for good reading, and this latest volume by the eminent historian Herbert Butterfield is no exception. "History and Human Relations" contains eight essays, each of them dealing with a particular problem in historiography or the philosophy of history. It is a very professional book, not in the sense that the layman cannot profit by it, but in the sense that it presents reflections drawn from long experience in a particular endeavor.

The title implies the unifying theme. The author continually calls attention to the fact that individuals, with all their different emotions and prejudices, are after all the source of history. They are neither completely the products of their past nor the autonomous makers of their future, but the worst mistake a historian can make, says Butterfield, is to forget that human beings are emotionally complex. Man, if not the measure of all things, is at least the measure of history, and in the light of this belief Butterfield examines such questions as the Marxist approach to history, "official" histories issued by governments, and the extent to which the historian can make moral judgments in his writing. He always points out the limitations of his craft, showing that histories, and not a history, can be produced.

Perhaps the book is best described by part of a sentence found in it: "... in teaching or reading or writing history the richest wisdom and the finest educational nourishment come from ... the comments that are made in asides, the places where private views and the results of personal experience leak out, the things, shrewd and intimate, that a teacher throws in just for love."

CARL F. HOVDE

Faithful Disciple?

THIS CROOKED WAY. By Elizabeth Spencer. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

MISS SPENCER'S second novel is interesting for several reasons; while she is in her own right a talented and skilful member of the Southern regional group who have attracted so much attention during the last decade, she seems perfectly content to work within the confines of a strictly Faulknerian scene, a faithful disciple of the master.

Her protagonist, Amos Dudley, who wrests a fortune from the rich Delta cotton country, is seen at successive stages of his compulsive career through the eyes of his boyhood friend, his wife's sister's child, his wife, and finally through his own eyes. This is a difficult technique to handle, and Miss Spencer carries it off with verve, giving us a series of oblique views of the central figure from the varied perspectives of those who thought they understood him best.

But the relations between people are so much akin to those which bind the members of Faulkner's society that there are times when the reader may be forgiven for suspecting that this novel is an extended parody. Everyone is profoundly concerned with motives, even though the motivations are never fully revealed, and even the most illiterate and incoherent hint darkly to one another of motives that are marvelously subtle and intellectually intricate.

This technique is carried over into the texture of the prose itself. There are pages when it is Miss Spencer's own, and very effective too, but there are also paragraphs which seem to have come straight from Faulkner without pause for individual identification. Amos says: "One [desire] was to see Ary's face again like I saw it that first day above the horse's mane, like a face not in the world, though it had been in the world all right, but was by her own will and nothing else whipped up clean above the world and outside, knowing she ought not to be out there with just men showing off that mare and in her own pride not caring, and in her own pride being proud of the mare, and of herself too, so that not even my pride in her which got so out of hand could quite manage to unsettle her."

The question which has not been answered in "This Crooked Way," but which may possibly be clarified in Miss Spencer's future writing, is whether really fruitful creative work can be done by novelists who appropriate whole the seductive but highly individual cosmology of William Faulkner.

WASSILY KANDINSKY (1866-1944) is on view at Knoedler's (through June 6) in twenty-six paintings lent by his widow and never before exhibited in New York. Although this exhibition is only half of what was recently shown in Boston at the Institute of Contemporary Art, twenty-four of the other canvases are accessible to New Yorkers, since they have returned to their permanent home in the Museum of Non-Objective Art.

Despite these losses, the current exhibition affords a nearly adequate coverage of Kandinsky's work in its major phases. The earliest examples, L'air clair and La vieille ville, date from 1902; the latest, from two years before his death. The Fauve period, which for Kandinsky was about 1908, is well represented, as is the work of the final twenty years. There are good examples from 1910, the year of his first Improvisations (and the year of his book, "On the Spiritual in Art"). But there is nothing between 1910 and 1915, and only two examples between 1916 and 1920; and as only two others from the withdrawn canvases came from this decade, there was in Boston and there is here a decided gap, all the more unfortunate because this was Kandinsky's most daringly original period and probably his most creative. In the twenties, however, he continued in the same rich vein of freely moving forms exploding against strong diagonal braces and enlivened with textural interest. After 1930, or thereabouts, Kandinsky's designs hardened. The ruled line replaced the freely brushed contour; the flat, blond tone, the resonantly pigmented area. In addition, the scale came down from something broadly mural to something diminutive and fussy. Despite the grand synthesis claimed for these late works by the faithful, they are, in my opinion, merely pretty abstractions, without poetic content, and with more mechanical than formal interest. Some of them fetched up recollections of scenery for the Chauve Souris (Parade of the Wooden Soldiers might almost be substituted as a title for Transparent, 1942). And all suggested the drier phases of work at the Bauhaus, where Kandinsky taught from the early 'twenties until 1934.

In a recent biography of her late husband, Sibyl Moholy-Nagy accentuates the fact that Kandinsky belonged to the older generation of the Bauhaus faculty. She quotes a student of the time: "So Moholy came to Weimar as 'the champion of youth', as we labeled him in contrast to the old faculty members Kandinsky, Feininger, and Klee who were between forty and fifty-five." Unlike Feininger and Klee, however, Kandinsky appears to have been strongly affected by the idiom of the younger Bauhaus artists in his own late work, even after political events had forced the Bauhaus to suspend operations. This late phase of his art, whatever its source, had little connection with the positive forces of his own previous work. It seems to have been grafted on, quite arbitrarily.

That Kandinsky developed slowly out of prevailing manners of painting is nothing against him. If he did not reach artistic maturity until he was past forty, neither did Goya nor Cézanne. But the early works are surprisingly unoriginal for so original a painter, and even the vaunted Fauve works of 1908 depend so heavily on French precedent, plus an admixture of Russian folk colorations, like juxtaposed magentas, tangerines, and violets, that it is not unjust to call them Folk Fauves. Apparently, the elimination of subject matter was indispensable for Kandinsky's art to evolve. Recent unpublished studies of his work have contrived to show a development of motives and habits of design, and so give a sense of momentum to the career. But the break which came around 1910 was nevertheless very sudden, and, in my opinion, its motivation was not sufficiently a pictorial one. Kandinsky's elimination of subject was, in its way, as literary as the discovery of a new subject, or of the discovery of Byron by Delacroix. The point I am arriving at so laboriously is that Kandinsky launched his new art on an idea, and that this is dangerous procedure for a painter. Simultaneously, he expounded the idea in a book, "On the Spiritual in Art." After 1910, his paintings depend on communion with mystical essences. For me, always skeptical of cosmic attempts in painting, it is something of a wonder that they are so often good paintings, freighted as they are with so much transcendental cargo.

It is important to distinguish between Kandinsky's ideas and his art. The former, which have enormously influenced the course of modern painting, for better and for worse, are at the root of the Kandinsky legend. The art, clouded by the legend, is too much worshipped and too little understood. Moholy-Nagy was right, I think, when he found Kandinsky's art in fundamental contrast to his own, because Kandinsky's "reminded me of an undersea world." One of the most beautiful of these sub-marines is a gray one (En gris, 1919), in poetically muted tones. Like the sea, Kandinsky is most intelligible on a vast scale: his small canvases are not only crowded but stunted in effect. He must have the liberation of vast space, but having it, he is in constant danger of going amorphous, like the sea's counter-currents. Personality easily drowns in them.

The visitor will not miss in Kandinsky's work numerous contemporary overtones. It is extraordinary how mid-twentieth century the best of these canvases seem. But it would be a bad mistake to conclude that the similarities are more than superficial, and that the younger abstract expressionists are merely his imitators. Several of them surpass him in physical sensuousness, or in mural force, or in the ability to weave space with pigment. Emily Genauer pointed out in a recent review that Trente (six times five black and white squares) is compartmented like an Adolf Gottlieb. But this is a late Kandinsky (1937), and Gottlieb has never shown signs of committing his soul to a check-board of any such rigidity.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

WRITING about the listener's experience of music—and writing here as diffusely and obscurely as elsewhere in his book "The Musical Experience"—Roger Sessions distinguishes four stages in its development: first, hearing ("following . . . the music in its continuity"), then enjoyment, then understanding ("He needs to be aware of the progression of the bass as well as the treble line; of a return to the principal key or to a subsidiary key; of a far-flung tonal span . . . as events which his ear witnesses and appreciates as a composition unfolds"), and finally discrimination. And with discrimination the listener becomes a critic: "The critic is, in fact, the listener who has become articulate, who has learned to put his judgments and his values into words."

This statement about the critic is correct as far as it goes, but incomplete. One thing to add is the assumption underlying the critic's public articulateness—that he can give his readers the benefit of powers as a listener greater than their own; another is the fact that these are greater powers not only of discrimination but of hearing and understanding. That is, to the listener who must witness and appreciate the course of events in a piece of music the critic is able to point out the "progression of the bass line," the "far-flung tonal span," and other details which the listener might otherwise not be aware of. (The primary and important aim of criticism, E. M. Forster has said, is to "consider the object in itself, as an entity, and tell us what it can about its life.")

But here we come to an interesting fact about Mr. Sessions's book. Writing about the musical experience of the composer, the performer, the listener, he has described the activity of each in relation to the course of events in a piece of music; and if this scheme of the book were continued with the critic Mr. Sessions would say that the course of events—which has been created by the composer and recreated by the performer, and which must be apprehended by the listener—is pointed out to the listener by the critic. Actually, however, Mr. Sessions, when he comes to discuss the critic, departs from the scheme of the book and says nothing about any activity of the critic in relation to the course of events in the piece of music, or even to its value. For Mr. Sessions the critic's "true function" is the exercise of powers of discrimination developed "to the point where he becomes conscious of values in a generalized sense" and can "contribute strongly to musical life through illumination of the real issues which are vital in any particular time and place." And in a state of hoarse moral fervor he summons the critic to his high duty. Formerly, he says, when our music was the imported product of a tradition developed elsewhere and the critic's task was to interpret that tradition to the American public, he had merely to "take due note of judgments and values that had already reached maturity elsewhere. Today, with the ever-increasing development of a rich musical life of our own, he is forced to swim in more perilous waters and to discover values of his own. It is small wonder that he often shows a certain reluctance to do this and takes refuge in writing long columns on the season's sixth performance of 'Tristan,' or indulging, to cite a ghastly example I shall never forget, in vituperation of Critic B because the latter had written an unfavorable review of a book by Critic C, of whom Critic A (the author of the review in question) approved because he (Critic C) had written disparagingly of Critic D's book on Mozart. A veritable tangle of critics, with poor Mozart, in this case representing the only actual music involved in the whole matter, four steps away!"

I was about to say that Mr. Sessions's idea of the situation fifty years ago—that the score of a European symphony was imported for the conductor together with a little box of European values for the critic—hadn't the slightest relation to reality, when I realized that there probably were critics who accepted any European work unthinkingly. But there were others who operated as a critic should—who listened for what life they could themselves discover in the symphony and made their own evaluations of it.

That is what the critic does today when he is confronted with a new symphony by an American. And today when he writes a long column on the season's sixth "Tristan" it isn't because he shrinks from the task of discovering the life in that symphony, but because a new singer named Flagstad is singing in "Tristan" for the first time and this too is something which calls for critical evaluation. So does a book about music, and it wasn't because I shrank from the task of dealing with Mozart's music (I had, only a couple of months earlier, dealt with the unfamiliar Concerto K.503 which Schnabel had played in New York for the first time) that I wrote the review of Einstein's "Mozart" in which I began with the observation that reviews of books sometimes were amusing performances to watch; cited the example of Virgil Thomson's "The Musical Scene" being condescended to in the Times by Mark Schubart; explained that I wasn't condescending to Mr. Schubart's youth but thinking of the quality of his own critical writing; went on to say that the performances on Einstein's book had been staggering, but that Thomson, whose reviews of books were usually poor, had made the only perceptive comment I had seen on this one; quoted his comment; and then took off from it with my own comments on the book. An untangled progression of thought; the "veritable tangle of critics" being what Mr. Sessions made of it (in a lecture a few years later at the Juilliard School of which Mr. Schubart was now Dean).

Which brings me to my last point.

Taking the critic's primary task to be the illumination not of issues but of the object—the piece of music, the book, the review of a book—that he has before him, I would say that this task imposes on him a duty: the duty of describing this object accurately, which means the duty of looking at it with an eye unaffected by friendship, by animosity, by appreciation or anticipation of a favor, or by anything else of this sort. Criticism, in other words, is one of the forms of human behavior, in which the critic has the duty, simply, of behaving honorably, and which does, then, involve moral issues. Not the issues Mr. Sessions is concerned with, but others which he seems to be unaware of.

Letters to the Editors

Daniel De Leon

Dear Sirs: Daniel De Leon, the great American Marxist, and the man who conceived the principles and program of Socialist Industrial Unionism, was born on December 14, 1952. This year, accordingly, is the centennial anniversary of his birth.

The Socialist Labor Party, of which Daniel De Leon was the intellectual founder, opened the De Leon Centennial celebration with a banquet in the Henry Hudson Hotel in New York on May 3. Among the speakers who paid deserved homage to De Leon at this celebration were Arnold Petersen, National Secretary of the Socialist Labor Party of America, and Leonard Cotton, distinguished British De Leonist and National Secretary of the S. L. P. of Great Britain.

Your readers, who are certainly more than ordinarily interested in De Leon and his achievements, should be especially interested in his great contributions to the Socialist cause. We will gladly send them a free copy of the De Leon Centennial issue of the Weekly People upon request.

The De Leon centennial celebration coincided with the Socialist Labor Party's twenty-third national convention, at which it launched its sixteenth Presidential campaign, nominating the undersigned for President and Stephen Emery for Vice President.

The Nation's Book Selections for 1952

Coming in two weeks— How free is free?

ON June 28th The Nation will publish the most important special supplement it has issued in recent years. In preparation for nearly a year, this 40-page supplement will measure and describe the impact of the post-1945 witch hunt on the civil liberties of the American people, with particular emphasis on the occupations and categories that have been under direct attack.

The supplement is not concerned with civil liberties in the abstract, but with civil liberties as an aspect of the economic security and well-being of rank-and-file citizens, including 6,000,000 government employees—federal, state, and local; of scientists and research workers; of authors, librarians, and the publishing industry; of the free professions of law, medicine, and the ministry; of the generation of students now in colleges and universities; of teachers and the public-school system; of radio and television and those who work in these industries; of actors, playwrights and the stage; of instructors in colleges and universities, and academic freedom; of the labor movement; of workers in the motion-picture industry and of motion pictures; of resident aliens and members of minority groups; and of other categories and occupations.

We are asking organizations and individuals to help us get this supplement into the hands of as many readers as possible. Bulk orders should be placed now in order to insure prompt delivery. Make use of the convenient order form below.

CONTRIBUTORS INCLUDE:

KIRTLEY F. MATHER, Professor of Geology, Harvard University; incumbent president of American Association for Advancement of Science.

MATTHEW JOSEPHSON, author of "The Robber Barons," "The Politicos," and a biography of Sidney Hillman, soon to be published.

GOODWIN WATSON, Professor of Education, Teachers College, Columbia University.

H. H. WILSON, member of the Department of Politics, Princeton University, and the author of "Congress: Corruption and Compromise."

ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR., Professor of Law at Harvard University, author of "Freedom of Speech."

MERLE MILLER, author of "The Judges and the Judged."

GILBERT W. GABRIEL, President of the New York Drama Critics Circle, and drama critic of Cue.

ALSO: Factual on-the-spot reports of the state of civil liberties in Chicago, Los Angeles, Baltimore, Boston, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and other cities, prepared by local representatives of the American Civil Liberties Union. The supplement will also include a report—"Hollywood Meets Frankenstein"—on recent witch-hunting activities in the motion picture industry. As a special feature, the supplement will include a manuscript by the late Louis Adamic—"Confessions of a Thirty-Third Degree Subversive."

Lost Weekend

It's really a shame that an unfortunate "break" in the news compelled the President to postpone a weekend visit to the farm of J. Howard McGrath at Great Salt Pond in Rhode Island. The visit had been widely reported as presaging the appointment of McGrath to some high post (not requiring Senate confirmation) and of giving public expression to Truman's unshaken confidence in his former Attorney General. But the testimony of a representative of the General Accounting Office that Clark Clifford, the President's former legal counsel, had received $25,000 for representing a Michigan firm in a civil-fraud suit while McGrath was Attorney General, served to remind the President that Margaret was leaving for Europe on the weekend of his scheduled visit.

The incident will deepen public confusion about the President's relations with McGrath. Is he trying to say that he considers McGrath the innocent victim of a "smear" campaign? Is he sorry that he removed him from the Cabinet? Does he feel that there are acceptable excuses for the failure of the Justice Department to recover more than a pittance of the $500,000,000 or so which the government was overcharged on Korean War contracts? Does he believe that McGrath was vigilant in recovering only $300,000 of more than $21,000,000 which the General Accounting Office contends is owed the government in actual fraud cases, some of which involved the bribery of army officers?

The planned visit suggested that the answer to all these questions is "Yes." In any case, what greater loyalty could the ex-Attorney General have demonstrated than his gallant support of the President in the political crisis of 1948? Let McGrath not despair: the President will probably turn up at Great Salt Pond in due time.

Peronism in Ecuador

Democracy in Latin America met a new defeat in the election of José María Velasco Ibarra for the third time as President of Ecuador. Paradoxically, as the star of Perón declines in his own country, Peronism gains ground outside Argentina. In his own right the new President can hardly be tagged with any political label; ideology is not his strong point. Under his first regime, genuine liberals, including Galo Plaza, whom he now succeeds, were able to introduce a new tone in Ecuadorian politics. But each time Velasco Ibarra insisted on playing the dictator and was forced from office by military coups d'état carried through in behalf of decency and civil liberties.

Even worse than Velasco Ibarra are some of the groups that helped him win last week's decisive victory over his main opponent, the conservative Dr. Ruperto Alarcón Falconi. The "Concentration of Popular Forces" Party, his main support, is distinctively falangist in nature. Curiously enough, the leader of the People's Force, Mayor Carlos Guevara Moreno, of Guayaquil, fought in the Spanish War on the Loyalist side and made that exploit the springboard of his political career. Being an opportunist, however, he promptly changed sides when the current in Latin America turned in the direction of fascism. President Velasco Ibarra denies any tie with Peronism, but the incident which occurred in Quito, when César Salvador Mazetti, Perón's Ambassador, appeared at a rally to welcome Velasco on his return from exile in Argentina, was an indication of where his present sympathies lie.

The Toronto Six

Will Senators McCarran and McCarthy, having done so much to shut the doors of this country to the East and West, now slam the portals to the North? Recently six members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, one a minor, were barred from crossing the border. Only stated reason: "detrimental to the best interests of the United States." Confronted with the alternative of retaining the six players or of canceling scheduled engagements here, the Toronto orchestra dropped the men. The local union supported the orchestra's decision and the sole recourse of the six victims is an appeal to the executive board of the international union.

This seems to us about the most shameful in the growing list of indignities occasioned by the McCarran act and the paranoid policies of the State Department. It is bad enough that six men have been done a grave personal injustice; it is worse that no practical remedy is available. Canadians, apparently, feel the same way: the Toronto Globe-Mail (Conservative) and Daily Star (Liberal) have published strong editorial condemnation of the injustice done the six musicians. has, in fact, demanded that the Ottawa government not only clear their names but assert the right of entry as essential to the "right to work" and as a right implicit in the passports issued by the Canadian government.

For more than a century the Rush-Bagot Convention has committed the United States and Canada to an "open-door" policy of friendship and amity. Incidents such as that of the Toronto six make it increasingly embarrassing for Americans to speak sneeringly of other countries' "iron curtains."

Civil War in South Africa?

In South Africa today there are the makings of two irrepressible conflicts. On the one hand a vast gulf between the European minority and the native majority has been made almost unbridgeable by discriminatory legislation and repressive administration. And now Dr. Malan's Nationalist Government, reopening old wounds suffered in the long struggle between Boer and Briton, has split the white population in two. It is not racial policy that divides them: both factions believe in white supremacy although they differ about methods for maintaining it. What really disturbs the opposition is the evidence that Dr. Malan, who won the last election on a minority vote, is aiming at one-party rule. His bill to segregate the "colored" vote in Cape Province, held by the Supreme Court to contravene the "entrenched clauses" of the Constitution, is not just an exercise in racial discrimination but a blatant example of gerrymandering which is expected to give the Nationalists six or more Parliamentary seats now held by the opposition.

Determined to secure this advantage before the 1953 elections, the Nationalists have pushed through the High Court of Parliament Act which allows Parliament itself to overrule the Supreme Court in constitutional cases. The legality of this act is to be tested in the courts but it is also being met by a political challenge. Natal, most British of the Union's four provinces, is already talking of secession on the grounds that the Malanites have destroyed the compact on which the Union was founded. If this threat materializes, civil war may easily follow.

The Plight of Sterling

Sterling remains sick despite the medicines prescribed by the Conservative government after it took office last fall. In the first three months of this year the drain of gold and dollars from the sterling-area reserve was slowed down but even so the total was reduced to $1,700,000,000 by March 31 compared to nearly $4,000,000,000 on June 30, 1950. April figures have not yet been published but trade returns for that month indicate a rise in the visible deficit and it is also known that Britain has lost more gold to the European Payments Union.

It may be that, as Mr. Hugh Gaitskill, former Chancellor of the Exchequer, suggested in a recent speech in Chicago, that gold reserves of the sterling area will soon begin to increase, if they have not already done so, partly because of cuts in dollar imports and partly because delayed payments of United States economic aid are now being made. On the other hand, Britain is clearly finding increased difficulty in expanding exports to the extent necessary if its goal of a favorable balance of payments by the end of this year is to be achieved. It is experiencing growing German and Japanese competition at a time when world demand, at least for consumer goods, is declining. In addition, the sharp fall in prices of such commodities as rubber and tin have seriously reduced the sterling area's dollar-earning capacity.

It is not altogether surprising, therefore, that fears of a new devaluation of the pound should have caused some weakness in both spot and future quotations for sterling. Perhaps these fears are premature, but it begins to look as if new and drastic measures will be necessary to prevent further depletion of the sterling area's reserves in the next few months and to keep the pound at its current ratio to the dollar.

Who Likes Ike Now?

GENERAL EISENHOWER'S political debut at Abilene may have increased his chances of securing the Republican nomination while diminishing his prospects for victory in November. For he revealed a streak of conservatism that can hardly fail both to win over uncommitted right-wingers at Chicago and to repel millions of independent voters whose liking for him has been based on the hope that he would prove to be at least moderately progressive.

Such hopes have been dashed by the mammoth Abilene press conference. On that occasion the General showed once again that he not only had an attractive personality but the ability to project it. He also exhibited marked skill in dodging pertinacious efforts to pin him down on specific issues, without seeming to be evasive. But while a tendency to balance every affirmative statement with a considered "however" appeared to keep him safely in the middle of the road on specific questions, the total effect was to reinforce the growing impression that on domestic matters he is quite as far to the Right as Senator Taft.

Indeed he almost went out of his way to disown the liberal wing of the G. O. P. by declaring, without any prodding, that he was in accord with the general principles of the Republican Declaration of February 6, 1950, which he assumed would be the basis of the 1952 Republican platform. This declaration, drafted by the die-hard Clarence Budington Kelland, was a far more conservative document than the Republican platform of 1948 and was sharply criticized on this ground by liberal Republicans who are today Eisenhower's most enthusiastic supporters. Senator Lodge, for example, condemned it for failing to express determination to enact a civil-rights program and for "extravagance" in describing the issue between the parties as "liberty vs. socialism."

By indorsing this 1950 declaration, the General aligned himself with the conservative wing of the party which he further reassured by reiterating his opposition to "centralization" of power whether in the field of civil rights, medical care, education, conservation, or economic controls. And simultaneously he contrived to dismay many liberal Republicans and independents who know that over-reliance on state responsibility enables the backward states to slow down progress of the whole country and who realize that civil rights have become a burning issue precisely because, by and large, they have been left to the tender mercies of local authorities.

The moral for the Democrats is plain. Whether Eisenhower or Taft is chosen at Chicago, they will be in a position to make the Presidential campaign a clear-cut fight between liberalism and conservatism. This is a fight that can be won provided always that the Democrats select a strong, progressive candidate and give him an unequivocally progressive platform on which to stand—a point made adequately clear in the labor symposium which appears on page 572 of this issue.

The German Peril

UNREPORTED in the American press as far as we know, a little episode in Bonn symbolized the situation created by the new Big Three peace contract with West Germany. The episode occurred just before Acheson, Eden, Schuman, and Adenauer signed the agreement. It was the German chief of protocol who noticed the design on the tapestries hanging in the Upper Chamber of Bonn's parliament. He quickly had them removed because he feared they might cause comment: the scene shown was the Rape of Europa.

The quasi peace treaty with Germany is now before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The hearings were being sped to conclusion this week. Already overlaid with unfinished business, the Senate is being asked to ratify the contractual agreement before Congress disperses, presumably before the Republican convention opens in Chicago on July 7. No serious opposition, indeed hardly any pertinent criticism, is expected.

The papers which the Administration sent to the Senate make quite a bundle. They include the general agreement with the Bonn Republic, its three subsidiary conventions, President Truman's accompanying message to Congress, the Three Power declaration issued in Paris after the signing of the European-army treaty on May 27, and a protocol extending the Atlantic Alliance's guaranties reciprocally to the European defense community—in fact to Western Germany.

How many Americans are aware of the contents, to say nothing of the implications, of these documents? For that matter, how many of the Senators who will approve them have read and mastered them?

Yet the two agreements, of which the European-army treaty is the other, may take their place in history as a watershed between the second and third world wars. The haste with which the peace contract with the Germans is being railroaded toward ratification contrasts with the great responsibilities it imposes on the American people. For there is little doubt that these commitments perpetuate the partition of Germany and diminish almost to zero the chance of a peaceful understanding with Russia about that country.

In our present political climate a majority of Americans would support the peace contract with Germany even if they were aware of its dangers. After all, the West Germans are now allies against communism, although one may question their dependability. It is likely, however, that if Americans had been informed of all its implications, a much larger and more vocal opposition would have developed. The Defense and State Departments have sold a bill of goods to Congress and to the people. The Administration has presented a wholly one-sided view of its policy.

A few predictions can safely be made:

1. From month to month West Germany will intensify pressure to remove the few remaining restrictions placed on it. In the early period of its rearmament, the German Republic as an "exposed area" will refrain from manufacturing certain heavy weapons like bombers and submarines. Nor will it engage in producing atomic explosives. But the Pentagon intends that within a year after the peace contract and European-army treaty come into force West Germany shall join the Atlantic Alliance. As the Bonn Republic settles into its position as our ally, it will become harder and harder to say "no" to German production of all types of armament.

2. As soon as West Germany has regained its military strength, it will move to end German partition. If that proves impossible by peaceable means, as succeeding German governments grow more nationalistic, an incident near the frontier between East and West Germany may precipitate military action.

3. As long as the bulk and élite of the French army are shackled in Indo-China, it will be difficult to retard the emergence of Germany as the Continent's dominant power.

4. When the Germans form their first divisions, they will contain an important sprinkling of professional soldiers. Despite the two-year conscription system to be introduced, German ex-officers and non-coms will be able to enlist voluntarily. As a result the German armed forces will be readily expandable—as they were in the twenties and thirties.

5. Germany will have a military machine that is close to being a national army. The original French concept of German troops interlarded with those of five other nations has evaporated. Divisions in the European army will be almost independent. The Germans will have their own War Department, bearing a less nostalgic name. German general staff officers will be trained for larger commands. Bonn will have its own supply and maintenance organization. West Germany is no longer playing the reluctant bride; its heart is increasingly back in the military business. According to former French Defense Minister Jules Moch, 175 training centers are already being created in West Germany.

6. We can assume that at least one East German division will be raised to match every division the West Germans put in the field.

7. No one now believes that the condemned German war criminals will serve out their sentences.

On all these aspects of the agreements before the Senate, our State and Defense Departments have remained silent. If they had brought them to the notice of the American people, many would have asked, "Is there no alternative?" The answer is: "There was."

Russia bears a large share of responsibility for the failure to attempt to find a different solution. But we bear a share too.

In 1946 Secretary of State Byrnes proposed a United States-British-French-Soviet pact to disarm and neutralize all Germany for twenty-five or forty years. Moscow was unresponsive. At that time Russian policy was to keep Germany divided. Today Moscow regards a unified Germany as the lesser evil. But the Byrnes offer is dead.

Many European students of Soviet policy believe that until lately Russia was ready to withdraw from Eastern Germany and allow a restoration of capitalism there in return for neutralization of the whole country. As soon as the peace contract and European-army treaty becomes operative, however, Germany's neutralization is ruled out. When that happens, the Russians will no longer be interested in offering concessions on Germany.

Today it is we who have frozen the position by putting West Germany's inclusion in the anti-Soviet alliance ahead of German unification. Where, short of Russia's unconditional surrender, is there now a basis for accord on Germany?

This is the background to the Senate's impending ratification of the German settlement. Few Americans are conscious of the meaning of this act. Fewer still have weighed the liabilities against the assets. But Europeans, while murmuring "We do" at the shotgun wedding, are alive to all these perils. That explains why the master of ceremonies at Bonn quietly whisked away the tapestries displaying the Rape of Europa.

Confusion on the Coast

WITH the voting in South Dakota and California, the first act of the Presidential campaign is over and the scene now shifts to Chicago. Of the South Dakota primary little more need be said than that the German vote in the rural counties—isolationist and opposed to Eisenhower as the occupier of Germany—gave Senator Taft the slight margin which he appeared to hold at this writing.

The California primary, however, ranks as one of the best political stories of the pre-convention campaign. Inquiries which we have made in California amply confirm Governor Warren's contention that more than $500,000—most of which came from independent oil interests—was poured into the campaign to elect the Republican slate of delegates headed by Representative Thomas H. Werdel of Bakersfield. Backed by certain groups that have developed a morose hatred of Warren, the Werdel delegation received important support from party "regulars" who have long resented the Governor's habit of ignoring them on patronage matters. But the mass base for this strange grudge revolt consisted of a fairly large, rapidly growing, and angry Right: a herd of frenzied, embittered folk, including elements of Vivien Kellems's "Liberty Belles," Associated Farmers, anti-Semites, paranoid haters of the United Nations, tax-resisters, tax-refusers, and Partisan Republicans. This neurotic movement has been growing in California for the last five years and is a phenomenon that warrants close and constant scrutiny. Powerful leadership was provided by John Francis Neylan, a regent of the University of California, who has never forgiven Governor Warren for his stand on the loyalty oath. ("Jack is never so happy," the Governor said, "as when he is spraying venom on somebody. This just happens to be my time to get sprayed.") The delegation pledged to Werdel sponsored meetings at which Taft and MacArthur were loudly applauded and there can be little doubt that the Taftites supported the movement. At one meeting, state Senator Edward H. Tickle, serving as chairman, introduced Jack Smith, a wealthy Southern California oilman, with the remark: "He's a grand guy. He foots the bills for all of us." Throughout the campaign, Governor Warren was denounced as a "New Deal Trumanite" and at one meeting a speaker charged that California was "getting creeping communism under the brand of Warren's socialism." Leaders of the Werdel delegation, which polled more than half a million votes, made it clear that they were against Warren but for Senator William F. Knowland.

On the Democratic side, Senator Kefauver picked up sixty-eight delegates with a minimum investment of energy and funds. The better than 2-to-1 margin by which the so-called "free" delegation was defeated was not unexpected. The day following the Minnesota primary, in which General Eisenhower received an impressive write-in vote, President Truman instructed Attorney General Edmund G. Brown to disband the "official" Democratic delegation. Stunned by this move, the "official" Democrats lost the initiative and for a time it seemed likely that the Kefauver delegation would win by default. Although Mr. Brown was able to reorganize the delegation, little enthusiasm could be generated for a ticket without a candidate. At the last moment, President Truman gave the "free" delegation his informal benediction and dispatched Governor Adlai Stevenson to California to do what he could to save the "official" Democrats, but by then it was too late.

The Kefauver delegates, who will name the next Democratic National Committeeman and Committeewoman, are a highly miscellaneous group. The two most prominent names—they are really the only well-known ones—on the delegation are those of State Senator George Miller, Jr., of Alameda, and John Anson Ford of Los Angeles, long a member of the Board of Supervisors. Both men, incidentally, have fine liberal records. On the other hand, the "free" delegation included nearly every "official" Democratic leader of any prominence. At the last moment, James Roosevelt, National Committeeman, made what a California political observer referred to as "a Roman tandem leap" from the "free" to the Kefauver delegation—as an alternate!

THE most interesting result of the primary was Knowland's sweep of both party nominations. The Senator's backers placed great emphasis in the primary on the theory that if Knowland could win the Democratic nomination he might, with Governor Warren's backing, be an ideal running mate for General Eisenhower. As a Formosa-Firster, which Governor Warren is not, Knowland might be able to win support from Taft delegates. Should Knowland win the vice-presidency, Warren would probably resign and then accept appointment to Knowland's six-year unexpired term from Goodwin J. Knight, who would become Governor. Representative Clinton McKinnon, who opposed Knowland for the Democratic nomination, had almost no campaign funds, received little support from the National Committee, and would appear to have been the sacrificial victim of an off-stage understanding. An analysis of Knowland's Democratic vote indicates that he must have had the support of elements of the Malone machine in San Francisco.

The California primary indicates four things pretty clearly: that the collapse of the New Deal coalition, which began in California in 1944, is now nearly complete; that rank-and-file Democrats have revolted against a system under which the National Committee makes heavy financial levies in a state and then walks off with the funds, not caring what happens to the local organization and candidates (a system described by Gifford Phillips, publisher of Frontier, as a form of "political colonialism"); that the state cross-filing system has wrought ever-greater havoc with political parties in California (this fall the voters will finally have a chance to modify the system); and that elements of the Malone machine in San Francisco, seriously embarrassed by investigations of the local office of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, have decided that the way to have friends in Washington in 1953 is to support Republican candidates in 1952.

It is pleasant to record, as a footnote, that state Senator Jack B. Tenney was soundly defeated for the Republican nomination in the new 22nd Congressional District. Tenney's defeat would seem to be about the only result of the primary to which California liberals might lift their glasses in salute.

Sober Realism at the U.N.

United Nations, New York City

THE Economic and Social Council now meeting in New York does not offer so exciting a performance as the General Assembly during a hot debate or the Security Council when dealing with a "threat to the peace." The ECOSOC handles a long and heavy agenda, covering the work of the United Nations in such fields as economic development and human rights and reviewing the annual reports of the many technical and regional commissions and specialized agencies, some of which have made a remarkable record. But the division of opinion regarding such vital issues as a correct appreciation of the present world economic situation or the dramatic appeals for help from areas where millions suffer utter want, give to these discussions a high political and human value and a key to the many conflicts within the United Nations itself.

Often there is confusion between the U. N. program of technical assistance and the various programs launched by individual nations or groups of nations. But of course these national and international efforts are intimately connected. The announcement by President Truman, in January, 1949, of his grandiose "Point Four" plan acted as a powerful incentive to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly to work out an extensive U. N. program of technical assistance. In December of the same year the Assembly fully endorsed such a program, based on a study made by the Economic and Social Council during the summer. Its main idea was to help the backward countries to strengthen their economies by developing their own resources, their agriculture, and their industries, and to reach a higher standard of living within the framework of economic and political independence.

The last point was strongly emphasized. Under no circumstances should economic aid be permitted to become an instrument for establishing a new sort of imperialism or foreign domination, especially in an era when the entire colonial system was in process of crumbling to pieces. The most progressive voices in the U. N. insisted that what people in the underdeveloped countries wanted was "to be helped to help themselves" and that the problem called for immense tact, a profound understanding of the mind of the peoples involved, and a determination not to play the role of benefactor in order to bring a recipient country within any given political or strategic area of influence. The long and fascinating controversy in the press and among political parties and groups in India over the issue of economic aid from abroad illustrated better than anything else the dilemma facing all underdeveloped areas: On the one hand, there was a desperate need for assistance; on the other, suspicion and fear lest behind any proffered aid might lurk the intention to influence India's foreign policy, undermine its neutrality, and menace its cherished, newly won freedom.

IN Geneva last September I heard much criticism of American opposition to the establishment of an international development fund. Over this opposition, the majority in the ECOSOC stressed the necessity for this fund. Summarizing the debate in the closing session, even so circumspect a diplomat as the Council's President, Hernan Santa Cruz of Chile, found the courage to declare that the Council had failed to carry out the wish of the General Assembly that it should propose "practical methods to obtain an increased flow of capital for financing the development programs of the underdeveloped countries." It was evident then that the United States delegate, Isidor Lubin, in opposing the development fund, expressed prevailing trends in Washington: first to concentrate all possible effort on financing the rearmament program and, second, to avoid commitments for technical assistance which would be administered through the United Nations. If American money was to be put into underdeveloped countries, Congress preferred that it be done, not under the label of United Nations "technical assistance" but under the label of "Point Four," so that the United States would have the final word as to how the aid should be used and could also reap whatever moral and political advantages might come from it. Naturally this attitude was an unpopular one especially among the Asian members of the ECOSOC who complained, on the one hand, about the concentration of aid in Western Europe, mainly for military purposes, to the detriment of the countries of Asia, and on the other, about the reluctance of the United States to act through international instrumentalities. The struggle over the development fund has been resumed in the present session of ECOSOC with the United States still in opposition. But the attitude of the other members has obliged Mr. Lubin to try to correct the bad impression created at Geneva.

LAST Wednesday he assured his colleagues that the fear of economic collapse resulting from rearmament lacked any substantial foundation; the United States, for instance, is doing so well that readjustment would prove far less difficult than at the close of World War II. Second, he argued that a wide variety of plans projected by many agencies with much money behind them assured a great expansion of economic help for underdeveloped areas. The year 1951, he said, had shown an increasing volume of grants and loans, with everybody trying to help: the Colombo plan, formulated by the British Commonwealth countries, offering aid to Southeast Asia; "the generous Norwegian people establishing a public fund for aiding underdeveloped countries"; and the United States continuing its assistance on "an increasing scale." It was a comprehensive and able speech which, though carefully geared to the policy of containment and of "peace through strength," remained sensitively aware of the spirit of revolt and dissatisfaction that characterizes this fourteenth session of the Economic and Social Council. Of course with a Congress busy cutting funds for foreign aid, Mr. Lubin could only deal in generalities as far as future American contributions were concerned; in fact, at the moment he was speaking, $7,500,000 had just been cut from the $24,000,000 appropriation asked by President Truman for the International Children's Fund, one of the best ECOSOC agencies.

Mr. Lubin's optimism was not shared by some of the other speakers. For example, the delegate of Pakistan explained how the prosperity that had smiled on his part of the world as the result of the armaments boom had given way to a grave economic crisis. His views were supported by Pakistan's Foreign Minister, Zafrulla Khan, who said on June 2: "Occasionally policies may be wrong but the world is going through a series of upheavals and trials and unless the attitude is one of cooperation and sympathy, help and assistance, none of us will pull through." Speakers for France, Sweden, and the Philippines also sounded an ominous note.

In general the spirit prevailing in the Council reflects the courageous realism with which Gunnar Myrdal, one of the outstanding personalities in the United Nations and executive secretary of the Economic Commission for Europe, visualizes the world situation and the duties of the organization. Speaking at the closing meeting of the seventh session of the ECE in March of this year at Geneva, Mr. Myrdal bluntly stated that "our committees are gradually being transformed into purely Western bodies—perhaps I should more adequately say non-Eastern-European bodies." His speech implied strong disapproval of the sabotage of attempts to put an end to the present world tension by trying to penetrate the wall between East and West. It is clear that he is not one of those bureaucrats so abundant in the United Nations who easily confound the initials U. N. and U. S., and that if his services are still wanted some positive accomplishment will have to be shown, not by the end of the century but in this year of 1952. As he said in the speech quoted above: "The next months will give the practical answer to the question whether this commission as a working organ of the United Nations will again become the all-European body it was intended to be when it was founded."

MYRDAL has been working hard to find an answer to the basic problem of reaching agreement with Russia in ways which will avoid a general collapse of the Western economy, including that of the United States which is tied so closely to the rearmament program. He believes this can be accomplished only through a great expansion of East-West trade and of development programs all over the world. A man talking and acting as Gunnar Myrdal does, is bound to find obstacles in a United Nations bureaucracy which, as times goes on, shows a spirit closer to that of NATO than of the United Nations. But the ECE and its dynamic Secretary General do not easily give up. They may find some encouragement in the new bid to the Western countries to resume trade with Russia offered by the Soviet delegate Georgi P. Arkadyev, in his speech of last Thursday.

Over the present discussions of the Economic and Social Council hangs the shadow of the worsening world situation. The economists are aware that all the talk about achieving a balance of strength by 1954 which will end tension, encourage East-West trade, permit a shift from arms production to a peace economy and social progress, with more aid to the underdeveloped countries and all the rest, is only a fairy tale to ease the anxiety of average citizens everywhere. Knowing better, the experts do not look for an early return to prosperity under a peace economy. In a time of self-delusion like the present, their sober opinions are worth listening to.

What Labor Wants: A Symposium

IT HAS become axiomatic that labor—provided it can organize itself for the polls as well as it has in the shops—can swing any Presidential election. This year's will be no exception. In a recent survey, Elmo Roper points out that the trade unionists, together with such of their families as are qualified to vote, represent 28 per cent of the electorate. He emphasizes one further important fact: two of every three labor votes are likely to be cast for the Democratic candidate "unless Republican candidate popularity or the issues themselves upset this tendency." (Italics ours.)

BY GEORGE M. HARRISON

The Economic Royalists Are Paving the Way to Fascism

THE issue, as I see it, is to check the economic royalists before they bring the world down around our ears. Since Franklin D. Roosevelt's death the money-changers have been coming back. It's time to stop them. First these economic royalists killed price control, then each year after 1946 they put up their prices—and their profits. In 1949 they took a breather, but in 1950, even before the Korean shooting, they began to build up toward another profits spree. In "peace time" 1951 net corporation profits were double the high-water level of World War II.

The arrogance of the profiteers has known no bounds. Their handy-men in Congress wrote a Defense Production Act which put the federal government into the business of buying plants with the people's money and turning them over as a gift to private corporations.

What else does the DPA's "fast write-off" of defense facilities mean? The government has been issuing "certificates of necessity" to one giant corporation after another—allowing them to retain profits, which would otherwise be taxed, to be applied against their capital investment. Where normally a company recovers its investment in twenty to thirty years, under the Defense Production Act many companies can now get their money back in five as "defense essential."

No one questions that a steel mill is a defense essential. So, however, is a steel worker, or a railroad worker who runs the train which carts away the steel, or a clerk who does the bookkeeping, or a restaurant worker who feeds them. But no one gives the worker a free house or car, as the government gives away free plants.

What are the issues as labor sees them? In The Nation of May 10 Hugo Ernst, general president of the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union (A. F. of L.), set forth his views in an article which was widely reprinted in the labor press. In the two comments below, The Nation extends its sampling of labor opinion. The first is by the president of one of the great A. F. of L. railroad unions; the second is a digest of opinion solicited by The Nation from labor spokesmen (both A. F. of L. and C. I. O.) representing nearly all sections of the country.

Big business has become so arrogant that the steel industry was ready to provoke a strike to browbeat the government into allowing it five times the price increase it needed to absorb the wage increases recommended by the Wage Stabilization Board.

The issue, as I see it, is to check the economic royalists before their top-heavy profits pile collapses our economic underpinnings. Inflation is already building up toward deflation and a depression. If this is allowed to happen, the result will be disastrous.

Beyond this, big business profiteering is causing our European allies to distrust our motives in calling for rearmament. Our own profiteers have made it possible for the Russians to argue, with increasing effect, that our paramount interest is profits at the expense of the world. Abroad there is growing mistrust. At home, there is growing fear that big-business control of our rearmament program may produce a degree of counter-armament that can only end up in war.

The economic royalists need to be curbed because they are driving us toward the totalitarian state. The tremendous economic concentrations brought about by the armaments program can be maintained only through forms of political power which are inconsistent with normal American political life. There must be concentrations of power in the state to match the concentrations of economic power. In other words, the state will take on a fascist form, pretending to serve all the people but actually protecting only the concentrated wealth of the few.

The trend toward the totalitarian state is only too apparent. That this is the way we may be headed is becoming increasingly clear by the restraints being placed on labor. It is in the very nature of organized labor to resist concentrations of economic power. It is in the nature of labor to criticize and to dissent from policies which run counter to the welfare of the people. But criticism, dissent, and the ordinary forms of labor activity will not be tolerated in the totalitarian state. Thus the virulent opposition of big business to the union shop on the railroads and in steel is not at all surprising. Cutting down the strength of labor is one very important step in the direction of controlling it. It is also not surprising to note the restraints being placed on ordinary constitutional liberties because it is within the framework of such liberties alone that free labor can exist.

The economic royalists will, if not restrained, destroy the basis of economic democracy, undermine constitutional liberties, and in so doing give aid and comfort to the forces driving toward war and annihilation.

The issue, as I see it, is to curb the economic royalists and give the country back to the people. And to do so before it is too late!

A SYMPOSIUM

The Planks Labor Wants in the 1952 Platforms

[The Nation sent a questionnaire to A. F. of L. and C. I. O. leaders in ten states, representing nearly all sections of the country, asking among other things: (1) From labor's point of view, what are the planks indispensable to a winning platform? (2) Can the Democrats win if they retreat from the party's 1948 platform on civil rights or key labor issues, such as the Taft-Hartley Act? Digests of the answers received from each of the labor leaders questioned appear below.]

FRANK ROSENBLUM, general secretary-treasurer of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (C. I. O.), New York.

Labor wants effective price controls, including rents; expanded social security, including unemployment compensation based on uniformity of payments among the states; equitable taxation, with more relief for low-income groups and with proper excess-profit taxes; repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and restoration of provisions of the Wagner Act; adequate housing for low and moderate-income families; national health insurance; federal aid to education; civil-rights legislation to implement constitutional guaranties for all minorities (anti-poll-tax, anti-lynching, and permanent FEPC legislation); repeal of the McCarran and Smith acts and other regulations curtailing the basic rights of individuals and providing for "thought control"; positive efforts toward resolution of the basic issues involved in international tensions so that the threat of a world war and its consequences will be eliminated.

I believe the Democratic Party's only hope for victory is in a straightforward platform based on these issues. Generally speaking, all American groups except the "special-interest" groups fear the return to power of the Republicans with their present leadership. This was the major reason for the Democratic victory in 1948; it could be the decisive factor again, provided the party platform is forthright and constructive.

BARNEY HOPKINS, secretary-treasurer of the Michigan State C. I. O. Council.

The chief issues are restrictive labor laws, civil rights, monopolistic practices of giant corporations, anti-inflationary measures, farm subsidies and conservation, flood control and public power projects, the Great Lakes seaway, support of the free nations against Communist and fascist aggression, and federal aid to education.

The Democrats have no hope of victory if they retreat from their 1948 platform on civil rights or key labor issues.

JOHN M. EKLUND, American Federation of Teachers (A. F. of L.), Colorado.

Labor is demanding legislation to protect the workers' right to organize, including that of public workers; foreign policy based on continuation and expansion of Point Four and the full functioning of the United Nations and its agencies; social security, including medical insurance; stable economic policies based on the establishment of a fair parity between prices and wages; a parity program for farmers; government reorganization along the lines of the Hoover commission plan, and federal aid for schools.

There is no question but that a strong position against the Taft-Hartley law and for civil rights will enhance Democratic chances for victory.

PAUL C. SPARKS, executive secretary, Texas State Federation of Labor (A. F. of L.).

Labor, I believe, will want planks supporting Point Four, social security, public housing, labor legislation, fair taxation, inflation control, the United Nations, the mutual-security program, and a plank requiring the payment of prevailing wages to contract labor from Mexico.

In my opinion, any retreat from liberal principles might break up the Democratic Party. As for the Taft-Hartley Act, it won't attain full stature as a political issue until there is slack employment and wider use of the law.

ELIZABETH NORD, Textile Workers Union of America (C. I. O.), Rhode Island.

I see the major issues as repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, full employment with adequate unemployment compensation, price controls, regional development, civil rights, equitable tax policies, and aid to friendly countries. I believe that the national Political Action Committee will submit planks to this effect to the Democratic convention. I think it unlikely that the Democrats can win if they weaken their 1948 platform on civil rights and labor issues.

JAMES F. CHRISTIE, Vermont State C. I. O. Council.

The chief issues are the Taft-Hartley law, a national health-insurance law, public power, FEPC, and civil rights. It is perfectly clear that any backtracking by the Democrats from their 1948 position on civil rights and labor issues will lose them all hope of victory in 1952.

S. B. HOFFMAN and ARTHUR G. McDOWELL, general president and director, respectively, of the Upholsterers' International Union of North America (A. F. of L.), Philadelphia.

To win labor support, a candidate must have the ability to unite the country and to command respect. He must be willing to accept realistically the great changes in social legislation and distribution of national income which have resulted from the Roosevelt reforms; he must combine this acceptance with a fresh approach to current problems of domestic economy and the problem of defeating Communist aggression by measures supplementary to military action in order to avoid World War III.

One thing is clear: the Democrats, if they want labor support, must not include in their platform such reactionary planks as Senator Russell's conception of civil rights or the Dixiecrat stand on labor legislation.

RAY W. ATKINSON, Washington State C. I. O. Council.

Among the important issues is the extension of economic as well as military aid to under-privileged peoples. On the domestic front, labor favors low-cost housing; extension of the social-security program to include among other things, disability insurance; the Truman civil-rights program (and, by the same token, labor opposes the destruction of civil liberties by investigating bodies); repeal or drastic modification of the Taft-Hartley Act; and development of natural resources and flood control along the lines of the TVA. We are opposed to universal military training and to military control of atomic energy, and we support full cooperation with the United Nations.

The Democrats cannot afford this year to weaken in any way their 1948 stand on civil rights and on labor issues.

HUGH BRYSON, National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards (Independent), San Francisco.

The key issues, as we see them, are repeal of the Taft-Hartley, McCarran, Smith, and other repressive acts; negotiations among China, Great Britain, France, the Soviet Union, and the United States for a lasting peace and permanent disarmament; abolition of the poll tax, anti-lynch legislation, and a permanent FEPC; low-cost housing, socialized medicine, full employment, and other economic-security legislation.

The Democratic Party fell through some of these very planks after nailing them into their 1948 platform. Lip service is not enough. Our members supported the Progressive Party in 1948; the two old parties do not represent the working people of this country.

George Brown of the Oregon State C. I. O. Council, and James A. Suffridge, secretary-treasurer of the Retail Clerks International Association (A. F. of L.) in Indiana, indicated in their answers that their organizations expected the Democratic Party to hold fast to the liberal planks of its 1948 platform.

Britain Balks on Korea

BY ANDREW ROTH

London
WHEN Richard Stokes recently attacked the Parliamentary secretary to the Ministry of Defense on the use of napalm bombs in Korea, veteran newspapermen in the press gallery began to take notice. The journalists generally ignore criticism of the United States-United Nations campaign in Korea when it comes from members on the left-pacifist fringe of the Labor Party such as Emrys Hughes or Sidney Silverman. They expect sharp attacks on American policy in Korea from Bevanites such as Barbara Castle or Tom Driberg. But they know well that British politics is like an iceberg, with most of its solid bulk below the surface; new surface contours are produced only by thrusts from below.

When Stokes asked for steps to stop napalm bombs from "falling on areas which are predominantly civilian," speculation started as to whether the former Cabinet minister was speaking primarily for the Labor Party or for the Catholic church, of which he is a leading political voice. Interest was further whetted when Viscount Hinchinbrooke, a true-blue Conservative, asked whether it was wise to continue the use "of these weapons, the propaganda counterblast of which greatly exceeds their initial military effect . . ." Conservative Brigadier Frank Medlicott asked: "How can we possibly justify being the first to use a weapon which is repellant to many right-thinking people?"

The use of the napalm bomb has been a public issue here since last March when the Manchester Guardian, Britain's most distinguished Liberal newspaper, quoted a shocking description of a napalm victim from the book "Korea Reporter," by Rene Cutforth, B. B. C.'s Korean correspondent:

In front of us a curious figure was standing, a little crouched, legs straddled, arms held out from his sides. He had no eyes, and the whole of his body, nearly all of which was visible through tatters of burnt rags, was covered with a hard black crust speckled with yellow pus. A Korean woman by his side began to speak, and the interpreter said: "He has to stand, sir, he cannot sit or lie." He had to stand because he was no longer covered with a skin, but a crust like crackling which broke easily . . . I thought of the hundreds of villages reduced to ashes which I personally had seen and realized the sort of casualty list which must be mounting up along the Korean front.

Commented the Guardian: "We must think of what would happen in Europe if there were to be a war. Napalm is now said to be a standard weapon for air bombing, especially in close support of ground troops. Are our field ambulances ready to cope with the consequences?"

When the British Defense Ministry's Parliamentary secretary, Nigel Birch, replied to a series of questions on the napalm bomb on May 14, he pointed out delicately that "the napalm bomb has not been used by United Kingdom forces in Korea," thereby carefully labeling it an American weapon.

DURING the lively debate on the day Mr. Stokes attacked the napalm bomb, Christopher Mayhew pursued the question of North Korean and Chinese prisoners of war. Mr. Mayhew, a right-wing Laborite, was Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs under Ernest Bevin and is considered one of the most pro-American of Labor members. He attacked the handling of prisoners as "extremely disturbing and unsatisfactory," suggesting that by proper use of "administration and psychology" a great many prisoners could be persuaded to accept repatriation without jeopardizing those "who have genuine grounds for fearing reprisals when they return home."

Two days later the Times used unusually strong language in attacking the handling of the prisoners: "Unfortunately the chaos in the prisoner-of-war camps and the incompetence of some of the American officers in charge of them has inevitably thrown doubt on the efficiency with which the prisoners were 'screened.' It is difficult to believe that all of the 60,000-odd prisoners who refused repatriation are really in danger of persecution if they go back. . . . It does suggest that the screening should be done again more carefully by an impartial commission."

On one aspect of the prisoners' issue, virtually all Britons except the miniscule Communist minority are united. As the socialist New Statesman and Nation puts it: "There is an arguable case for giving asylum to prisoners who are in real danger if they go home . . ." The right of political asylum is ingrained in the fabric of British life, as Karl Marx and others have found.

But even the most pro-American organs have serious doubts as to the fairness of the screening procedure. The Economist (May 24) admits that "it may be that screening officers and propagandists have been too zealous." A correspondent of the passionately pro-American Observer, recently returned from Korea, wrote (May 18): "The introduction last year of about forty Chinese-language interpreters and teachers from Formosa has had the effect of shifting the power in some of the Chinese compounds towards Nationalist elements and away from the Communists." The Church Times recently said:

The reason why so many Chinese refuse to go home is that they have had it drilled into them by their American captors that, if they return, they will be punished and probably executed. In the last few weeks, the American authorities in Korea have reversed their propaganda policy towards prisoners. They have been told of the assurance given by the Chinese negotiators that there will be no victimization of returning prisoners of war. But the American reversal of policy has come too late. The prisoners will not change their minds again.

Many Britons are afraid that by insisting on repatriation, the United States may destroy the fabric of the Geneva Convention so painfully renegotiated in a four-month session in 1949. As the International Committee of the Red Cross wrote in introducing the agreement: "The principle of the immediate liberation of prisoners at the close of hostilities had . . . to be reaffirmed . . ." This was underlined in Article 118: "Prisoners of war shall be released and repatriated without delay after the cessation of active hostilities." Article 7 said that prisoners "may in no circumstances renounce in part or in entirety the rights secured by them . . ."

Both the Communist and the anti-Communist states were very anxious in 1949 to adopt this obligatory wording. In fact, according to diplomats who participated in the discussions, the British and Canadian delegates at Geneva argued strongly against giving prisoners of war any right to resist repatriation. Speaking scornfully of those who might seek to resist, William Henry Gardner, deputy leader of the British delegation, stated:

Their motives will be various. There will be individuals who rightly expect that if they return to their own countries they will be prosecuted for crimes for which, if they are guilty, they ought to be punished. There will be individuals who want to remain in the Detaining Power's country because conditions such as food and treatment, etc., are better than in their own country. There will be individuals, and this is probably the largest category of all, who will want to remain because of liaisons with women.

The fact seems to be that Britain in 1949 was thinking in terms of possible war with Russia and the importance of securing the rapid repatriation of Western prisoners on the cessation of conflict.

These voices reflect Britain's growing anxiety to reduce Western commitments in Korea in favor of Europe, the Middle East, and Southeast Asia.

YET the Foreign Secretary and his associates are touchy about any public suggestion that they pressure the United States on Korea. In public the British government is full of praise for everything the United States does there. But privately Britain actively tries to restrain the Americans wherever this is thought necessary. Thus, in early May, while Anthony Eden was staunchly defending the United States in Commons, his diplomatic envoys in Washington and the United Nations were trying to modify American policy on prisoners in Korea. The Economist some months ago described the Foreign Office as feeling that on Korea "silence is golden" and that "any unsealing of ministerial lips would only disclose and thereby exacerbate basic differences of policy between London and Washington."

Except when there is a serious crisis brewing over Korea, this distinctively British self-discipline characterizes the "responsible" press as well. The Times "covers" Korea through its New York office. Two foreign correspondents and an editor have lost their jobs in Fleet Street for excessive frankness on Korea. Now only the Daily Worker's reporter exhibits any active desire to embarrass the Foreign Office spokesman on Korea during the daily press conference.

It is only when leading Britons believe a vital issue is at stake do they toss aside their normal restraint. One such occasion occurred in December, 1950, when Mr. Attlee flew to Washington to throw his weight into the balance against extending the Korean war to the Chinese mainland. A minor tempest flared briefly in November, 1951, when Britain felt the United States was unreasonably resisting Communist proposals for a truce line and discussions. Today, another such crisis appears to be brewing. Many Britons feel unless peace is achieved soon in Korea, it may be lost forever.

THE artist for the Rand Daily Mail of Johannesburg, South Africa, is Bob Connolly, formerly of Paterson, New Jersey, who still retains his American citizenship. Mr. Connolly has no use for "Natism"—the racist and nationalist philosophy of the Malan regime—and has attacked it so sharply that Eric Louw, South African Minister of Economic Affairs, recently told Parliament that if Mr. Connolly was an American "it was disgraceful that he should publish such cartoons in South Africa." Mr. Louw's speech led the American consul to investigate Mr. Connolly, who has since written The Nation as follows: "The consul has said that I would not lose the protection of the United States. However, the regulations they read to me still say that 'no American citizen is permitted to partake in politics in a foreign country in any way.' My cartoons have been political for fifteen years during the Smuts-Hertzog, the Smuts, and the present Malan regimes. The consul has sent a report on my status to Washington. Next comes Washington's ruling."

Below are three of the cartoons which brought Mr. Connolly into trouble.

The Challenge of Morocco

BY ROM LANDAU

FUTURE relations between the almost 400 million Moslems and the West may well depend upon the handling of the Moroccan question in the course of the present year. If it is mishandled, we may find ourselves facing a new "Indo-Chinese struggle" on the doorstep of Europe and the concerted enmity of Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia toward all nations committed by alliance to France. In order to save its colonial rule in Morocco, France is now speaking of "integration" rather than "colonization." But there is no magic in that vague term to out-balance the shortcomings of France's Protectorate policy.

Much of the French record in Morocco is highly estimable: a medieval land, on the verge of disruption, has become peaceful, prosperous, and comparatively modern. But the Moroccans' share in the prosperity has been only incidental, for the chief aim of French reforms has been to transform Morocco into an adjunct to the economy of France and to provide French emigrés with jobs or sources of enrichment. Settlers' interests have invariably prevailed over native needs.

While in the forty years of the French Protectorate enough money has been found to build magnificent government buildings, post offices, railway stations, residences for French officials, the welfare of the natives has been outrageously neglected. Only 7.5 per cent of the native children have schools; for a native population of nine million there are fewer than 250 state-employed doctors; the death rate of children below one year is 283.6 per thousand, the highest in the world; the first school for native administrators was not founded until 1950—even then it provided for fewer than sixty pupils. After forty years of the Protectorate there are still no genuine democratic elections, no legislative assembly, no freedom of expression, of assembly, or of travel. Moroccans are still forbidden to form their own trade unions. Imprisonment without trial has become a commonplace, and in the rural areas a Moroccan has not even the right to be defended by an attorney.

In view of the Protectorate's political record it is hardly surprising that nationalism should have become the second religion of the Moroccan people. In order to discredit it, the French have been claiming for years that close collaboration exists between the nationalists and the Communists. Together with French allegations that the nationalists are "religious fanatics" such charges belong to the realm of fiction. I have known Alal el Fassi, founder and head of the Istiqlal Party, and Si Ahmed Balafredj, its secretary, for several years. Both men, and the minor nationalist leaders as well, abhor communism. Most of them are pious Moslems and view the future independence of their country in terms of traditional Islam. They are, for all that, strongly opposed to the influence of the religious fraternities among which superstition and a reactionary spirit are rampant, and which the French are supporting for their own political ends. Even the youth of the Karaouine University at Fez, the largest and oldest educational institution in Morocco, is passionately nationalist and deeply religious, but opposed to both communism and the "fraternities."

IN THE fall of this year the Arab League will again insist that the United Nations Assembly discuss the question of Moroccan independence. Last December the demand of the league was defeated by three votes. It is not impossible that this time the vote will be reversed. The question arises, therefore: are the Moroccans ready to govern themselves, or is their country likely to become another liability of the United Nations?

The Moroccans know very well that they have no reserve of native executives, experts, and administrators to form a skeleton and sinews. Genuine and intensive training for self-administration will be their very first demand. French offers to provide such training will no longer be accepted by the Moroccans; the pattern of resident-generals, permanent officials, and privileged French experts—all of whom are the willing tools of the French settlers on the spot—is too well known to inspire confidence. Assuming that the Moroccans would agree to an interim period before complete independence is granted, they would insist that the tutelage years be spent under the supervision of a United Nations commission or a neutral controller.

Morocco already has a number of men capable of assuming responsibility, and the Moroccans are an intelligent and highly adaptable people. Their ancient traditions of independence and self-government are still very much alive, and it would not take them long to produce the needed experts. No one can possibly foretell how long the period of training must be. My guess would be about ten years. Anyhow, neither the Sultan nor the nationalists have any wish to deprive themselves of the services of such French experts as may be willing to work loyally in an independent Morocco. But such experts must not expect to keep their present monopoly of "plum" posts. For the Moroccans hope to have American, British, and other technicians and advisers as well, and they wish to revive the policy of the "Open Door," as laid down by the Act of Algeciras of 1906, according to which all nations would enjoy equal trade rights in Morocco. The Moroccans are prepared to sign a treaty of alliance with France, and to guarantee all legitimate French interests in their country. But they will sign such a treaty only after having gained their freedom.

Under the projected Moroccan constitution, the equality and status of minorities is guaranteed. Such Frenchmen, Jews, or other minorities as accept Moroccan citizenship will enjoy exactly the same rights as Moroccans of the Moslem faith.

In their present mood of frustration and disillusion, the Moroccans are not likely to accept any French or United Nations proposal that falls short of complete independence. Thus, the chief task of the Western democracies, and of American diplomacy in particular, will be to persuade the Moroccans to see the value of an interim period of, say, five to fifteen years. They might accept such a proposal provided a definite date for independence were underwritten by the United Nations.

Equally important will be the task of persuading the French that the continuation of a regime that is obnoxious not only to nine million Moroccans, but also to forty times as many Moslems spread throughout the world, is dangerous for future relations between Islam and the West. The good will of the Moslem world must surely count for more than the selfish interests of the few thousand French settlers on Moroccan soil.

The Mutual Fund Rainbow

BY WILLIAM G. FERRIS

YOU too can own a share of American industry. You too can employ top financial minds to invest your money. Why worry? Let the bright boys of the stock-and-bond tables do your worrying while you cash the dividend checks. With such happy thoughts Wall Street has found the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. In the past decade mutual funds have become Wall Street's most promising source of income. When nothing else can be sold, mutual funds find ready buyers. Today assets of these funds total around three and a half billion dollars compared with one billion dollars ten years ago.

Mutual funds used to be called investment trusts. During the stock-market boom of the 1920's, the investment-trust idea sprouted with the vigor characteristic of that whoop-de-doo era. Then as now it was argued that the "little investor" needed the protection which expert trust managements could give them. At the height of the boom Tri-Continental Corporation, Adams Express Company, Blue Ridge Corporation, General American Investors Company, and Lehman Corporation were formed. They were, and are, "closed-end" trusts, differing from the currently more popular "open-end" type.

A closed-end fund is one which has issued a stated amount of securities and, generally, plans to issue no more. The open-end funds issue stock each day if they can find a buyer. They grow and grow as more buyers are found. Shares in closed-end funds are bought and sold at market prices. Many are listed on the New York Stock Exchange. Open-end-fund shares are bought through securities salesmen from the fund. The price is based on the market price of the securities in the fund's portfolio. Open-end funds will buy back what they have sold you. The purchase price, like the sales price, depends on the market price of the securities in the fund's portfolio.

However, the price at which you can buy on any given day is always higher than the price at which you can sell. This price differential is the "load." It usually averages from 6 to 8 per cent of the value of the stocks in the fund's portfolio. The charge is split between the fund and the investment house which sells the fund's shares. Presumably, it is a legitimate charge for the high-priced management which directs the fund's buying and selling of securities.

Obviously it takes a lot of dividends to make up for this load. A return of 6 per cent a year on invested money is very handsome, but even that might not equalize the load. Ordinarily you would have to hold shares for more than a year to come out even, assuming no rise in their price. The load can be compared with commissions and taxes which must be paid when you buy and sell stock through a brokerage house. These also mount up. On odd lots—less than 100 shares—you pay $\frac{1}{8}$ or $\frac{1}{4}$ point more than the market price when buying and receive $\frac{1}{8}$ or $\frac{1}{4}$ point under the market price when selling.

Because closed-end funds were in existence in 1929, it is possible to test their performance during a depression. Their performance was rotten. Lehman Corporation originally was offered to the public at $104 a share. In

WILLIAM G. FERRIS is market editor in the Chicago bureau of the Associated Press.

1932 it brought $30.50. Here is the record of other 1929 highs and 1932 lows of closed-end funds (source: Moody's Investment Trusts):

	1929 High	1932 Low
Adams Express.....	68 $\frac{3}{4}$	1 $\frac{1}{8}$
Blue Ridge.....	20	$\frac{1}{2}$
General American Investors....	30 $\frac{1}{4}$	$\frac{1}{2}$
Railway and Light Securities....	110	6
Tri-Continental Corporation....	20 $\frac{1}{4}$	1 $\frac{1}{2}$

Let's put this another way. Suppose you were one of those naive investors who wanted experienced, competent financial management to handle your money in 1929. To give yourself this protection you put $2,000 in Blue Ridge Corporation. At the low point in 1932 this investment, guided by the sophisticated men of finance, was worth a princely $50.

It can be said for the funds that at least they are still operating. Investments in some of the wilder offerings of the 1920's were completely wiped out. And the funds do share in the boom times. The Lehman stock bought at $104 in 1929 would be worth around $140 today, giving effect to a three-for-one split in 1937. Dividends have been paid each year. Chrysler Corporation, which sold at a high of $135 in 1929, also would be worth around $140 today, after giving effect to a two-for-one split in 1947.

In the post-war years the open-end funds have outstripped the closed-end variety in popular favor. They have at least one great advantage: since not many of them were around in '29 and '30, how they fared in the depression cannot be checked. An exception is Massachusetts Investors Trust, biggest of all the mutual funds. Founded in Boston in March, 1929, it has had on its board of directors over the years such honored Back Bay names as Lowell, Cabot, and Adams. It sold as high as 64 $\frac{7}{8}$ in 1929 and as low as 10 $\frac{7}{8}$ in 1932.

While there has been no steep decline in stock prices since the 1929-32 period, a fairly severe shake-out developed late in 1937. How did the open-end mutual funds weather this squall? Did their managements see it coming and get out in time?

Here is the record of seven large, highly respected, representative funds for 1937 (source: Moody's Investment Trusts):

	High	Low
Affiliated Fund.....	$ 13.47	$ 3.99
Dividend Shares.....	2.36	1.18
Fundamental Investors.....	28.13	15.37
Incorporated Investors.....	28.44	15.24
Massachusetts Investors Trust....	33.36	18.83
State Street Investment Corp....	117.14	65.87
Wellington Fund.....	21.85	12.40

Clearly, the wisdom of mutual-fund managements did not enable the funds to escape this shake-out.

Mutual funds undoubtedly offer diversification for the little investor. Instead of putting all his eggs in one basket, he lets a mutual fund put it in many. There is some protective feature in this, since over a short term stocks of companies in different industries have varying market movements. However, in any general market decline, such as was experienced in 1937, most stocks move in one direction.

The little fellow who places his money in a mutual fund is doubtless better off than he who takes a flyer in some wild-cat stock-promotion scheme. He can be assured that, even if the funds have not had much success in judging the market, they at least are trying to be wary. Furthermore, in the past ten years of war and inflation the mutual funds have provided a better place to put money than have government bonds or the bank. But, then, so have the vast majority of stocks; and so have commodity futures. Unfortunately, some mutual funds imply that their shares can be bought without risk. They are offered as solid, safe investments. This they are not. They can lose value quickly and substantially.

MUTUAL funds help to boom a rising market. When the public is in a stock-buying mood, when it is flush, when it is chasing rainbows, mutual-fund shares sell briskly. And the funds, with the money thus acquired, buy stocks. Their buying helps to send the market higher.

But what happens when the market is falling? Then the public will be needing money and will be selling stocks and mutual-fund shares. As the number of shares the funds must redeem starts to exceed the number of their shares they sell, they will have to look around for money. At first they may have some extra cash available. Perhaps they will have some government bonds they can sell. But if the excess of redemptions over new sales continues for any length of time, as it would in a real depression, the funds will have to start liquidating the stocks in their portfolios—and in a declining market.

Technically, the Securities and Exchange Commission has control over mutual-fund advertising. A "Statement of Policy" determines how far the funds can go in their claims. Actually, the implementation of this policy rests with the National Association of Securities Dealers, which is not a disinterested party. The association reviews advertising for mutual funds and presumably tries to keep it under control. How far it succeeds may be judged by this advertising gem from the New York Times: "Professional managers devote their full time and experience to administering the Fund, buying and selling, bookkeeping and collecting. You are relieved of all details except cashing dividend checks." And except, of course, the additional little detail of worrying about your capital if the funds guess the market trend wrong.

Not Unblessed Pilgrimage

NECESSARY EVIL: THE LIFE OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. By Lawrence and Elisabeth Hanson. The Macmillan Company. $7.50.

IT IS usually a graceless review that discusses not the book the author has written but the one the reviewer would have preferred. But in the case of the biography of a well-known figure, the subject of several earlier biographies, the question inevitably arises what new discoveries or what deeper insights call forth the fresh attempt.

Jane Carlyle's great gift lay in her letter-writing. The Hansons have shown care and competence in going over all the Carlyle manuscript material, discovering new letters and correcting former omissions; but I am sorry that they did not carry out their original intent to publish a complete edition of Jane Carlyle's letters. A number of the most interesting letters now out of print are not included here, and their place is taken by such flat statements as "Forster . . . stimulated her to write some of her brightest letters." Only a biography itself a work of genius can compare in value with such collections as Leonard Huxley's "Letters of T. H. Huxley," F. O. Matthiessen's edition of the writings of "The James Family," and, on a more limited scale, F. A. Hayek's correspondence of John Stuart Mill and Harriet Taylor.

But, if we are not to have the complete letters of Jane Carlyle, we look to a new biography for deeper understanding of this brilliant, paradoxical, self-destroying person. This desire for insight comes not only from partisans of Jane or of Thomas, or from historians of the period, but from all of us concerned with the springs of action in individuals and with the relationship between them. Such terms as "mis-mated" or "symbiotic relation" are careless labels which beg the question. We want to know more of the relation between the Carlyles, as between the Tolstoys, between Macbeth and Lady Macbeth, between Dorothea and Casaubon, in order to learn more of the human dilemma of individual difference and isolation combined with the need for closeness between human beings.

Instead we find once again the familiar incidents of Jane defying her mother by learning Latin and proving her courage with the Haddington boys by crawling over the high bridge and seizing the gobbling turkey-cock; the endless debates over where the at-long-last-engaged Carlyles should live (finally decided by Jane's mother); the lonely days "companionless 'like owl in desert'" at Craigenputtock; the canary atop the luggage on the final move to London; the illustrious visitors who frequented 5 Cheyne Row.

But how did the high-spirited girl, "a fleein', dancin', lightheartit thing that noething would hae dauntit," become transformed into the older Jane, a neurotic invalid with querulous insistence on always being the center of the stage? It is not enough to say that she was a spoiled only child with insatiable demands for praise and affection, and that Carlyle was a dour Calvinist, insatiable in his need to drive himself to work, "an even more difficult man without a book than with one." After all, Jane, the gay flirt, the natural hostess, did marry the uncouth, wry-tempered scholar against the counsel of family and friends; she did sustain with abundance of grace six years of solitude at Craigenputtock—where mail came once a week, Carlyle worked unceasingly, and months passed with no sight of the face of a friend. If it was belief in Carlyle's genius that upheld her then, why did this fail her later after he had gained recognition?

What happened to her earlier delight in her own keen intelligence so that it never led her to the creative work that Carlyle and others urged upon her? Why was her sympathy so lavishly expressed in a human situation directly under her eyes while she lacked imagination for those at a distance, so that she failed to understand, for example, why Mazzini was more interested in the liberation of Italy than in spending time with her? Did she feel acute deprivation over not having children? The extravagance of her fondness for Lady Ashburton's daughter and for her dog and other pets suggests that such frustration may have contributed to her neurotic illness. If Carlyle had ever given her a gift before her forty-first birthday, or more openly expressed his tenderness for her in earlier years, would this have altered their relationship? And why, with all the friction between them, did they remain together for nearly forty years until Jane's death?

Such questions as these cannot be answered simply in terms of nineteenth-century marriage or the lot of women in the Victorian Age. Jane Carlyle's time was, also, the time of the Brontës, of Mrs. Gaskell, of George Eliot.

The Hansons lean over backward in their attempt to be simply factual and unspeculative. Their page-and-a-half appendix saying that, in their view, the Carlyles simply found sex relations unsatisfactory and so discounted them is admirably cautious but hardly enlightening on the meaning of this for either of them. Surely it is not necessary to go to extremes of psychoanalytic biography in order to offer some hypotheses on the nature of the mixed elements that entered into these two lives. How much of their attraction for each other and their unending conflict was the inevitable problem of two people—one of whom drew strength from within himself and from the breadth of the abstractions with which he found himself at home; the other who found herself dependent for renewal precisely upon the multitude of outside daily events and people, which to her husband were appealing but essentially alien? It will be interesting to see whether the Hansons go any further into such questions with the very different relationship of Marian Evans and George Henry Lewes in their forthcoming life of George Eliot.

One thing does emerge through the Hansons' carefully measured presentation of facts: they do not like Jane Carlyle. They go to some pains to underscore her spiteful and mean-spirited acts and the way flattery, especially as she grew older, always revived her failing health. These things were undoubtedly no small part of her personality; but were they all? What does not come out in this book is the source of her endless attraction for other people, including her husband. Suggestions on this appear in Carlyle's "Reminiscences" and in his letters to "my poor, dear Jeannie," some of which the Hansons give. Revealing, too, is Carlyle's inscription in the pamphlet edition of "Sartor Resartus," which they do not quote:

To Jane W. Carlyle. This little book, little Milestone in a desolate, confused, yet not (as we hope) unblest Pilgrimage we make in common, is with heart's gratitude inscribed by her affectionate T. C.

HELEN M. LYND

A Most Amusing Novel

THE SPENDTHRIFTS. By Benito Pérez Galdós. Farrar, Straus and Young. $3.50.

BENITO PEREZ GALDOS (1843-1920), very popular in Spain, is also a major European novelist. In England and America, however, he is almost unknown. Some plays and a few minor novels have been translated, most of them over fifty years ago. Yet he wrote the "National Episodes," a historical survey of nineteenth-century Spain forty-five volumes long, and seven or eight important novels. Among them is "The Spendthrifts" ("La De Bringas," 1884) which now appears in English for the first time.

It is the best and the most amusing novel I have read in months. The "schools" of naturalism and realism are not clearly distinguishable in it, one from another. Galdós sees that society determines the lives of his characters; he convinces us that they are free to conduct themselves almost as they please. The most obvious influences on "The Spendthrifts," as they were among his major literary enthusiasms, are Balzac and Dickens, though his sensibility is entirely original.

The action occurs in Madrid during the spring and summer of 1868, the last months of the reign of Isabella II; it is resolved by the revolution which sent that amiable royal hoyden into exile. Almost every event—one of the merits of "The Spendthrifts" is the sense it conveys that much is always happening

THE GOD OF GALAXIES

The god of galaxies has more to govern
Than the first men imagined, when one mountain
Trumpeted his anger, and one rainbow,
Red in the east, restored them to his love.
One earth it was, with big and lesser torches,
And stars by night for candles. And he spoke
To single persons, sitting in their tents.

Now streams of worlds, now powdery great whirlwinds
Of universes far enough away
To seem but fog-wisps in a bank of night
So measureless the mind can sicken, trying—Now seas of darkness, shoreless, on and on Encircled by themselves, yet washing farther
Than the last triple sun, revolving, shows.

The god of galaxies—how shall we praise him?
For so we must, or wither. Yet what word
Of words? And where to send it, on which night
Of winter stars, of summer, or by autumn
In the first evening of the Pleiades?
The god of galaxies, of burning gases,
May have forgotten Leo and the Bull.

But God remembers, and is everywhere.
He even is the void, where nothing shines.
He is the absence of his own reflection
In the deep gulf; he is the dusky cinder
Of pure fire in its prime; he is the place
Prepared for hugest planets: black idea,
Brooding between fierce poles he keeps apart.

Those altitudes and oceans, though, with islands
Drifting, blown immense as by a wind,
And yet no wind; and not one blazing coast
Where thought could live, could listen—oh, what word
Of words? Let us consider it in terror,
And say it without voice. Praise universes Numberless. Praise all of them. Praise Him.

MARK VAN DOREN

—takes place on the upper floors of the Royal Palace. Here exists, almost completely separated by poverty from the royal debauchery, a complex society, the "Palace-city"; it is inhabited by minor court functionaries, charwomen, hangers-on of the royal household, and petty bureaucrats. Some of these people believe in the offices they hold. They are pleasant, well-mannered, and ordinary. Galdós never creates the grotesques so common in Balzac and Dickens.

The plot centers on the financial difficulties of Rosalía Bringas, married to an unimportant and diligent bureaucrat, and on the beginnings of the moral downfall of this clever and corruptible Emma Bovary of the palace. On this middle-aged couple the dead hand of the "ruling passion" lies heavy. But the misleading and easy formula for explaining human behavior grows increasingly less important as the novel progresses. The Bringas are poor. Rosalía has a passion for finery. She is "full of vanity"; her temperament is "inaccessible to every passion except the passion for dress." As for Bringas, he is a petty miser; by exercising the most stringent domestic economy he has saved a few thousand reals.

In Balzac or in Dickens such characters are moral monsters: a Grandet, a Miss Murdstone, a Jonas Chuzzlewit. Exactly here Galdós's sensibility saves him. He knows that ruling passions do exist and that they propel human beings into catastrophes. He knows more. Rosalía has motives deeper than her passion for dress. She may despise her husband for the shifts his niggardliness puts her to: pawning the silver candlesticks when he is temporarily blind and unable to keep an eye on the household gods; unpleasant dealings with money-lenders; seduction by a finely-drawn bureaucrat, Pez (Fish), who will, she vainly hopes, pay her debts. She is also more than her ruling passion. The finest scene in "The Spendthrifts" is her return from her one sorry assignation to her unfashionable and exasperating husband and the noisy children whom she loves. For the moment she values Bringas as he would like to be valued, a paragon of the domestic virtues. In the same fashion Galdós shows us a Bringas who is more than a stupid official and a preposterous miser. He is a man of honor, despite his old nankeen suit, which, he deceives himself into believing, always looks like new. He loves his wife, though with a family passion. After the queen goes into exile he insists, half-blind and approaching nervous collapse, on leaving his beloved Palace-city, so profound is his moral contempt for the revolution.

Everywhere in "The Spendthrifts" is a feeling for the beauty of life, even in the most dreary circumstances, even in the Royal Palace in Madrid in 1868. Light and shade, gaiety and joy infuse writing which might easily be no more than a careful history of ruinous conduct, dull court intrigue, and commonplace worries about money. A sense of wonder is never absent from the account of daily life: a walk in the royal park, children bathing in the Manzanares, the preparation of a simple meal, the cutting-out of a dress, the weather of a Madrid summer—all assume a reality and convey a sense of life going on which is never to be questioned.

Income and Welfare

THE ETHICS OF REDISTRIBUTION. By Bertrand de Jouvenel. Cambridge University Press. $1.75.

THE tremendous increase in the scope of central government activities in the last generation has sometimes deliberately, sometimes inadvertently, altered the distribution of personal incomes. In part the increased impact of government finance is a consequence of war and defense efforts. But much public spending, especially for social security, reflects a changing concept of social responsibility, a substantial consensus that such personal emergencies as illness, old age, and unemployment can be met successfully only by collective action. Although important questions of extent and method remain unresolved, there are few who entirely reject the social functions of the modern state and deny the necessity of some income redistribution to accomplish them.

M. de Jouvenel cannot be fairly included in this minority: He does not relieve the state of a Christian duty to succor the unfortunate and the handicapped. What he does question, partly on economic, but largely on moral grounds, is the modern liberal view of the state as an agency of social improvement, cultural diffusion, and economic justice. In his opinion, government is inefficient, blundering, unperceptive, and, in the end, tyrannical. It stifles original thought and prohibits that free market in ideas, that willingness to accept risk, which have marked our society's past cultural progress. Inevitably income redistribution fosters the large, powerful, and ever oppressive state, since there is needed—here the author cites J. E. Meade—"an exceedingly complex machinery" to collect the incomes of the richer and redistribute them among the poorer.

The strategy of M. de Jouvenel's economic campaign against income redistribution or income equality (it is not always clear which concept he is attacking) is somewhat novel. He does not rely on the commonest argument against income redistribution, that it has adverse effects on incentives and, consequently, on the rate of economic progress. His principal economic point, rather, is that redistribution is financially impossible. A fairly lengthy computation purports to demonstrate that at least in England the lowest incomes cannot be raised to a desired minimum without reducing higher incomes to a level which endangers the living standards of the lower middle class and so attacks incomes which the most ardent redistributionists do not wish to molest. As the author's figures are hypothetical, it may well be that any actual redistributionist would react to them with a startled "Who, me? You've got the wrong guy." Neither does the logic, much less the arithmetic, of his argument apply to societies whose production regularly increases; in an expanding economy more may be given to some without giving less to others. At this point M. de Jouvenel seems to need the support of the usual case against redistribution.

The crucial elements in his case are moral. They center on the still unresolved controversies set off by the nineteenth-century English utilitarians. Like J. S. Mill in his later writings, M. de Jouvenel believes that there is a hierarchy of goals and pleasures and that individuals are more or less valuable as their capacities minister to aims higher or lower in this hierarchy. In recent history the middle class has harbored the largest number of valuable citizens. Therefore, this class deserves and requires amenities, even luxuries, beyond the ordinary. Its cultural existence depends above all on a wide range of personal choices. These choices the redistributionist state progressively narrows. By reducing the individual's income the state restricts his control of his children's education, curtails his purchases of books and paintings, and limits his ability to subsidize political and cultural objectives of his own selection. More and more activities once privately supported move into the orbit of state control as individuals become less and less able to finance them.

Throughout this persistently provocative book, M. de Jouvenel makes evident his belief that the "good society" and the welfare state are incompatible, without so much as sketching his own version of a good society. Speculation suggests that he approves the individualistic arrangements beloved of laissez-faire economists. The risks for the poor would be minimized by the largesse of the state and the social conscience of the rich, in whom M. de Jouvenel possesses touching faith. Most important of all, his good society is united in the pursuit of non-material, and vaguely theological, aims.

We are left with a question: Have we in the Western world taken a wrong political turning which threatens to destroy our freedoms, or is the welfare state, firmly guided and carefully watched, potentially a force for social improvement and cultural diversity? Certainly the pressures toward cultural uniformity have not come entirely from the state; various private groups, business, religious, and fraternal, have been equally potent. But M. de Jouvenel is relatively untroubled by the growth of private power and uninterested in the case that can be made for its public control.

This reviewer's disagreement with the author is obvious. None the less, M. de Jouvenel has in brief space succinctly expressed doubts of great importance even to those of us who find government more benevolent and redistribution more desirable than he does. Undeniably there are dangers in a powerful government; surely the limits of redistribution remain unclear; and inevitably the outlines of the good society are mysterious. All this and more M. de Jouvenel gracefully advances in prose whose style is as neat and concise as its contents are potent.

ROBERT LEKACHMAN

Stevens As Essayist

THE NECESSARY ANGEL. Essays on Reality and the Imagination. By Wallace Stevens. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

AMONG casual readers of poetry, one sometimes hears: "Ah, yes, Wallace Stevens. A very fine poet, no doubt, but how can you account for a man who persists in writing about such silly subjects?" On the one hand, this. On the other, the incredible injustices Stevens has suffered from those who take him seriously, from critics who have written admirably about Chaucer and Keats and Hart Crane and have had nothing but twaddle to say about Stevens. In this predicament—between the devilishly uninformed and the deep blue connoisseurs—it has been up to Mr. Stevens to save himself, and he has made a long stride in that direction by collecting in one volume, where they will be ineluctably accessible to even the laziest of us, seven of his important essays in prose.

Stevens is a poet who still believes that poetry is the supreme activity. Unlike many of his colleagues, who have turned to traditional dogmas or positivisms, Stevens refuses the opinion that art is a game, a propaganda, or a ceremony. For him, poetry—he can say this unabashedly—is a means toward truth. It is man's best means, for its instrument is man's greatest faculty, the imagination, which surpasses indubitably the philosopher's reason and the scientist's inductive technique. And poetry, if it succeeds, possesses also the power to bestow upon its participants an automatic by-product—ennoblement.

Yet the poet's imagination is useless unless he brings it to bear squarely upon reality, and for Stevens reality is the vastly differentiated, sometimes discouraging reality of our own world, a world untinged by intimations of any supernal intelligence. It is a reality of almost unlimited beauty for those who deal with it imaginatively and in its own terms. The poet who can enhance, organize, and make comprehensible an aspect of reality participates in the discovery of a truth. He ennoble himself and his readers; to him belong the moral and intellectual rewards of nobility. Reality is for the poet, as for all men, "the necessary angel," without a high regard for whom the poet would be only another radio announcer, howling in the wind.

As a poet, Stevens's primary duty has been to write poetry, to explore reality. He has written many poems, most of them admirable, some of them truly great. But as a poet who feels the poet's position in the modern world insecure—not economically or socially, but intellectually—Stevens has given himself the secondary duty to write about poetry. He has made a definition of poetry; he has studied the way poetry works. He has given us several theories of the processes of imagination, theories which elucidate the properties of metaphor, analogy, and resemblance. He has been especially concerned with the way poets look at reality, the way each man sees a tree differently, for these various views comprise what we can apprehend of truth, and they are our raison d'être as sensible beings.

How different are these ideas from those we usually hear of Stevens! Among his admirers, he is a high romantic, a direct descendent of French impressionism, a mage of the poetic ritual. Among his critics, he is a funambulist, an élégant, a hedonist, a decadent, even a dude. Both parties have been too much impressed by the externalities of Stevens's poetic style, his very precise rhetoric and his occasionally rococo vocabulary. They have seized upon and exaggerated those poems in which Stevens has presented an exotic view of the world, poems of Florida and Tehuantepec, and they have neglected the poems which extol the august and even austere beauty of mundane things. They have forgotten, in other words, what has always been true: a poet's observations, if they are valid, must be his own, and his style, if it is effective, must be original.

The fact is, the ideas Stevens expresses in these essays and has always expressed in his poems bear a much closer affinity to Wordsworth, to Sidney, or to the men of the ancient world than they do to the decadents of the late nineteenth century. In so far as our world is decadent in comparison with the ancient or any other world, Stevens is too, though I should prefer to use some such word as "refined" or "elaborate." The nobility that Stevens has sought is not Homer's; it is a modern nobility, intellectual and subtle; it is heroic only in its spiritual or aesthetic staunchness. Perhaps it is not nobility at all, but a kind of very good intelligence or very intelligent goodness that we in our moral sedentariness can still aspire to. But whatever it is, it is not foolishness or frippery. It is earnest, though not deadly earnest, and its products—Stevens's poems—are serious works, constructed to a measure which would allow no extraneous or supercilious ornament. It is inconceivable that a poet whose concept of poetry is the one enunciated in these essays could be vulnerable to affectation or preciosity. Stevens has created a theory of the value of poetry which surpasses in seriousness the more insistent dicta of all his contemporaries, and his poems are hard grapplings with reality, out in the open, away from the culs-de-sac of spiritual remoteness that have trapped so many of the rest.

The development of Stevens's thought has been, if one hesitates to say logical, at least consistent and true to its own problems. The questions raised in his latest essays go back directly to his early poems, "Sunday Morning," "Sea Surface Full of Clouds," and so on. Most of his ideas are not original—his close affinity to Wordsworth has already been pointed out by J. V. Cunningham—but they have been rigorously tested by all the poetic conditions of modernity. Nor has Stevens tried to write criticism or aesthetic theory. His essays are more nearly an operating program for poets, for one poet particularly—Stevens himself. As such their greatest importance will be as an adjunct to, or defense of, his poetry. To this end—the real appreciation of Stevens's poetic achievement—they are indispensable.

I do not want to turn from noticing these essays without saying a word about their extraordinary qualities as literature. Like his poems, Stevens's prose contains many prodigious remarks: "The centuries have a way of being male." "The supreme example of analogy in English is 'Pilgrim's Progress'." "When we look back at the period of French classicism . . . , we have no difficulty in seeing it as a whole." These will probably scare small scholars half out of their wits. So much the better. A little area must be reserved. But we know that Stevens likes to shock us, and we laugh and look for the most outrageous and exotic surmises, until, all at once, they are no longer outrageous and exotic but the astute and respectable thoughts of a man who lives in Hartford, Connecticut. These are rich essays; simply constructed yet richly and elegantly written. They contain many references, an anthology-full of quotations from the most various and delightful authors, all very much to Stevens's purpose, but all exciting and pleasant to come across for their own sake. I do not mean to be altogether frivolous when I suggest that the best way to read this book is to invest in a bottle of the best sherry one can afford and a twenty-five-cent cigar. At least I found them the appropriate accessories and not at all antagonistic to the seriousness I have spoken of.

HAYDEN CARRUTH

An American in Istanbul

LET'S TALK TURKEY. By Willie Snow Ethridge. The Vanguard Press. $3.

HE WHO would bring home the wealth of the Indies, said Dr. Johnson, must carry the wealth of the Indies with him. Mrs. Ethridge demonstrates, in the latest and probably most successful of her travel books, that she has done just that. However, "Let's Talk Turkey," like its predecessors, "It's Greek to Me" and "Going to Jerusalem," does not usurp the role of either Baedeker or the encyclopedia. Less gifted travelers have taken care to arm themselves with such knowledge, but Mrs. Ethridge relies instead upon the eminently American qualities of curiosity, a sense of humor, and the unforced ability to like people and understand them. These constitute a wealth of the Indies that good travelers must have, and the great thing is that Mrs.

Ethridge so clearly enjoys her travels. All three books, in fact, emphasize the reaction of Americans to the ancient lands at the eastern end of the Mediterranean, rather than matters of geopolitics. This time Mrs. Ethridge and her distinguished husband were accompanied by their twelve-year-old son, Mr. Big, whose strong antipathy to even the finest mosques will be appreciated by anyone who has been exposed to them.

The Ethridge's visit to Turkey, and the book, were the result of an accident. After a return visit to Greece as the guests of the Greek government (Mr. Ethridge, as a member of the United Nations Balkans Commission, had helped persuade the Truman Administration to provide help against the Greek Communists before it was too late), they decided to spend a few days in Istanbul while waiting for the freighter on which they were to return home to discharge its cargo. As a result of complications in unloading the freighter the days stretched into weeks, and the Ethridges, while lamenting the delay, made the most of their opportunity to see what modern Turkey is like.

Some of the stories, in particular the time Mr. Big was caught driving a Turkish taxi, and the troubles that developed when Mrs. Ethridge appeared with a camera in what turned out to be a prohibited zone, are hilarious; Mrs. Ethridge is an excellent raconteuse. At a time when the general outlook, which is bad enough, is made even worse by quantities of direful viewings-with-alarm, Mrs. Ethridge's gaiety and good humor are particularly welcome.

However, she is also a shrewd reporter, and although she pretends to be not quite sure where Jason sought the golden fleece, or Xenophon reached the sea, her anecdotes always make a definite point. Few writers have captured so well the spirit of present-day Turkey, a country which, despite the constant threat of Soviet invasion, is still concentrating its energies on the creation of an industrialized and relatively democratic state; even with the impetus supplied by Ataturk, it has taken a strenuous effort for the Turks to make the leap within a single lifetime from the era of harems and weighted sacks dropped in the Bosphorus after midnight.

The American-style go-getter is a prominent if unexpected part of Turkish life. The presence of such a booster helps give a special shading and proportion to Where the Saints Have Trod, the account of a visit to Antioch and the church where Paul preached—"the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch"—which may yet find a place in an anthology of modern essays. Mrs. Ethridge is to be congratulated on a very good book.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON

Wiring the Farms

THE FARMER TAKES A HAND. By Marquis Childs. Doubleday and Company. $3.50.

HOW thoroughly we now take for granted many reforms of the New Deal which once were bitterly fought and resisted! Senator Robert A. Taft, Mr. Republican himself, campaigned for votes in the recent Wisconsin primary by boasting that the Eightieth Congress had appropriated generously for rural electrification. Of course, there was once a time when generosity in this respect seemed, to Mr. Taft, a peril to the nation.

In an excellent chronicle of the crusade to electrify America's farms, Marquis Childs has gone back far beyond that time, to the period when TVA and backwoods power lines were just a glint in the eye of a great public servant, the late Senator George Norris. Two decades ago rural electrification served only one farm in every ten. Today it serves nine farms in every ten. This may be just another statistic to city folks, more numbers on a printed page. But it means virtually life itself to millions of Americans in hinterland valleys and along dirt roads.

My wife's farming family in the State of Washington has not enjoyed electricity so long but that the touch of the light switch and the reassuring drone of the automatic refrigerator are full of significance. These people talk about the time when they cooled butter in the creek and stumbled to a sickbed with a kerosene lamp. The 230,000-volt Bonneville line, which bisects their fields, is a sign to them that government can undertake programs to make life better.

Marquis Childs, brought up in Iowa in the heart of the tall-corn realm, writes feelingly of the great mass movement which created the Rural Electrification Administration and brought comforts and machinery to the farm. He has prepared a history of REA and of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, which is the organization that lobbies for REA appropriations and defends its policies in the field of politics. The author has high praise for the first director of REA, Morris L. Cooke. He believes Cooke was right when he advised President Roosevelt that loans both to co-ops and private utilities should be on a basis that would result in ultimate return of the government's money. Competition between the companies and the co-ops worked to the eventual benefit of the farmer. It also helped some of the very companies which had cried "socialism" when REA originally was proposed. In this election year Mr. Childs's eleventh chapter, The Politics of Power, is particularly recommended to those millions of conservative Republicans who expect a Tory millennium if the G. O. P. returns to the White House.

REA was a joint product of those two arch-New Dealers, FDR and Uncle George Norris. It was denounced in the beginning as another waste of the people's funds, a hand-out feature of the dangerous Welfare State. Would the rampant Republicans abolish it, or even impair its operation? Listen to Senator Taft: "It is true that in the case of the REA the money to establish these facilities, which in the power field are very expensive, has been loaned by the government. But that should not change the cooperative character of REA. So the government also subsidized the first transcontinental railroads and other enterprises where, for one reason or another, private capital could not undertake the complete support of new and risky development." Mr. Childs inserts this significant sentence, "Very few members of Congress criticize REA directly." And he calls attention to the fact that Governor Dewey told a St. Paul audience in 1948 that the Eightieth Congress had "voted by far the largest amount ever provided by any Congress to speed electricity to our farms—$800,000,000."

So although Republicans assail subsidies in general, Mr. Republican justifies subsidies to electrify farms. And although the Republicans lambast government spending in the abstract, the last Presidential nominee of the Republican Party heralds the many millions invested by a Republican Congress in a program begun by that favorite target of Republican orators, the New Deal.

No man avid for America's highest office is going to have anything except kind words for an agency which has made it possible for farmers to have deep freezes, milking machines, and automatic coffee-makers. Louis Bromfield has said that farm production is dropping per acre, and, in Mr. Childs's words, "electricity made the greatest aid in increasing farm production since the introduction of Eli Whitney's cotton gin."

This useful book, which opens with a challenging introduction by Senator

George D. Aiken, Republican of Vermont, would be even more useful if the publishers had included an index. Why limit a book's survival powers by denying it the compass on which so many researchers rely?

A Guide to Gogol

NIKOLAI GOGOL (1809-1852). A Centenary Survey. By Janko Lavrin. Distributed by the Macmillan Company. $2.50.

AS A tribute to the genius of Gogol, a hundred years after his death, Professor Lavrin's brief survey of his life and work is welcome since it is almost the only notice anyone has taken of the event. It is welcome also in that it raises the number of books in English about Gogol to almost half a dozen. The most available of the earlier studies is by Vladimir Nabokov (issued by New Directions in 1944) and should be read as a supplement to Professor Lavrin's book which will be the one most likely to lead a reader to Gogol's work. After Gogol one should perhaps turn to Nabokov to prepare for a reconsideration.

The current study, pursuing a rather cautious academic path, offers sketches of biographical data, of all the stories and plays, and of psychological interpretations. Professor Lavrin follows generally accepted criteria; whereas Nabokov, in a breezy style of his own, analyzes Gogol's artistry and intentions in ways which, if sometimes open to question, are fresh and individual, and in doing so he dismisses some widely accepted theories. (He is wrong, I think, in rejecting the symbolism of impotence which Professor Lavrin points up as suffusing much of Gogol's work.)

Since this study is useful as a handbook or an introduction and was so intended, it would hardly be just to complain that it does not go deep enough. At the same time, more attention could have been devoted to Gogol's artistry, perhaps, by reducing the length of the synopses. There are, however, rather full accounts of Gogol's early life and his pathetic last years when the drive of his Messiah complex destroyed his talent and revealed to him at last its innate shallowness.

Between these two unhappy periods of inner conflict came the great fiction "Dead Souls," the caustic play "The Inspector General," two fine stories, and many others of less merit. As the important work of a lifetime, such a list seems meager unless one knows the quality of the writing; then one is aware that it presents a rich mine for critics. Professor Lavrin's survey indicates the diversity of wealth to be found in Gogol.

Man Alone

THE WORKS OF LOVE. By Wright Morris. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

WRIGHT MORRIS'S new novel is about loneliness. He understands profoundly how comical it can be in the busiest country in the world, and how touching too. I should say that he has demonstrated by now that he is unrivaled as an interpreter of those tangents of the American scene where the funny and the pathetic collide, and that there is wanting only the warm narrative flow that has been mastered by lesser novelists, to make his writing transcendently powerful and important.

Will Jennings Brady, the man in search of love, the only "actual" person in the book, is born in a sod house on the Western frontier to a lonely silent father and a mother who has been ordered through the mails. Both of them die before Will is very old. He is successively assistant stationmaster, night clerk in a small-town hotel, chicken-and-egg merchant, sorter of way bills in the Chicago freight yards, and finally Santa Claus at Montgomery Ward's. This "man who was more or less by himself" acquires several wives, mostly prostitutes, along the way, and a son to boot, although the son is not really his; but in the end he is left quite alone, reading a soiled old letter from his "son" to anyone who will listen.

In each incarnation Will Brady is seen in a kind of classic pose of that loneliness that is nowadays classified as alienation, groping blindly for a love that will not reveal itself to him. It is a pose that we recognize at once, not alone from our own experience, but from our lessons in Sherwood Anderson and, less obviously, in William Faulkner, in those pages where Faulkner rages at the fate of men corrupted and despoiled of their basic human attributes as they are separated from nature and overwhelmed by an inhuman technology.

But Morris does not rage. Neither does he weep. His compassionate gaze is more like that of Charlie Chaplin, and Will Jennings Brady, seated amid the hotel lobby's potted palms, waiting for a miracle like so many of his fellow-citizens, is a close relative of the Charlie who summons up a sweet and sickly grin as he nerves himself to approach the blind flower girl.

Mr. Morris's technique, however—he is a distinguished photographer as well as a novelist—is just the reverse of that of Chaplin, who leads us from the general to the particular, as his symbolic and nameless types become identified to us through their universally recognizable behavior. Mr. Morris moves relentlessly from the particular to the general, naming everything that the eye can see, superficially in the manner of the naturalistic novelists but actually in the service of a wider frame of reference, of a brilliantly defined reality that gradually takes on the characteristics of a singular myth akin to Chaplin's. Will Brady's boy does not merely chew gum: "A wad of Black Jack chewing gum was being saved on the bridge of his nose," and the brand name has a significance beyond its use as label, reminding us specifically of a time when Black Jack had a peculiarly valued place in the small boy's vocabulary.

In Will Brady's final room, at 218 Menomonee Street in Chicago, on the other hand: "On the mantelpiece was a shaving mug with the word SWEET-HEART in silver, blue, chipped red, and gold. In the mug were three buttons, a rollerskate key, a needle with a burned point for opening pimples, an Omaha streetcar token, and a medal for buying Buster Brown shoes." Here the cataloguing leads us back through a lifetime of desolation and forward to Will Brady's final effort to find something more real than buttons, keys, and medals.

The individual tableaux through which Will Brady proceeds in a series of trance-like movements oddly similar to Charlie's jerky encounters with brutes, fat men, millionaires, beautiful girls, and so on, are masterfully executed as true comedy and as the products of an original vision of American life. But they are discrete scenes, without the flow of life from episode to episode that makes Chaplin's films such completely resolved works of art. It is as if we were given a series of separate stills and asked to make the essential connections.

This is a serious criticism to make of a writer who is demonstrating with each new book that he belongs in the small company of creative men who see the world through their own eyes as it has never quite been seen before. But it is one that cannot be avoided, and there is surely hope that Mr. Morris will be able to couple his unique vision with that quality of movement which enables the reader not only to find himself, as he does in Mr. Morris's novels, but to lose himself well. An Educator's Philosophy

JOHN DEWEY: THE RECONSTRUCTION OF THE DEMOCRATIC LIFE. By Jerome Nathanson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

NOW that John Dewey's satisfying and enormously rich life has closed, there will be a plethora of articles about him in an attempt to assess his impact, the imprint he left on so many fundamental aspects of our culture.

Jerome Nathanson's book should take its place, among the handful of works about Dewey, as a summing-up, a final accounting. Written with Dewey's approval and encouragement, it treats in succinct fashion the major problems the philosopher and educator posed himself through a long and unfailingly productive life. Not only is Nathanson's book the latest to appear about his subject, it is the most direct, the least abstruse. And its limitations are caused by the conscious exclusion of topics which lead away from a discussion of Dewey as a political and social thinker.

As the title implies, Nathanson conceives Dewey's greatest role, among the many he played with admirable effect, as a proponent of functioning industrial democracy, as opposed to that society in which business control of the political machine spells, sooner or later, the decline of the very democracy which untrammelled business "freedom" lauds while seeking to abuse it.

Dewey's early training is sketched in: his first contacts with the thought and theories of William James, his encouragement to make a profession of philosophy by W. T. Harris (eventually United States Commissioner of Education), his early acceptance of Hegel and eventual rejection of much that is endemic to Hegelian thought, the emergence of his own pragmatic philosophy in which he drew sustenance from such native thinkers as Peirce, Emerson, and James.

Among the main contributions of Dewey's thought, which will affect literally millions of people who may never know his name, is surely his concept that education has as its aim to create on the broadest possible scale "man thinking," to encourage the individual not to ape in his thinking the attitudes and prejudices of a civilization other than his own, but to strive for a fusion of the critical and speculative faculties with the practical, common-sense qualities by which the individual copes with the problem of his own survival. Along these lines, Dewey, in his work as head of the Department of Education at Columbia University, fostered the progressive-school movement which, though recently meeting with some blindly bitter and partially justified rebuke, has been the great liberating force in American education. The aim of Dewey's educative process was to help the individual to learn by doing, to respect the day's work (or study or play), rather than to regard the entire educational span as a preparatory period, a waiting for the future when all the miscellaneous "learning" would be put to work.

He has been criticized on the grounds that his empirical method limits the educational horizon to those strictly practical fields in which, at each age level, the student can function with competence by himself, and does not include enough challenge, enough encouragement for the unusual or gifted. The answer Dewey gave to concerted attacks against his work by leading educators in 1944—that the system whereby those who could were to study "higher subjects" while the mass, by implication of inferior stripe, were to be relegated to the study of practical subjects—was that "liberal education for a small elite group and vocational education for the masses [was] completely reactionary and . . . fatal to the whole democratic outlook."

Aside from Dewey's educational reforms which took concrete shape in the New York school system from 1941 on, his political thinking embraced the fundamental issues of our day and his point of view—consistently progressive, anti-totalitarian and liberal—found expression in his work for a third party. He believed, as Nathanson tells us, that "the answer to our central dilemma, both economically and democratically, lies in responsible participation in cooperative enterprise." This is interventionist thinking at its best: don't leave the political machine in the hands of a few maneuverers who will see to it that the ball falls in their chosen slot. In line with this, Dewey voiced the axiomatic slogan, "Vote for the man and not the machine."

His political thinking is traced and related to his philosophy and educational system, in this short book, so that one even moderately familiar with Dewey finds links which complete the picture. For those who know his name and little of his work beyond the titles of his best known books, Nathanson can be an invaluable, modest guide.

The book is completed by a chronology of major events in Dewey's life and by a short bibliography of works about Dewey to which the present must be added as the most unassuming and generally useful yet on record.

FRANCES KEENE

Verse Chronicle

THE jacket says that "The Suburb by the Sea" by Robert Hillyer (Knopf, $3) is "very different from the sustained magnificence of Mr. Hillyer's preceding volume, 'The Death of Captain Nemo.' "Sustained magnificence" is not exactly the way I recollect it, but "very different" is dead right. And a good thing too. How pleasant it would be if we could remember Mr. Hillyer for only such work as this, free from anxiety, free from rancor, easy, good-natured, skilful, almost courtly, alive to and with the good things of life! Among other excellencies, Mr. Hillyer is to be commended for his knack with the five-beat couplet form, whose return it is cheering to find.

Also pleasant, in somewhat the same genre, more ambitious some ways, less adroit in others, are the poems in "The Enchanted Grindstone" by Henry Morton Robinson (Simon & Schuster, $2.50). It is, if not surprising, encouraging, to have this great rich house publishing verse; and now may we look forward to the time when Essandess will issue books of equal merit whose authors have not achieved best-selling novels? That will be the day.

In humbler vein, "Waters Over Linn Creek Town" by Ralph Alan McCause (Bookman Associates, $2.50) is folksy verse, unpretentious in craftsmanship, simple, and good, in the emotion that prompts and pervades it. The narrative tells what happens to people when progress happens to them, in this particular case, who the people were and what became of them when a power company saw fit to build a big dam in a county of the Ozarks. There is little crying about it, though there is some sadness; this is what happened.

Both Peter Viereck and Dylan Thomas say they think "Impatient Lover" by Lillian Rockwell (Dial, $2.50) is very interesting. I do too, and I guess my favorite line is that one that exclaims "O quiver of duck-wings in my gelatinous pond!" That the author can sustain such heights is hardly to be expected, but she gives it a mighty good try. "Foamed with spray of floating breasts / (alike, confetti-spun!) / He sought his oneness with them all, / With all the breasts." Wow.

Shame on my ignorance! Until The Muses' Library sent his complete works, edited by Dorothy Broughton ($3), I had never heard of William Diaper, or at least had paid no attention to Swift's five references to him in the Journal of Stella. Those readers of The Nation who are better informed about his poems Brent, The Sea Eclogues, and Dryades, or The Nymph's Prophecy, as well as his translations and imitations, will find this, like most of the volumes in this series, a handy, interesting, and scholarly item.

Some books about poetry and poets might be mentioned this time. "The Background of Modern Poetry" by J.

Isaacs (Dutton, $2.50) expands on remarks previously addressed, through the BBC's Third Program, to an audience capable of having its prejudices removed and its misconceptions corrected. Professor Isaacs is not overly sympathetic with those who profess and call themselves moderns; not exactly light, his study is fairly quick reading. Much more thoroughgoing is the study by an American professor, Harold Watts of Purdue, "Ezra Pound and the Cantos" (Regnery, $2.75). This firm appears to be seriously interested in bringing out worthwhile books of criticism. Putting the best possible face (though in an annoyingly parenthetical style) on the integrity and integration of the Cantos, Professor Watts, in his final chapter of reckoning, concedes that they are probably not quite all the author cracked them up to be. Hardly a week goes by, now, without something about Rilke rolling off the presses; this time it is "Rainer Maria Rilke: His Life and Work" by a Dutch scholar, F. W. Van Heerikhuizen (Philosophical Library, $6). Interesting in its early chapters, the book thereafter is most pedestrian; too many long quotations from Rilke's more solemn-choly letters. M. Van Heerikhuizen is at times, justifiably, a little impatient with Rilke's insistence on dedication, and, less justifiably, it seems to me, inclined to overvalue some of the earlier poems.

"The Metaphysical Passion" by Sona Raiziss (University of Pennsylvania Press, $5) purports to be a study of seven modern poets—Eliot, Tate, Warren, Ransom, MacLeish, Wylie, Crane—and the seventeenth-century tradition. Miss Raiziss's prose style is all but unreadable; nevertheless, her book must have taken an awful lot of work.

HAYDN'S Quartets Opus 77, two of the finest of the series, which were recently issued by the Haydn Society as played by the Schneider Quartet, are now issued by EMS as played by the Heifetz Quartet. This is a group of highly competent and experienced ensemble musicians (I do not, as a statement on the envelope might lead one to think, consider them "the finest chamber music artists available today"); and their performances are good. The Schneider performances, however, bring out and point up more of the rich detail of the progressions, and are better-paced. The recorded sound of the Heifetz performances, like that of the Schneider, requires reduction of treble, to minimum in No. 1. Unlike the Schneider performances they are on two sides of one record.

Elman's playing in Mozart's Violin Sonata K.454, on an RCA Victor record, is simple but stolid and a little shrill-toned; Rose's piano-playing is wooden. Menuhin's playing in the engaging Schubert Duo Opus 162, on another Victor record, is more straightforward than in the past, and his tone more compact though still coarse; Baller's piano-playing is very good. Beethoven's Sonatas Opus 12 No. 3 and Opus 23, which I find uninteresting, are well played by Francescatti and Casadesus on a Columbia record; the violin sound is a little sharp.

Weber's Grand Duo Concertante Opus 48 for clarinet and piano, issued by WCFM, has his characteristic grace and charm; the Variations Opus 33 are mostly less interesting. The performances by Sidney Forrest and Leonid Hambro are excellent; bass needs to be stepped up.

Rehearing Schubert's Impromptus after a long interval I have been newly impressed by what fine pieces of music most of them are. But Firkusny's playing on the Columbia record has again impressed me with its lack of cohesive tension and consequently of sharpness of outline and organic coherence and power. Bass needs stepping up.

Haydn's Symphony No. 103 ("Drum Roll"), one of the best of the London group, is played well by Münch with the Boston Symphony (but an uncustomary and, I believe, questionable treatment of an appoggiatura note strikes the ear several times in the first movement). On the same Victor record is Beethoven's First Symphony, also well played. The sound isn't always clean.

The Dittersdorf Symphony in A minor on a Lyricord record I find uninteresting; the performance by Erich Kloss with the Frankenland State Symphony is good.

The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'or" played by Golovanov with the State Radio Orchestra of the U. S. S. R. on a Vanguard record is described as "uncut"; but I can discover nothing in it that isn't on the recent Capitol record of Desormière's performance. What the Vanguard record does offer is innovations in tempo and accentuation which make me prefer the Capitol performance even though it is reproduced with less than the remarkable clarity and distinctness of the Vanguard. Golovanov also conducts a noisy-sounding performance of Musorg-sky's "Night on Bald Mountain."

Vanguard has issued the first recorded performance of Bloch's "Israel" Symphony. The work is characteristic in idiom and in its whipping up of climaxes that subside into brooding quiet; but its substance and development don't add up, for me, to one of the more impressive Bloch achievements. The performance by Litschauer with the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and soloists of the Akademiechor (including a superb contralto) is excellent.

Several songs by Haydn, ranging from pleasant to the fine "She Never Told Her Love," are sung well on a WCFM record by Tii Niemela, soprano, with pallid accompaniments by Pentti Koskimies. In some songs of Schubert one is occasionally aware of the voice's insufficient sensuous beauty. Texts are provided.

On a Victor record Erna Berger employs her cool, clear soprano voice in a few charming songs by Mozart and Schubert's "Haidenröslein," with delicate accompaniments by George Schick. Texts are provided.

Beethoven's "An die ferne Geliebte" is sung very beautifully by Mack Harrell, baritone, with discreet accompaniments by Coenraad Bos, on two Victor 45's. Only English translations this time.

And all of Chopin's songs—early pieces, some of them engagingly melodious, and with no resemblance that I can hear to the works of his maturity for piano—are sung beautifully by Maria Kurenko in Polish, with good accompaniments by Robert Hufstader, on a Lyrichord record. English summaries.

A Message to Readers of The Nation

Nine months ago, without fanfare, a new publication was born.

It was an unusual publication for these times.

It promised to print the many stories and articles that most newspapers and magazines dare not publish because they might bring forth pressure-group reprisals or advertising cancellations.

In short, it promised to dig out and publish "inside stories" which would have no other possible way to reach the American people.

The name of the publication is

EXPOSÉ

Said our statement of policy:

"...Exposé will do battle with frauds, whether they be people or products. Exposé will fight bigotry. It will spotlight all who would destroy our freedoms — whether they be Communists or the '1000% Americans' who would adopt Communist methods in their pretended fight against Communism.

"And yet, Exposé will have no axe to grind. We will print only the honest factual material which is exclusive because no one else dares to print it."

Exposé is independent and liberal, as the great majority of the American people are independent and liberal.

Nine issues have appeared.

They have met with tremendous enthusiasm.

Exposé is daring... during these times which call for daring.

It is in the tradition of a free and fearless press which dares to probe everywhere. Exposé accomplishes things.

The current issue of Exposé turns the spotlight on the American Medical Association. It also contains an exciting column by Dr. Leon Birkhead of Friends of Democracy. And one by Sidney Margolius, former shopping editor of the newspaper P.M.

The last issue exposes the spy network of the Anti-Defamation League. It also contains The Chiropractic Story; Jim Peck's report on stockholders' meetings; and the inside story of immorality in South America told by a priest who has left the church.

The issue before that contains George Seldes' exciting report on his interviews with Tito. The Boston Catholic Heresy case is explored in detail. The Herald Tribune is exposed for its whitewash of the du Ponts.

Robert Scott's petition for the right of a Free-thinker to radio time is reported in detail.

Other issues have exposed the March of Dimes, Walter Winchell, George Sokolsky, Allen Zoll's plot against the schools, the Anna Rosenberg smear, etc.

...there have been articles by noted attorney Arthur Garfield Hays; by Billy Rose; by Associate Editor of The Catholic Worker, Robert Ludlow; by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell.

...extracts from Thomas Paine and Robert G. Ingersoll.

Exposé is a monthly. If you act now you may have the next 21 issues for $3.00. This will bring you almost two years' worth of Exposé.

Back issues are twenty-five cents (25¢) each.

By subscribing, you will help Exposé and make it possible for Exposé to help you.

The coupon to the left is for your convenience.

Who's Your Wife?

Jeffersonville, Indiana

A NEW extension of the "guilt-by-association" technique was developed in a loyalty-security case at an army installation near Louisville. A draftsman at the Jeffersonville, Indiana, Quartermaster Depot was dismissed because of his association with his wife.

The army's charges were not put so baldly, of course, but in the web of hearsay presented as evidence that remained the chief indisputable fact.

In notifying the employee, Frank Grzelak, 60, of his dismissal, the screening board which had conducted a hearing into his case in March assured him there was no question of his loyalty to the United States. But because of the activities of his wife, Josephine, 51, a member of the Progressive Party, the board felt that Grzelak constituted a security risk. So was ended his seventeen years as a federal employee.

The board seemed principally disturbed by Mrs. Grzelak's support of various Left-wing peace movements. These included helping to organize the Louisville Committee of the American Peace Crusade, seeking signatures to the Stockholm Peace Petition, and serving as a delegate to the Peace Pilgrimage in Washington, D. C., in 1951. The board was also disturbed by Mrs. Grzelak's taste in reading. It disapproved of her recommendations of "Betrayal," by (Albert D. Kahn, and various other less-known books such as "The Bible Unmasked," "Bases and Empire," and "Is Peace a Crime?"

These facts led the board to believe that Mrs. Grzelak "evidenced a sympathy with communism." No accusation was made that Grzelak himself participated in any of the activities attributed to his wife except that he once attended with her a public meeting of the Louisville Committee of the American Peace Crusade at the Louisville Y. W. C. A.; a somewhat nebulous charge that he had recommended to a fellow employee some of the books the board found so distressing was categorically denied by the defendant.

The hearing itself was described by Grzelak's attorneys, Robert Zollinger and Grover G. Sales, as "a kangaroo hearing based on kangaroo charges." Of the various charges leveled against his wife, none was aired at the hearing except those involving the books and the peace petitions. Government witnesses were briefed immediately before their appearance by an "advisory" attorney who sat with the three-member hearing board. Rules of evidence were set aside and defense objections to leading questions were ignored. Grzelak was queried, for instance, on his attitude toward municipal ownership of public utilities. Only one of the defense attorneys was allowed to participate actively in the hearing.

Six witnesses had been subpoenaed by the defense. Not one of the six appeared. Grzelak's attorneys reported those subpoenaed seemed to be in the grip of "an undercurrent of fear." One of those who did not show up admitted privately to a newspaper reporter that some time before the hearing he had been informed by an FBI agent that there was "more to the case than appeared in the charges." In questioning Grzelak, the board pointedly asked why none of his witnesses had appeared.

Government witnesses, for their part, showed an appalling lack of information on the world about them. One admitted she did not know the difference between the American Peace Crusade and the Crusade for Freedom. She did know the former was subversive, however, because it was so tagged by the Business and Professional Women's Association of which she is a member. The same woman testified that she knew the book "The Bible Unmasked" was communistic because the American Legion had so informed her husband. Another witness described a book given to him by Mrs. Grzelak as communistic because it "looked" that way as he glanced through it.

Another witness added a new definition of subversive. "It is," he declared, "anything contrary to the general belief." Under cross-questioning he amended this to the extent of excepting Mohammedanism. On such testimony Frank Grzelak was discharged.

The board's decision was received April 17. A few days later Grzelak's attorneys filed for an appeal hearing. The hearing was quickly set for June 6 at the Pentagon—and two additional charges were leveled against the hapless Grzelak. He was accused of having attended with his wife two Progressive Party meetings in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1951 at which "persons identified as Communists or Communist sympathizers" took part, and it was charged that a New Year's Eve party held by the Grzelaks on the last day of 1951 was attended by persons "reported" to be Communists or sympathizers. Grzelak's attorneys immediately asked for the identity of the alleged Communists and information on the manner in which they were identified. The government board remained mum.

Neither was any explanation offered for the fact that these "new" charges had not been aired at the first hearing, which was held some months after the offenses were said to have taken place. Had the FBI just come into the possession of the "new" facts or had they been held back deliberately for use in the event of an appeal?

Both the Courier-Journal and the Times, Louisville's two daily papers, took a strong editorial stand against the dismissal of Grzelak. The Times declared: "We hate to think that a man's right to work—as distinguished from his right to a given job—must hinge on his or his wife's political beliefs." It found the discharge "deeply disturbing."

One result of the case has been the formation by Sales, who is Kentucky counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, of the Greater Louisville Committee to Defend Civil Liberties. Its members include trade unionists, ministers, and radio and television personalities. Its first task will be to secure justice for Frank Grzelak. Of the hearing, Sales said. "For the first time in my forty years experience as a lawyer I was terribly frightened, frightened of what might happen to any citizen if the government chooses to attack him."

Already public contributions have been received by the committee in its fight in behalf of Grzelak. Sales has announced his intention of taking the case directly to President Truman if the appeals board refuses to reinstate Grzelak in some capacity.

The Real Republican Riddle

With the pre-convention campaign nearly over, the battle for the Republican nomination remains essentially unchanged. Discounting excessive claims by both camps, Taft and Eisenhower should enter the convention with approximately the same number of delegates (assuming that Warren and Stassen delegates will eventually swing to Eisenhower). The decisive votes, therefore, are to be found in the Maryland, Michigan, and Pennsylvania contingents, and also, of course, in the outcome of the contests over certain Southern delegations.

One or two recent developments, however, merit attention. General Eisenhower has noticeably failed to arouse any frenzied popular response to his candidacy. The public's attitude might be described as "friendly but cool." Attendance at meetings and receptions has, in nearly every case, failed to measure up to hopeful forecasts. A coast-to-coast survey conducted by the Wall Street Journal indicates that while "Mr." Eisenhower has not hurt himself much with his speeches, he hasn't helped himself either. Here and there a delegate may have switched but there has been no major trend toward Eisenhower. Of definite interest and some possible significance is a recent Chicago Tribune editorial complaining bitterly that the "big money of Wall Street" is on Eisenhower, and appealing to the people with "the little dollars"—the salary and wage earners—to ante up for Taft.

More and more it is becoming clear that the struggle between the Senator and the General is not a popularity contest but a struggle for power between two major groupings within the Republican Party which have sharply divergent interests on certain key issues. The real question about the Republican convention, therefore, is this: Where does the center of power nowadays rest in the Republican Party?

Steel Strike

Before negotiations between the steel companies and the union collapsed, the two sides appeared to be fairly near an agreement on wages (see Big Steel and the Little Man in this issue). However, according to Philip Murray, a number of other important questions remained unresolved, such as seniority rights and incentive pay, as well as the issue of the union shop. Management has attempted to give the impression that fundamental disagreement on this last item was the real cause of the breakdown and has declared that it will never be a party to enforced enrolment of employees in the union. What the steel companies have failed to explain, however, is why they must "on principle" deny to the steelworkers something that they long ago conceded through their subsidiaries to the United Mine Workers.

Thus the strike continues while President and Congress wrangle about how to end it. Congress lost no time in refusing Mr. Truman's request for a special seizure law, not for the right reason—the fact that such ad hoc legislation would set a dangerous precedent—but because it wanted to force the President to resort to a Taft-Hartley injunction. So far Mr. Truman has hesitated to take this step: obviously, if he does eventually order the Attorney General to seek an injunction, he wants it to be clear that responsibility lies with Congress.

Of course, use of Taft-Hartley would not necessarily put the steel-mills back into production, for the courts might reasonably take the view that the union had already met the provisions of the law by postponing the strike for 93 days. And if, nevertheless, another waiting period of eighty days were imposed, the strikers, feeling the scales of justice weighted against them, would return to work in a mood of bitterness that would bode ill for any final settlement. To us, continuance of the strike seems preferable, particularly since the workers have promised to produce enough steel to meet urgent military needs.

He Should Know

In a farewell talk to the United Nations Correspondents Association, Porter McKeever, who resigned on June 1 after six years as press officer of the United States Delegation, delivered several hearty blows right and left—blows he had evidently been saving up for some time. If his words provided considerable comfort to those who think the United Nations should be used more energetically to combat the Russians, they were equally critical of the American attitude toward the international organization. He cited several of the many occasions on which the United States had deliberately bypassed the U. N. in carrying out its policies abroad and deplored in particular the anti-United Nations movement now gaining ground in this country at a dangerous pace. He specifically mentioned a "false and scurrilous attack" on UNESCO educational materials, printed in the Congressional Record and airmailed all over the United States.

This movement has culminated in the so-called "Bricker resolution"—sponsored, however, by fifty-nine members—proposing a constitutional amendment which, in Mr. McKeever's words, would make "our continued participation in the United Nations, and virtually every other international organization, a practical impossibility." It was no apologist for Russia but an American official with years of experience and work behind him who concluded bluntly: "The United Nations is no longer a dominant element in the conduct of American foreign policy." To those of our readers who sometimes find us unduly critical of that policy, we commend his words.

Canadian Socialism Gains

Two provincial elections in Canada last week produced encouraging results for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. In Saskatchewan, where it has been in power ever since 1944, it gained a sweeping victory, taking 42 out of the 53 seats in the legislature. Final results in British Columbia will not be known until July 3, owing to the operation there of an alternative-vote system. But on the first count the C. C. F., which had only eight members in the last legislature, was ahead in 21 constituencies.

The Liberals, Canada's dominant party, suffered a serious setback in both provinces. In British Columbia, where they had held a majority, they were leading in only nine constituencies at this writing, and in Saskatchewan they suffered a net loss of eight members. The Social Credit Party, which has been trying to spread its influence from its Alberta stronghold, appears to have made important gains in British Columbia. By contrast, in Saskatchewan its total vote was halved compared to 1948 and all its 24 candidates were defeated.

Friction within the Liberal Party together with dissatisfaction with the federal government's farm policies, contributed to the C. C. F.'s Saskatchewan victory. But the main reason for its gains is undoubtedly its record of achievement in the past eight years. It has been a true people's government bringing real benefits to farmers and workers. It has, for example, instituted a health program providing free hospitalization in return for a family contribution of $30 a year and set up a government insurance office that has reduced the cost of fire and automobile insurance. It has also launched ambitious plans for the development of resources. In short, within the rather narrow limits permitted by the provincial constitution, it has followed a socialist policy. Evidently the voters approve.

Veto the McCarran Bill

The McCarran (anti-) immigration bill, which seeks to substitute a padlock for the Statue of Liberty, is now in the hands of the President for his signature. In a brilliant analysis of the pernicious measure, Felix Cohen, former solicitor for the Department of the Interior, urges a Presidential veto on the grounds that the bill: (1) puts the foreign-born among us under increased jeopardy of deportation, with or without hearings, for acts reaching decades back which may even have been perfectly lawful and proper when they occurred; (2) puts American citizens abroad in jeopardy of loss of citizenship and exclusion from the United States without notice or hearings; (3) gives large new powers to various government officials by making their "opinion" a basis for exclusion or deportation; (4) lays down statutory discrimination against colonial peoples as well as all other people whose family tree includes 50 per cent of "Asia-Pacific ancestors"; (5) surrenders American sovereignty by delegating to foreign governments the power to decide which of their citizens or former citizens the United States may admit; (6) provides for the deportation of political and religious refugees for a wide variety of reasons; (7) stultifies America's moral leadership by reaffirming in 1952 illiberal racial judgments and isolationist attitudes which were written into our statutes three decades ago.

To this plethora of cogent reasons for a veto, we can add nearly 50,000,000 more. That many in the United States are either foreign born, have at least one foreign-born parent, or are colored. The McCarran bill strikes, either directly or through their parents, at the normal American rights of one-third of our people.

Korean Kaleidoscope

WE ENTERED Korea with the announced objectives of returning that unhappy land to unity and to democracy. If our enemy Mao effectively blocked us from achieving the first, our friend Rhee has been no less valiant in preventing us from achieving the second. In this regard, there is much in the Korean picture that smacks of high comedy in the classic sense. But the world is in no mood to laugh, not even at the spectacle of Uncle Sam being bitten in the ankle by a wayward nephew. There is too much at stake for all of us.

Aside from the Rhee affair, there are two chief trouble spots in Korea: the truce talks at Panmunjom, and the "second front" on Kojé.

Kojé Front. News dispatches out of Korea have been misleading on a basic issue. For the most part, they have implied that "kangaroo" courts, prisoner riots, mass defiance, and executions of dissident prisoners by those in control, are the devilish inventions of the Communists. As thousands of our own veterans of World War II can testify, nothing is farther from the truth. We had similar trouble with our German and Japanese prisoners all through the war, and Allied prisoners in Nazi hands behaved the same way when sufficiently aroused. The vengeance wreaked by the Maquis upon collaborators—whether within or outside the prisoners' enclosures—is an obvious case in point. And even in the Kojé compounds, as the New York Times's George Barrett pointed out in an especially interesting story last Sunday, "the system of kangaroo control . . . was by no means a special franchise for Communist fanatics; bitter anti-Communists . . . took no lessons in cruelty from the Red 'czars.' "

THE bodies of seventeen garroted anti-Communists found in a Kojé compound reaffirmed an obvious truth: human beings, when moved by fanatic adherence to a cause, are capable of great cruelty. Our weakness in Kojé, as almost everywhere else in both the hot and the cold war, is that we have never brought ourselves to accept the possibility that the people in Communist countries may believe in Communism. We blandly assume that no one in his right mind would wear a Communist uniform unless there were a Communist pistol at his back, and that all we had to do to turn him into an anti-Communist is to take away the pistol and give him $54 worth of G.I. uniform and a can of C ration. Clearly we have been looking in the wrong places for genuine Communists; there are more of them in Communist countries, and far fewer of them here at home than we think.

In any case, in view of our repeated official statements that the Kojé compounds were ruled by Communist cliques, and that none of our people dared enter them for months at a time, the question remains. How did we manage to screen the Kojé prisoners? And how did we arrive at our big anti-Communist majority if the rank-and-file of prisoners were really under the thumbs of the Communists?

The Panmunjom Front. During the prolonged debate on the question of voluntary vs. forced repatriation of prisoners, we have been wearing a mantle of nobility which, in our hurry to buy, we grabbed from the over-size rack. We have been asserting, for instance, that it would be inhuman to return to the Communists some 100,000 prisoners whom we claim to be anti-Communists. But the sincerity of our concern for them must be judged in the light of the passage last week of the McCarran act, which—unless vetoed by President Truman—will effectively see to it that wherever these poor prisoners go once they are freed, it won't be to this country.

It can properly be argued, of course, that where national security is at stake, it is silly to talk of humanitarianism. But that argument is equally valid for the Communists. As long ago as January 17, the Peking radio charged that the United Nations was planning to permit its anti-Communist prisoners to join the Nationalist forces on Formosa. Concerning this charge Admiral Libby of our truce negotiating staff had this to say: "Just as Korean soldiers have the right to choose which part of Korea he wants to go, so the Chinese volunteers have the right to choose whether they want to be repatriated to the Republic of China [the Formosa government] or to the China People's Republic [Communist China]." Can anyone deny that it is a threat to Communist China's national security to permit the transfer of Chinese soldiers to the Nationalists in Formosa?

BUT to say we have overstated our case on the war prisoners' issue is not to say that we have no case at all. There never was any reason for us to return to areas north of the 38th Parallel prisoners whose origins are south of that line. After some dilly-dallying, the Communists themselves accepted the principle; since last March, it has been clear to our negotiators that all South Koreans could be resettled in South Korea. In addition there are some thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of prisoners in our hands who were not technically "captured," but who deserted as a result of our propaganda, including our promise to protect them. It is difficult to see how we can evade the responsibility for their continued safety. And there is a final category of prisoners to whom we owe a moral obligation: individuals who, according to available specific and concrete evidence, have been of service to our side and have thereby incurred the enmity of the Communists. The rest, it would appear, should be repatriated. This is in accordance with the Geneva convention; it is in accordance with the traditions of war; and it is in accordance, one can be certain, with the wishes of the 12,000 United Nations prisoners, now in the hands of the Communists, who would like to go home.

In our Korean policy we have failed properly to appraise the psychology not only of the Communists, but of our allies as well. The growing unrest of our European partners over Korean developments, particularly the British, is the result. We are not doing ourselves a service in insisting that General Mark Clark, and the Pentagon, shall be the sole arbiters of destiny in the Orient. Let us share the next mistake—if there is to be one!

As this is written, British Defense Minister Earl Alexander is visiting in Korea. He should be told that a British representative would be welcome to sit with the Americans under the truce tent at Panmunjom. And a representative of the French, who have their own troubles in the Orient, should be invited too. After all, the flag flying over the tent is that of the United Nations, not the United States.

Disarmament Interlude

By J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

United Nations

THE atmosphere here grew no brighter after General Clark's statements threatening to bomb Red China if the Communists should start a major offensive in Korea. Together with the general dismay over the grim events on Kojé Island, Syngman Rhee's arrogant behavior, and the truce deadlock, it increased the feeling that we are entering a new period of the gravest war tension. All of this was inevitably reflected in the Disarmament Commission where Jacob A. Malik, Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister, turned down the new Western plan for putting ceilings on armed forces, denouncing it as "false and hypocritical." But this stalemate should not be taken as a sign that negotiations are useless or are likely to grind to a halt. The disarmament talks provide a continuing arena of discussion and it is rare that the Russians leave a conference table of their own accord.

Moreover, in the last few days there have been several important off-the-record attempts—by men who are unwilling to remain passive while tension rises to a dangerous pitch—in the direction both of reassuring the Russians and of encouraging the British and French to express their desire for conciliation more firmly than they have done so far. Foreign Minister Uden of Sweden, in his typically quiet way, has been especially active behind the scenes, urging both sides to bring about a four-power conference on Germany before ratification of the Bonn and Paris treaties ends all chances of doing anything. This view has now been given official expression in the French request of June 11 for a Big Four meeting. Responding to these pressures and to the urgings of the British government—which is itself influenced by popular clamor and the strong stand taken by the Parliamentary Labor Party—Washington has agreed in principle to talks with the Russians.

But perhaps as effective as the demand for a conference is the growing threat of non-ratification. I know that the French have advised the Russians that ratification of the fateful treaties will take more time than we expected at the moment of signing; that it will at least be delayed until after the American elections. The purpose of this move is to counsel the Soviet leaders to avoid needless provocations. In addition, certain influential French officials are urging postponement of action until the general elections in Germany next year.

The Russians probably regard all this with skepticism. They must assume that if American pressure was able to force the signing of the treaties it will be equally effective in regard to ratification. But meanwhile they lose nothing by remaining in the conference rooms where discussion, no matter how negative, still goes on.

German Rearmament: Road to War

BY CAROLUS

Bonn

SEVEN years after his miserable death, Hitler is celebrating his greatest triumph: Germany is to be re-armed by the same Western World which he had vowed to destroy and which, despite the huge sacrifices demanded of it, had risen to strike down the monster. Seven years after the unconditional surrender, what the Führer had hoped for in vain until the last minute becomes a reality: the West allies itself with the Wehrmacht for a crusade against the East. And as in all tragedies of Shakespearean scope, here too the satiric subplot is present: for the second time, and this time with the aid of the Western democracies, the Hitlerian spirit becomes master of the German people, who wanted to have no further truck with barracks, guns, and war.

There is no use in looking back casting up the account, figuring out on whom the blame for this development falls. No doubt, whether wittingly or unwittingly, those in power in the Kremlin started the train of events by their policy of force, and took such a burden of guilt upon themselves that may God and the Russian people have mercy upon them. Not often in history has such a working capital of sympathy been squandered and turned into its opposite as Soviet Russian policy from May, 1945, to May, 1952, has succeeded in doing. But anyone who travels through Germany and Europe with his eyes and ears open knows too that the former enthusiasm for the United States has also dropped far below the freezing point and that there is as much enmity for America as there is hate for Russia. This is also true of countries in which there is almost no question of a Communist Party or a Communist movement. "Both are to blame," you hear in Bonn as in Paris, "the Americans are as guilty as the Russians"; and if the great majority of Frenchmen and Germans are today in agreement on one thing, it is in their grievance against the United States for having brought the Wehrmacht back into the world again. The millions of Marshall aid, the improvement of living standards, the preservation of democracy, the safeguarding of peace—in the eyes of the Western European peoples, and not least in those of the German Federal Republic—all that is undone by the contractual agreement and the military pact with the Adenauer regime and the German generals.

The war on Bolshevism, Marshall aid for military purposes only, the European army—these were echoed in the words of a French deputy: "France sees herself forced into a policy which she rejects from her soul. What a parody that we are to extirpate the Russian evil by the German evil!" What do the Germans say? Here is a typical quotation from the nationalistic weekly, Der Spiegel, which in format and significance corresponds to Time magazine in the United States:

It is immoral to loosen a prisoner's chains on condition that he bear arms for his former master. . . . That this conglomeration of peoples [the European army] could not protect German territory from a Soviet invasion can be taken as demonstrated. That it could not prevent world war is agreed. So long as the French maintain a defensive alliance against Germany with the Soviets, the Kremlin's influence can make the German contingent amount to no more than a psychological sedative for the visionaries in Bonn and for the American taxpayer. . . . The consequence will be that the Soviet zone of Germany, which is under ruthless command, will raise more troops than the Federal Republic. The consequence will be that the Soviets will be able to use the resentment against the "German peril" in Czechoslovakia and Poland and raise more troops there too. Who is benefited by unwilling West German troops if they still do not alter the balance of power between East and West?

"Preservation of democracy"! The way in which these agreements were brought into existence and signed shamed democracy. The condition for the provisional peace treaty with Bonn is the rearming of West Germany and its military pact with the Western Powers. No people, no West German parliament, was consulted in the matter, because the regime knew that, in signing the two agreements, it acted contrary to the will of the great majority of the people, who want no more to do with rearmament than with the provisional peace treaty. For this treaty means that German unity now becomes impossible to attain by peaceful means. But since a people of sixty-eight million cannot in the long run be kept divided, its army, in the hands of eight thousand of Hitler's former officers, will present a danger not only to the East but also to its immediate directors in the West.

Twelve German divisions remain twelve German divisions, under whatever name and under whatever flag they march. Called into existence against the will of the people, and thus automatically against the people, and put into motion without democratic controls, this army will very soon lead a life of its own, independent of parliament and people, with its own policy and its own aims. No Dr. Adenauer and no American High Commander can alter that. Without effective control by any parliament of the six participating West European states, this German army—and presumably the entire European army likewise—will become a dictatorship of military technocrats, who will be joined by economic technocrats in accordance with the number and magnitude of the armament industries which the army will require. There will be a political dictatorship by the military hierarchy.

The cold war has not only its military aspect; economic, social, and psychological factors are at least as important. This European army, in the hands of the military technocrats, will always see the Communist problem only from the military point of view. It will neglect those other factors even more than they have been neglected hitherto, and so make things easier for the Communists and for Soviet Russia.

I will give an example to show how markedly the spirit of military bureaucracy already appears in the agreements signed at Paris and Bonn. In the West German Federal Republic, which Dr. Adenauer obligated by his signature, there are four and one-half million war cripples, war widows, and war orphans. On the meagerest of pensions, they live a life of starvation unworthy of human beings. Hence they are a perpetual focus of dissatisfaction and unrest. Yet in the defense treaties just concluded, only the pensions for the professional officers and noncommissioned officers of the erstwhile Hitler army and the Wehrmacht are recognized as legitimately deductible defense charges for the Federal Republic. What an encouragement to become a soldier for those who do not want to choose the army as a career!

In this same West German state, the Minister of Justice in the Adenauer Cabinet has been saying for months, in public speeches, that a third of the pensions of these four and a half million war victims has been diverted to other purposes, presumably military. Thus the regime is swindling the poorest of the poor in order to finance the building of the army. What psychological perspectives!

"What?" we hear. "No voice for people or parliament, a democracy which has already become a farce, no national unity, but the permanent division of Germany, the darkest social outlook? There's going to be trouble in the Federal Republic." There will be trouble even though the Germans are a patient people, trained by twelve years of the Hitler dictatorship and the subsequent occupation to even greater patience and obedience. Certainly something is stirring in Germany. Every new election announces a victory for Schumacher's opposition party. During recent weeks workers in hundreds of thousands and in every city, have obeyed the strike and demonstration calls of the unions in protest against rearmament and the contractual agreement.

This agreement contains the riot clauses—the clauses for the protection of the occupying troops which gives them the right to take the preservation of peace and order into their own hands. And because the Germans are accustomed to obedience, there will soon be no more strikes, and the handful of German Communists will not succeed in kindling a greater fire. The American civilian officials of the High Commission, for the most part extraordinarily capable men, who have lived on good terms with the population, will now be replaced by officers who will take their orders from the American army authorities. The statute of occupation, which has obtained until now, terminates; the occupation and its special rights, codified in countless clauses, remains. Remains, too, a provision, over which there has been intense discussion and which today is more or less concealed in an annex, which stipulates: If tomorrow or the next day the two German zones come together again, if the unity of Germany is reestablished, the East zone shall enter into the same rights and duties as those which the Bonn regime has undertaken for West Germany. But it was precisely to prevent German rearmament that Soviet Russia began its exchange of notes with the Western Powers. How could Moscow return to its proposals for German unity when it is already signed and sealed that the East zone, freed from Russia's clutches, is to be armed by the West against its former occupier?

France is trembling before the rearming of Germany. The proposed twelve West German divisions—even if it stops at these twelve—will be the strongest military force in Western Europe, stronger than all the other Western European states together. In the East zone the Russians will likewise raise twelve German divisions. Considering that the greater part of the French army is bleeding to death in Indo-China, any attempt to confront Russia with an equivalent force in Europe would automatically drive all the Western European states into an armaments race which could not but strain their economies to the breaking point and create social conflicts whose consequences could only benefit bolshevism. It is an iniquitous illusion to believe that American divisions could be withdrawn from a rearmed Germany and a remilitarized Western Europe. On the contrary, more and more American divisions will be needed vis-à-vis ■ Russia and its satellites who are determined not to lag behind in the armaments race.

And the Germans? Will East and West plunge into a civil war? Before they do that, the generals of the future West and East zone armies, subject to no sort of democratic control, will try to come to an agreement. At whose expense? At the expense of the Western Powers, for only Soviet Russia can reestablish German unity.

Russia can even, if need be, return to Germany the territories beyond the Oder-Neisse line and open to the Germans the markets of the East, even unto China, for which the Germans hanker.

Nothing final has happened yet. The Bonn and Paris agreements are not yet ratified; Germany is not yet rearmed; the great adventure has not yet begun. However much justified hatred those in power in the Kremlin have brought upon themselves, however unfortunate and destructive their power policy has been, the West and its democratic politicians must also beat their breasts; they, too, have ■ great mea culpa to acknowledge. The division of Germany is the division of Europe. The rearming of Germany is the road to the great adventure: to chaos and war. German rearmament will make Hitler's generals the arbiters between East and West, masters of peace and war. In the consuming flames of a third world war Hitler will enjoy his revenge, even in hell.

Europe Votes for Eisenhower

BY MARK GAYN

Rome

THIS is June in Western Europe, a time of ripening grain, of anxiety and war maneuvers. In France, there are strikes, riots, and a debate on whether Jacques Duclos's two dead pigeons were the carrier or the stewing kind. West Germany is going through the painful Soviet reaction to the peace contract in Bonn. Here, in Italy, the echoes of last month's local elections are drowned out only by the frenzy which attends the annual eighteen-day bicycle race.

What with all these preoccupations, Europe seems to have little mind left for the coming Presidential elections in America. Later on, popular interest will pick up. But today, ask ten Italians what they think of Bob Taft, and nine will look puzzled. For most Europeans the Senator from Ohio is not even an identifiable name.

Yet, this is a misleading picture. American politics are an integral part of the European scene, and anything that affects the making of American foreign policy closely affects Western Europe. Thus, many observers here feel that no American election in history has meant so much for the destiny of Europe as will the next one. In fact, the "American November" has for months been one of the most powerful, if unsettling, elements in European politics. This has been true on all levels, from anti-U. S. soap-box oratory to intricate diplomatic moves.

MARK GAYN, author of the widely read "Japan Diary," has spent the last five years in Europe.

Not long ago, at a neo-Fascist meeting in a small town in South Italy, I heard an orator forecast that the next, "tough" occupant of the White House "will need our young men, the only young men in Europe able and willing to fight." Conversely, a speaker at a huge Communist meeting here in Rome explained that "Wall Street imperialists are electing Eisenhower to the Presidency so he can launch a new profitable world war."

On a higher plateau, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer has been charged by his Social-Democratic critics with rushing through the various agreements with the West to provide "Ike" with a solid campaign issue. It has not been difficult to refute this charge. Yet, in a way, it has truly reflected the German government's preference for Eisenhower.

Similarly in France, the shadow of Taft, former President Herbert Hoover, and the entire isolationist camp has lain heavily on the making of foreign policy. Le Monde undoubtedly mirrored official thinking when it wrote recently: "One could say without any exaggeration that most of the concessions which the French leaders made during recent [West European rearmament] negotiations have had but one aim: to assure the success of Eisenhower's candidacy in the next elections—a candidacy which carries for us a guaranty of non-abandonment. And also an assurance against a preventive war."

Finally, here in Italy the "American November" is already ■ part of the nation's political fabric. It crops up in the speeches of Communist dock bosses exhorting striking longshoremen; in Communist posters, neo-Fascist appeals, government promises. It is the subject of debate in political circles, disturbed every bit as much by the possible outcome of the American elections as they are by their own national elections next Spring. And when Eisenhower comes to Italy for a farewell call, the Left at once charges that he has come to bolster the unsteady fortunes of Premier Alcide De Gasperi. The widely-read, pro-Communist Paese Sera urges him not to listen to De Gasperi but to those voices in the United States which demand peace. "Then, should he win, he will one day be able to say proudly he had assured himself of the gratitude of the whole world."

Not unnaturally, Western Europe views the American election through a prism all its own. To most non-Communists here, it is not a contest between the Republicans and Democrats, or between isolationists and internationalists. To them the "American November" will decide only one thing: whether the "pro-Europeans" or the "anti-Europeans" will shape American policy. Since the candidates regarded as "pro-European" happen to belong to the relatively more progressive wing of their parties, one finds here the curious sight of, say, a Socialist and a ward heeler of Catholic Action cheering for the same Americans. Neither the Right nor the moderate Left is concerned about the candidate's domestic policy. The only touchstone is whether the man has shown sympathy for Europe and its problems.

By this test, Eisenhower is the outstanding favorite. The attitude is as uncritical as it often is in the United States. Even the "neutralists," who assail the American "military mind," are willing to forget that Ike is a general. And non-Communist trade-union men choose Ike even when they learn his attitude towards organized labor may not be excessively liberal.

What most Europeans seem to like about Eisenhower is that he has demonstrated his good-will for Europe, and that he is a calm and unbombastic man. General Douglas MacArthur gives Western Europe the shudders; Ike, by contrast, stands for political sanity. Newspapers call him "an honorary European." A leading daily here says Italy would be happy to see him win in November, for he has "a sincere friendship for Italy." ("If Eisenhower had remained in command here," it says rightly or wrongly, "the Italian campaign would have been much shorter and less destructive.") And in London, the Times joins the chorus with: "He will always be remembered as a great friend, under whom men of this country are proud to have served. . . . General Eisenhower is the best known and best loved American in Europe."

As for the Democrats, the only candidate who gets an occasional pat on the back is Averell Harriman. He is, of course, known far less widely on this continent than Ike, but what is known appeals to the non-Communists. He, too, is an "honorary European," credited with understanding Europe's needs and having tried to meet them. Wishfully, some European observers see the "American November" as a contest between Eisenhower and Harriman. Whoever wins, Western Europe cannot lose. As for the Kefauvers, they seem to fascinate the editors of illustrated magazines more than the public. Unacquainted with the brighter features of American political life, the Europeans tend to regard Estes with his raccoon hat as a one-man three-ring circus.

THE election comes at a particularly sensitive season for Western Europe. There have been other such periods before, with war alarms and economic worries. But, somehow, there was usually the underlying conviction that war was not yet, and that the generous American uncle would help if the money ran out.

The feeling has not been unanimous. Here, the Communists call President Truman il padrone d'Italia, or the boss of Italy; in France, they call him "the butcher of Korean children." With a boost from the Communists, and often without it, the anti-American feeling has been steadily growing, and finding important political outlets. Yet, I am convinced that most Europeans to this day are not hostile to the United States, and President Truman is not universally disliked. The London Times probably reflects a widespread feeling when it says that Truman has risen "high above any assessment" that might have been made at the time of Roosevelt's death, and that he has pursued "enlightened and far-seeing policies for the economic revival" of the Western world.

Somehow, Western Europe has been adapting itself to the post-war climate of alarm and worry, and in this adjustment American aid has been an element of normality and stability. Today, the adjustment—psychological, political, and economic—is being threatened by the uncertainties of November. Truman is going; the economic aid, already curtailed, may be cut off; and what will happen here if some "anti-European" moves into the White House? Two things are uppermost in the mind of Western Europe—bread and peace. Increasingly, both seem to depend on what the American voters will do next November.

This has produced a curious duality in European thinking. Most Europeans fear war, and want to be left alone by the strategists of both Washington and Moscow. Yet, they equally fear being "abandoned" by the United States—without credits or raw materials or food. In other words, the Europeans want Uncle Sam to remain here as a provider of needed funds, but to be an ocean away when it comes to politics.

Morals on Your TV

BY FRANK ORME

ROBERT E. FELLOWS, president of the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters, speaking of Congressman Gathing's forthcoming probe into the moral standards of broadcasting programs, declared that "we have arrived at a point where freedoms of press and speech indeed are seriously threatened in a nation that has become the last great bulwark of those liberties of the people." He told Washington newsmen that any contemplated legislation resulting from the investigation "would appear to be censorship of the most obvious and deplorable sort."

Mr. Fellows's warning is probably valid; what is remarkable about it is that it should have come from him. For the N. A. R. T. B. itself, on March 1, installed a system of censorship over TV which goes far beyond anything any group of law-makers has so far dared to suggest. This was accomplished through the adherence of more than eighty of the 108 television stations in America to the association's television code.

The code is described by its proponents as a "voluntary system of self-regulation." Actually, it is an attempt by a trade association to control a public medium of mass communication. It presents the spectacle of top echelon broadcasters sitting in judgment over each other's morals, and over those of lesser broadcasters, in secret sessions which arbitrarily exclude the most interested party in the whole transaction—the public.

The document is ten pages in length, with two main divisions. The first division includes a preamble and a dozen or so sections which clearly state the television industry's responsibilities, but which only vaguely define the minimum acceptable standards for programs and advertising. The second part establishes regulations and procedures in definite terms.

As a guide or creed for individual broadcasters, the first part by itself might be acceptable to the industry and to the public, even though past experience with similar codes gives little encouragement that it would be effective. However, incorporation of "police" procedures into the regulations completely changes the character of the document. It is no longer a creed or guide; it is an instrument of censorship placed in the hands of a jury which any court in any democratic country would disqualify on the grounds of prejudice and self-interest.

FRANK ORME, editor of TV Magazine, took part in the meeting of the Western Regional Radio and Television Conference early this year at which the N. A. R. T. B. television code was launched.

Broadcasting Standards

Here is a condensation of the principal broadcasting standards established in the code of the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters:

1. News reporting should be factual and without bias; commentary and political broadcasts should be identified as such; freedom of expression in broadcasts of a controversial nature should be maintained, but the right should be reserved to refuse them for non-compliance with laws such as those prohibiting defamation and sedition.

2. Religious programs should be presented respectfully and accurately and without prejudice or ridicule.

3. Children's programs should reflect respect for parents, law and order, clean living, high morals, fair play, and honorable behavior.

4. In crime and mystery programs, criminals should be punished, specifically or by implication. Programs should avoid detailed presentation of brutal killings and torture—as well as the disrespectful portrayal of law enforcement and characterization of officers of the law as stupid or ridiculous.

5. Advertising is the life blood of the free, competitive American system of broadcasting. . . . In accepting advertising the broadcaster should exercise great care that he is not conveying to his audience information which is misleading, dangerous to health or character, distasteful, or in violation of business and professional ethics.

The right of a station to display the code's so-called "Seal of Good Practice" is dependent on the thirteen-man television board of directors of the N. A. R. T. B. This group by a two-thirds vote can suspend or revoke a station's subscription to the code for a "continuing, wilful, or gross violation" of its provisions.

Administratively the code works this way: the supreme body is the N. A. R. T. B. television board, described by Justin Miller, board chairman of the association, as the code's "supreme court." This group is assisted by a five-man "police" or review board which acts solely in an advisory capacity. The code emphasizes that all proceedings will be conducted in secrecy.

Four of the thirteen members of the "supreme court" are executive employees of the four major TV networks; six others operate stations in various localities; all thirteen are members of the N. A. R. T. B. Each of the six station operators has from one to four contracts providing for the televising of programs furnished to them by the networks. By code edict, the five review board members are also N. A. R. T. B. members. They operate stations in Seattle, Kalamazoo, Milwaukee, Baltimore, and Atlanta—all one-station outlets except Baltimore (three) and Atlanta (two). The member living closest to the Hollywood program-production center is Mrs. Scott Bullitt in Seattle. Not one of the five lives within viewing distance of a major production center. Three of them can view regularly only programs televised by their own stations. The group serves without pay on a part-time basis. (This month, with a Congressional inquiry imminent, the N. A. R. T. B. board added a full-time administrator to the staff.) The five members have a total of seventeen commercial contracts with the four major networks.

The review board is required by the code: (1) to maintain a continuing review of all television programming (450,000 hours televised in 65 cities in 12 months at current schedules); (2) to receive, screen, and clear complaints on program content which come to the N. A. R. T. B.; (3) to define and interpret the code; (4) to develop and maintain appropriate liaison with governmental agencies and "accountable and responsible" institutions; (5) to inform, expeditiously and properly, all subscribers of the attitudes and desires of such organizations and institutions; (6) to review and monitor programs; (7) to reach conclusions and to make recommendations to the board of directors concerning amendments to the code. These five persons, the code declares, will do all these things; they will do them in their spare time; they will do them without pay. It is obviously impossible that they will be able to carry out more than a fraction of their responsibilities.

Herblock in the Washington Post

"Disgusting, Ain't It?"

Paradoxically, the code's chief virtue lies in its unenforceability. Thus we are saved from some of the results of stultifying controls over a new and occasionally promising medium of expression. On the other hand, we are subjected to the hypocrisy spawned by unenforced and unenforceable laws and regulations. From first-hand viewing I can state that in Los Angeles, at least, not one of the seven stations is free from code violations, and several present continuous and flagrant violations.

THE week of May 24-30, I personally supervised a study of crime programs televised by the Los Angeles stations. During this period the six monitors tabulated 852 major crimes, plus innumerable saloon brawls, assaults, sluggings, and other "minor" acts of violence. The record included 167 murders, 112 "justifiable" killings, and 356 attempted murders. There were many robberies, jailbreaks, false murder charges, murder conspiracies, dynamitings, attempted lynchings, and other felonies. There was one attempted rape in a crime Western for children. Seventy-eight per cent of the crime deluge was presented on programs for children; 85 per cent was televised before 9 P. M.

We had made a similar survey a year ago. Our latest statistics showed that during the past year, while the television code was being formulated and put into operation, the volume of crime programming in Los Angeles increased by approximately 15 per cent. The over-all impression gained from the majority of television programs for children is that life is cheap; death, suffering, and brutality are subjects of callous indifference; judges, lawyers, and law officers are dishonest, incompetent, and stupid. One station televised a feature-length horror film about vampire bats at 5 P. M. Another, at 5:30 each afternoon, presented a lottery-type "contest" for children. (This is explicitly forbidden in the code.) One announcer, introducing a serialized crime film which ran for five days, told his audience that there was a strong moral lesson, "Do unto others as you would be done by," in the film to be presented. The picture portrayed a quick-triggered criminal as a hero for the kids to emulate. After he had reformed he murdered four members of his own gang, then surrendered himself to the law—for stealing horses. He was in love.

Documented evidence indicates that the Los Angeles stations are televising literally hundreds of code violations each week. What are the code administrators going to do about this? What can they do?

As long as the economic structure of the television industry requires the presentation of five hundred or more hours of programming per week in one city, television and mediocrity are going to be partners in a common-law marriage; mass production of high-standard programming is a physical impossibility. No trade-association code is going to create respectability;

no suppressive legislation—governmental or otherwise—is going to raise artistic or moral levels.

Day by day our television stations are piling up a record of the failure of the N. A. R. T. B. code. They are also misleading—or attempting to mislead—the American public. It is time for the broadcasters to admit the shortcomings of their operations, to drop the subterfuge of the code, and to come up with a fair and open effort, individually and collectively, to improve the situation as far as possible. After all, television is not a complete disgrace. Despite its faults, it is making many vital contributions to our society.

Big Steel and the Little Man

BY MARY HEATON VORSE

LAST FALL the rank and file of the steelworkers looked upon their union negotiations with management as routine. They had had no wage boost since 1950, while the Wage Stabilization Board had approved higher wages for shipworkers, packers, and a number of other industries. But what started out as an ordinary overhauling of a contract between union and management grew quickly into a cause célèbre; the whole country was caught up in a dispute of unprecedented intensity. The emotional context was the Korean conflict and the shutting down of an industry vital to this country's defense.

The dispute involved the President, both houses of Congress, the Pentagon, the Chiefs of Staff and their spokesman, Secretary of Defense Robert A. Lovett, and three federal courts—including the Supreme Court. It drew in a reluctant Secretary of Commerce, caused the resignation of Defense Mobilizer Charles E. Wilson, and set in an uproar the National Production Authority, the Office of Defense Mobilization, and the Wage Stabilization Board. At one stage no less than six different bodies were investigating various facets of the dispute. With so much going on at such high levels, it was not surprising that the ordinary steelworker became the forgotten man.

Meantime Congress, with the support of the National Association of Manufacturers and the national Chamber of Commerce, introduced a spate of proposals for punitive labor legislation. Newspapers throughout the country jumped into the fight—almost without exception on the side of management. The heads of the steel industry told their story through television, radio, and the press; they spent millions of dollars on full-page advertisements trying to convince the public that the union and the President were in cahoots against democracy.

By the time the Supreme Court made its famous decision, the W. S. B. had had its wings clipped and Congress was beginning to tamper briskly with the Walsh-Healey Act which prescribes basic work and pay standards for American labor.

To the steelworker, one fact in the dispute dominates all others: his conviction that from the first the industry had no intention of bargaining collectively with the union at any time. Phil Murray, in his report to the W. S. B. stated:

The decision to deny our wages and our economic requests was indeed abundantly announced even before our negotiating conferences began. Before we made our proposals Mr. Benjamin Fairless, president of the United States Steel Corporation, had rejected them. In a speech in Cincinnati on November 15 he announced that "whether our workers are to get a raise and how much it will be if they do is a matter which cannot be determined by collective bargaining, and will apparently have to be decided in Washington."

The steelworkers won a pay rise in 1950, but were still working last fall under a 1947 contract with United States Steel which was as irritating to them as a hair shirt. Few steelworkers anywhere in the industry enjoyed any such commonplaces as legal holidays with pay; they got no overtime for work on Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays; severance pay was given only by a few companies. The 1947 contract had faulty provisions relating to seniority, severance pay, grievances, and arbitration procedures. Hundreds of resolutions coming from every local throughout the length and breadth of the land demanded contract changes; the men were as full of grievances as an egg is of meat. Not the least of their grievances was that rising living costs made it more difficult for a steelworker's family to meet expenses.

The union submitted its proposals to the industry: a wage boost of 18 cents, fringe benefits, the union shop, and adjustments of the lagging non-economic provisions of the old contract. To all its proposals it received a simple and reiterated "No." United States Steel alone submitted counter-proposals on some of the non-economic demands, of which Murray had this to say:

The corporation's non-economic counter-proposals were designed to turn the clock of labor relations in the steel industry back to the nineteenth century when the jobs and working conditions of the employees were at the sole and complete mercy of employers. It proposed in effect to make the union disappear.

On December 20, Cyrus S. Ching, Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, tried for a settlement. But in two days of conferences—from which Mr. Fairless absented himself—he could get no counter-proposals from industry. Shortly thereafter United States Steel used full-page newspaper advertisements throughout the country to announce that the steel industry would not ask for increased steel prices if the union would forgo wage increases. What most of the public didn't know was that the industry had already been refused price increases by the government on the grounds that its profits were already high enough.

A strike seemed certain upon termination of the union's contract on December 31, 1951. At the last moment, the President certified the case to the W. S. B., asking the union not to strike pending the findings and publicly charging the steel companies with having refused to bargain collectively. The union, reacting quickly, met January 3 in Atlantic City and voted to postpone the strike until March 23. On the latter date the President asked for, and received, another postponement.

The W. S. B. finally came forward with its proposals: an increase of wages of 17½ cents plus fringe benefits amounting to an additional nine cents. The steel heads expressed themselves as shocked by the findings. Having spurned collective bargaining and insisted all along on keeping the dispute in the hands of the government bureaucracy, the "bureaucrats" had now played them false.

Beyond Comment

By what authority do petty officers, chief petty officers, and officers demand your obedience? . . . This authority comes to them in a long, long chain of command that reaches back to God Himself. . . . Knowing that all authority comes from the Supreme Being makes your military obedience easier. Your superior is God's representative, even if he doesn't know it nor believes it.—From Chaplain's column in the Dolphin, publication of the United States Submarine Base at New London, Conn.

[The Nation will pay $2 for acceptable contributions to Beyond Comment.]

On March 28, "apparently pursuant to an understanding with Mr. Wilson," Mr. Murray later told the steelworkers, a union meeting with the six largest companies was arranged in New York City. This was the first time that Big and Little Steel had sat down together to bargain with the union. Well-informed observers believed that Little Steel was somewhat less than trustful of United States Steel and Bethlehem, whom they suspected of not being above making separate agreements as they had before. But the sessions proved fruitless, the President having refused to permit a rise in steel prices and industry refusing to meet the union's demands without such a rise. There followed the visit to President Truman at Key West, and Mr. Wilson's famous resignation.

Philip Murray

On April 3, 129 days after negotiations began, the industry made its first offer to the union: 12½ cents an hour and retroactive pay as allowed by W. S. B., coupled with a wage freeze for fifteen months. Nothing was said of the union shop. It was at this point that the union called its first strike which was quickly brought to an end by the President's seizure of the mills. After the seizure, the companies offered five cents for fringe benefits conditioned on a price rise above the $3 a ton permitted by the Capehart amendment.

In seizing the mills, the President delivered a rebuke unprecedented in history. Earlier Presidents had talked of "malefactors of great wealth" or "economic royalists"; none had ever before directly rapped steel's knuckles. The outcry that followed was terrific. Shouts of "impeach the President" resounded in Congress. Truman was accused, among other things, of having deliberately side-stepped the Taft-Hartley Act. But in his radio address announcing the seizure, the President stressed that there was no way of applying the act without a shutdown of the mills for a week or more—precisely the thing he was trying to avoid.

In the public and legal furore which followed, Secretary of Defense Lovett's compelling statement before the Senate committee concerning the national emergency went almost unnoticed. So did the brilliant analysis of steel profits made by the new Director of Price Stabilization, Ellis G. Arnall, before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Mr. Arnall pointed out that the steel industry could absorb the entire cost of the W. S. B. wage boost and fringe benefits and still earn $1,693 millions this year—a return of 28 per cent on the stockholders' investment compared to the 18½ per cent return of the 1947-1949 period.

The Supreme Court's decision nullifying the President's seizure order finally precipitated the oft-postponed strike. A last-minute attempt by government conciliators to get union and management representatives to settle their differences across the table failed for several reasons, among them industry's refusal to accept the union shop. In this, steel is obdurately refusing to accept a principle which has long been recognized as a matter of course by many industries, including the railroads. The union did promise the government, however, that steel would be kept flowing for arms needed in Korea.

Meanwhile the President, above all anxious to keep the mills working, has been requesting Congress for specific legislation enabling him to seize the industry. His requests have been repeatedly denied. Instead, at this writing, he is under pressure from Congress to invoke the Taft-Hartley act despite Senator Morse's warning that "Americans have been deluded into a conclusion that there is something about Taft-Hartley that would keep steel production going. . . . It just ain't so."

Engineers Turn to Unionism

BY HERBERT M. ORRELL

NO LONGER timorous vis-à-vis management, the engineering profession, long a defender of the status quo, is quietly turning to trade unionism. Of the approximately 400,000 engineers in this country, at least 15,000 are already organized and making their weight felt. Last summer the unionized engineers of a Brooklyn electronics plant struck and picketed for a solid week, winning a strong contract without a scrap of help from the C. I. O. union which was already in the shop. Such old firms in the field as Sperry, R. C. A., Western Electric, and Boeing have been compelled to negotiate with these upstarts from the drafting boards.

The effectiveness of the new unions has been somewhat hampered by their lack of a strong national affiliate. However, preliminary steps in this direction have been made. Twenty-one delegates representing 30,000 engineers met in Chicago some months ago to discuss plans for a national federation. While the question of structural form was left undecided, the delegates did pass two important resolutions. The first barred from membership any except unions certified by the National Labor Relations Board, which meant that company unions were ineligible. The second was to admit so-called "non-professionals" to membership (non-professionals in a professional union are sanctioned by the N. L. R. B. so long as there is a community of interest and the professionals are the dominant element).

The resolutions indicated that the engineers really meant business. It cost many of them a great deal of soul-searching to throw away their traditional caste-consciousness and to give up the nebulous benefits of simon-pure professionalism for bargaining power through strength of numbers. But in the end they saw the distinct advantage of including technicians, such as testers, in their union at a time when most shops employing engineers are busy on defense orders. The government won't accept the delivery of equipment unless it has been thoroughly tested.

Delegates from the various independent unions met a second time over the Memorial Day weekend. This time the national organization found itself a name: The Engineers and Scientists of America. But the group proved itself not yet clear about what it is and what it wants. It was originally contemplated that the national body would consist of a series of "regional" or "sub-national" groupings of local unions. The creation of such regionals, however, contained the threat of jurisdictional clashes with engineering unions which had already formed regions of their own. So the conference threw out the regional plan and then turned around and deprived the national executive of real power by limiting dues to $4 annually per member. As things stand, individual unions can still assist others in various ways, but only at their own expense—no money will be forthcoming from the national treasury.

Despite its weaknesses, the Engineers and Scientists of America represent a significantly new approach to his job by the engineer, who heretofore had restricted his interest to engineering societies concerned with loftier ideas than wage scales and labor-management relations.

What has made the engineers union-conscious all of a sudden? For one thing, whether he designs juke boxes or electronic computers, an engineer is essentially like any other white-collar personnel: he works for somebody else for a salary. But the most important reason is that with the tremendous increase in engineering staffs, which have tripled—quadrupled in some cases—in recent years, the paternalism which once protected engineers has vanished and inequities and labor-management friction have developed.

To this must be added the fact that there is a shortage of engineers, which makes this a particularly favorable moment for the profession to be organized.

The engineer isn't satisfied any longer merely with the accolades of professional status. Today he considers himself a worker and wants the same benefits that other workers have been able to procure through collective bargaining: a salary commensurate with his contribution, better working conditions, and job security.

HERBERT M. ORRELL is a technical writer for the armed services and a member of one of the new engineer unions.

What Liberties and Whose?

HOW TO KEEP OUR LIBERTY. By Raymond Moley. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

MR. MOLEY, who was one of Franklin D. Roosevelt's early brain-trusters but left the New Deal in disgust, now labels himself a conservative and advocates a political-action program to save us from tyranny by the national government. Although as a former professor of political science he attempts a balanced statement rather than a polemic such as might be expected from a right-wing candidate, he occupies much the same position as Taft or even Bricker.

It is interesting to trace Mr. Moley's opinions concerning what liberties and whose are being violated. There is no word in his book about the prevalent assault on free opinion or education which worries most liberals. He does not discern any imminent danger to freedom of the press, though he does defend large newspapers monopolizing local territories as our best possible source of objective information, and issues a vague warning against the Newspaper Guild. Freedom to vote as one pleases and to join non-revolutionary political associations he takes for granted; it is the basis of his action program. Freedom of worship he does not mention.

As a declared follower of Locke and Jefferson he repeats the traditional doctrine of natural rights, but not in order to sound any alarm about civil liberties. Almost everything he has to say concerns one right only—the right of property. This, he argues, is in danger from an entrenched and rapidly expanding "statism."

Locke's doctrine that property originated as a right to the product of one's own labor in an imagined primitive "state of nature" requires some revision in an industrial civilization where division of labor is almost universal and the wage system is prevalent. Jefferson's fear of governmental power assumed the existence of an agrarian society of independent farmers; he feared even more the development of a factory system and the power that might result from concentrated private ownership of capital. What either Locke or Jefferson would have thought of a society like ours is a fertile subject for speculation, but there is in Mr. Moley's book no recognition that the change in economic institutions since their day might have led to a different expression of their philosophy. To him it is enough that many now own houses, land, or corporate securities, and that governmental regulation, production, or taxation trespasses on the presumed natural rights of property.

Since property, its uses and abuses, is a subject that lies largely in the realm of economic discourse, it is a pity that Mr. Moley is not better acquainted with economic theory and history. Apparently Ludwig von Mises, whom he cites, is his favorite economist, while John Maynard Keynes plays the role of the great adversary. Marx of course is out of the running altogether, but the author looks with grave suspicion even on such liberal stalwarts as John Stuart Mill and A. C. Pigou.

Mr. Moley's main fear seems to be that the "free market" will be corrupted or abolished, but nowhere does he specify what a free market is or where it exists. Apparently it involves competition, but competition, though mentioned, is another concept unanalyzed by Mr. Moley. He does distinguish it from monopoly but he regards competition in the United States as safe from monopolistic encroachments because there are still many little businesses, bigness as such is not a danger, and there are anti-trust laws. There is here no mention of administered prices, price leadership, resale price maintenance, oligopoly, or monopolistic competition.

Consistently, Mr. Moley regrets that tariff protection, subsidies, governmental financing, and other privileges were ever offered to business enterprises, but how in the world canals, railroads, and even large-scale machine manufacture could ever have taken root without such encouragement, and where in the world they ever did so, he does not tell us. Nor does he point out the reciprocal relationship between governmentally granted corporate privileges and governmental regulation of corporate practices—a relationship as old in America as corporations themselves.

Few will disagree that government can tax too much and regulate too much, that it can be inefficient or oppressive. Few except doctrinaire state socialists would want government to undertake any function that can be performed as well by private initiative. The difference arises in applying these admirable principles to specific cases.

When Mr. Moley descends from his high principles to practical affairs he admits that much of the intervention of the past was necessary, but he believes that since 1933 we have gone too far and must begin to retrace our course. Some of the problems that concern him are worth anyone's consideration—for example, the need for revamping old-age-retirement provisions and the scarcity of venture capital for small enterprises. But when it comes to major suggestions he wants nothing less than a counter-revolution.

He proposes, for example, that federal income taxation be limited to a low flat rate and taxation by the states perhaps to 25 per cent in the highest brackets, that federal social security be curbed in favor of local and private philanthropy which should offer nothing without a means test, that regulation of financial markets be turned back to voluntary action by the markets themselves, that government develop no more electric power and offer no more inducements to cooperatives, that regulatory agencies be empowered only to forbid, never to compel action. Above all, he wants no effort by the government to maintain high employment and production, no Council of Economic Advisers, no compensatory fiscal policy, no "planning." The government ought, he believes, to balance its budget every year, in depression as well as in prosperity.

If one could believe, as he does, that a large majority in the United States favor such policies and need only the appropriate party organization to enforce their will, the future would look bright for private government by an industrial and financial oligarchy supported by the "middle range" of income-receivers, in whom Mr. Moley places his faith. The picture evoked is remarkably like that of the "New Era" of the 1920's, but more extreme. That Mr. Moley's program could endure a collapse like that which followed the 1920's is no more credible now than it was then.

Yet, after all, Mr. Moley does offer "statists" and "planners" one generous concession. Private and local initiative, he contends, should abolish no existing governmental activity unless it is ready to serve the same needs better. This leaves a wide field for use of his talents, not only in organizing the party he proposes, but in remedying without the aid of government those calamities which mainly have led to the expansion of government—waste of natural resources, slums, disease, inadequate and costly medical services, monopolistic exactions, racial and religious discrimination, speculative booms and crashes, poverty, unemployment, depression, and war. All of us would be glad to pay lower taxes, even to live under a benevolent anarchism, provided it could be demonstrated that a small and weak government is all that is necessary. GEORGE SOULE

An Englishman on Zola

EMILE ZOLA. An Introductory Study of his Novels. By Angus Wilson. William Morrow and Company. $3.

MR. WILSON'S book is the first sizable instalment on the debt of recognition owed by English and American critics to Zola. When the great controversial novels were appearing toward the end of the nineteenth century, English opinion condemned them for two reasons: they violated Victorian standards of taste and morality, and they attempted to effect what seemed to be a false theoretical alliance between art and scientific thought of the day. As a result, they were left untranslated, or were poorly translated, Zola's name was mentioned wrathfully in Parliament, and his English publisher was imprisoned. Even today the popularity of Zola's works in English-speaking countries is mainly due to the fact that they can be sold ■ salacious books, and owes little to any recognition of their artistic stature.

Although he abandons the old national prejudices against Zola, Mr. Wilson writes as an Englishman, mindful of the responsibilities he has accepted in undertaking the first book-length critical work on Zola in English. His criticism is English in character as well as language, and it points out both the foreignness and universality of Zola's work.

Mr. Wilson has no objection, of course, to what used to be called Zola's "shocking" realism, and he makes allowances both for the scientific theories which Zola used to prop up his fiction, and the fanfares of sensationalism with which he advertised himself. His view of the novels, which were planned carefully according to scientific as well as artistic principles, is that of a powerful tide of creative energy, swirling against the prepared dikes of Zola's program and theories, sometimes sweeping them aside, sometimes accepting their guidance. Mr. Wilson shows that Zola's celebrated gift of observation had two aspects: he could observe accurately and exhaustively in a scientific manner, presenting the reader with a photographic reproduction of what he saw, but his special power arose from his ability to use details as eloquent symbols which dramatized his themes. To describe the effect of these impressions which serve as epitomes of the horror and despair of Zola's vision of life, Mr. Wilson borrows from another critic the expressive term "black poetry."

Zola formed his novels by manipulating his profuse material into huge masses like social groups or historical phenomena. Under the stress of his concern for wholes, individual characters are simplified, and their main importance lies in their relation to the crowd of humanity which fills Zola's pages. Mr. Wilson points out that his method of presenting a great social panorama rich in details and given animation by dramatic treatment is essentially pictorial, and may be compared with impressionism. His sensitive comparisons have a way of being especially illuminating. He often succeeds brilliantly in bringing out some point about Zola by referring to Dickens, Dostoyevsky, Hardy, and, in one startling instance, to Wycherley.

It is a pity that in his otherwise valuable study Mr. Wilson undertakes to explain Zola's work as the result of his psychological characteristics. The method, now grown familiar, of regarding books as the projections of neuroses, like ritual behavior or slips of the tongue, is of ambiguous value. Although it may often seem to make a work of art more intelligible, it is actually ■ vulgarization of psychoanalytic practice. It has only a small chance of being right, for only the most general conclusions about the psyche can be drawn from observations of an individual's overt behavior. Mr. Wilson's procedure of furnishing neurosis or fixation to account for every modulation of Zola's art is not really scientific; it is like solving ■ jig-saw puzzle by trimming the pieces to fit each other. Since Freud himself offered these methods (in his essay on Da Vinci and in "Moses and Monotheism") as purely speculative, it is hardly appropriate for critics and biographers who are amateurs in psychology to claim scientific validity for them.

Full of Plums

WINSTON CHURCHILL. An Informal Study of Greatness. By Robert Lewis Taylor. Doubleday and Company. $4.50.

A LOT of people are going to want to write books about Winston Churchill and there are enough plums to make many puddings. Perhaps it is not quite fair to put them all in one book, to make a pudding which is all plums, but that is precisely what Mr. Taylor has done. There are two hilarious anecdotes in the first paragraph and the pace is pretty well kept up during the remaining 433 pages. Doubtless the other books will be written and doubtless there are many more things to be said, but it does not seem likely that the purely entertaining aspects of the subject will ever be better exploited. The author has written "profiles" for the New Yorker and learned much of his method there, but he has also shrewdly planned for the larger scale so that what one half expects to become tiresome after a time remains vastly interesting to the very end.

As one skims lightly through Churchill's tempestuous career what one realizes most acutely is not so much that he is unique as the fact that he represents the perfect flowering of a type seldom so completely—and never so attractively—developed. As a young correspondent he suggests Teddy Roosevelt or even Richard Harding Davis. As novelist and rising politician he suggests Disraeli. And even in his most responsible moments during the war he probably never entirely lost his thespian's sense of playing the leading role in a drama even more theatrically exciting than terrible. Like Dryden's Zimri he was "a daring pilot in extremity" and "pleased when the waves ran high"; never, perhaps, quite sure whether he was born to save England or whether England was put in peril in order to give him his chance.

But there is a vast difference between the adventurer who rises from the ranks and the aristocrat who, from the beginning, takes for granted the advantages, the opportunities, and the special privileges which are his by right of birth. Churchill never for a moment doubted that he was born among the elect and that what he had to do was not so much to make himself a place as simply claim the place to which he was entitled. He would be introduced into politics as inevitably as a well-born young woman would be introduced into society. Moreover, a certain amount of arrogance, impudence, and even of riding roughshod would be taken for granted. His was decidedly not the age of the common man. Nobody wanted him to behave as though he were one and he certainly never did. But one of the things which made him great was the fact that, unlike nine-tenths of the members of his class, he actually did what the theory of the system implied that they all should do—namely, take his duties as seriously as the privileges which went with them. He was physically as well as morally fearless. He would risk his life or his career as recklessly as a man who had nothing but honor to lose and he was often on the side of the underdog, not because he was a democrat but because he actually did believe in noblesse oblige. Churchill, praising the high qualities of the enemy and shouting in a speech, "If I were a Boer, I hope I should be fighting in the field," or Churchill, coming out for the eight-hour day for miners and remarking, "Mr. Chamberlain loves the workingman, he loves to see him work," was, nevertheless, speaking as an aristocrat not as a leveler.

Even Churchill would not have said of the Germans what he said of the Boers and that is one of the many signs that his age has passed. At twenty-six and with astonishing prescience he declared in Parliament that war was entering upon a new stage because its chief cause would no longer be the policy of a minister or the passion of a king. "When mighty populations are impelled against each other a European war can only end in the ruin of the vanquished and exhaustion of the conquerors. Democracy is more vindictive than Cabinets. The wars of peoples will be more terrible than those of kings." And because of what he foresaw it will be a long time or never before government can again be played as a game, gallantry and fair play be regarded as indispensable, or any legislative assembly conducted as though it really were what the House used to be called—the best club in London.

But perhaps it is partly because we know so well that we shall not see his like, not see even his type, again that he seems so attractive and that he is by now one of the great "characters" of all history. It is almost as though the gods had decided to give him everything, even the appropriate physical constitution, because they knew that the species was about to become extinct. As a hunting, dining, dancing youth he "went at his amusements as though he was attacking Tories" and in later life, surrounded by statesmen crippled, dyspeptic, and tormented, he continued to chew cigars and consume whisky with Rabelaisian gusto. In a sense he no doubt represented the bad old days, but they come very easily to seem the good old days instead. Even Franklin Roosevelt was patrician rather than aristocratic and when one compares Churchill with the plebeian world leaders one is tempted to risk the generalization that the megalomaniac who assumes power rather than finds himself born to it is usually more sanctimonious and less attractive. Those born to power and privilege are less likely to feel the need either to punish themselves or to invoke too frequently the sanctity of Right, Justice, God, and the rest.

When, in 1908, Churchill was married in a characteristically resplendent ceremony at an ultra-exclusive church the wedding was attended by one of the largest crowds which ever filled St. Margaret's churchyard. Of the occasion Mr. Taylor remarks: "Then as now the country was about equally divided between those who favored Churchill and those who opposed him, but everybody has always been proud to have him around." The last clause of that sentence pretty well sums the whole thing up.

Books in Brief

THE MAN OUTSIDE, The Prose Works of Wolfgang Borchert. Translated by David Porter. New Directions. $3.50. The imposing title of this volume embraces the collected stories and a brief play by a gifted German boy who died in a Swiss sanitarium in 1947 at the age of twenty-six. Wolfgang Borchert never had the chance to learn anything but fascism, war, and death: he was a private on the eastern front, was sentenced to death for subversion, was released to fight again, was rearrested, and died a few years after Germany's collapse, just as he was beginning to gain literary recognition. As Stephen Spender says in his Introduction, this is "the life of a perfect victim of our times . . . of a man born and bred in a prison cell." The atmosphere of these stories, one of almost unrelieved horror and hideousness, is not unlike that of Ambrose Bierce's Civil War sketches; and like Bierce, Borchert managed to impose upon some of his material ■ troubling and tragic grandeur: such sketches as The Kitchen Clock and The Bread are like sudden beams of light illuminating the hidden recesses of the human soul.

THE PILLAR. By David Walker. Houghton Mifflin. $3. Mr. Walker's new novel is a thoroughly competent and occasionally moving account of five war years in a prisoner-of-war camp, as they were experienced by six Englishmen of widely varying backgrounds and temperaments. Despite a complicated series of flashbacks revealing the life stories of the protagonists, this is somehow a modest and unambitious book; but it does achieve quite satisfactorily what it sets out to do.

AMERICAN VANGUARD 1952. Edited by Don M. Wolfe. Greenberg. $3.50. The editor's nine-page introduction (The Young Writer and the Nature of Man) to this anthology of student work by members of the New School's writing classes is studded with fifty-odd references to great literary figures. The lamentable name-dropping carries over into the biographical notes, wherein we are gravely assured by the authors of the sixty-nine stories, sketches, extracts from novels, and poems, that they have been influenced by Crane, Trollope, Huxley, Greene, etc. Fortunately this deliberately encouraged pomposity does not extend to the writing, which, if it is not "vanguard" work, is for the most part forthright and literate. Sandwiched among the apprentice writers' variations on the staple theme of childhood loss of innocence are a number of pieces that make good reading and are worthy of standing on their own.

Films

MANNY
FARBER

THE fourth instalment of de Rochemont's perusal of New England character, "Walk East on Beacon," plods through a leisurely-paced action story vaguely based on the Judy Coplon and Klaus Fuchs espionage cases. The de Rochemont film is always dedicated to lauding a certain American type which blends the qualities of a model Sunday-school student with the talents of a mad industrialist. The central character is a refugee scientist (Finlay Currie) revolutionizing everything from dinghies to flying missiles with a theory he has worked out on high-speed calculators. Looking like a huge Edam cheese topped by a flowing Jean Harlow hairdo, the scientist fits the de Rochemont formula for heroes in that he is pure and innocent and spends his time lifting the lids from high-powered machines and reading numbers from them with a mysteriously joyous tone. Before the film settles down to a series of chases on land and sea, a Communist-spy ring tries to blackmail the scientist with threats against his son being held in Germany's Soviet zone. The movie is against Communists, but it pays a lot of respect to the shrewd, tortoise-like craftsmanship of the spies. Besides being so dedicated to their jobs that they tap their fingers, or sit down to lunch with a mechanical and somewhat hypnotized air, they are seldom seen doing anything except their daily jobs as taxi-driver, florist, or photo finisher. The idea is that they are too clever to expose their devilish skills. Occasionally the movie stops and hovers happily over a tiny electric fixture for blowing up a safe or a set of skeleton keys to lockers in the air terminal or a wristwatch that rings like the chimes in Moscow, all of which symbolize the hard-plugging talents of the spies. By the time the FBI smashes the gang with a flurry of gadgets and techniques, the movie has been turned into a crushing bore by ■ producer who is so dryly factual and absorbed with mechanical wonders that his movies would ring like an anvil if you bounced them.

Since the first March of Time short de Rochemont produced for Luce, Inc., he has placed a peculiar restraint on the realistic skills of his movie crews. It consists of locking his films halfway between the total naturalism of a newsreel and the well-scrubbed, obviously re-enacted realism of the old March of Time film which was almost methodically stripped of everything but dull facts.

Here, as always, he uses an eye-level camera shot that seldom moves in any direction, so that his true story has to be arranged rather stiffly in hundreds of tiny shots accompanied by masses of explanatory dialogue. For example, ■ Russian agent on his first day in this country is glimpsed on a stroll through a Boston park; the camera catches him briefly in a middle-distance shot but that is all you get because the casual documentary quality would be destroyed if the cameraman followed him around in ■ normal movie fashion. The movie's speed is dissipated everywhere in brief, head-on shots of inconsequential stuff: a blonde courier getting out of a taxi, a suave Russian dummy hurrying to ■ telephone, a fat dowager carrying stolen information on to a Pan-American plane. It takes de Rochemont about thirty leisurely minutes to get to his plot (the blackmailing of the scientist) and by that time the movie has settled down to the crawl of ■ Hawaiian travelogue.

De Rochemont's helpers can set-up a scene that bristles with excitement and shows ■ sharp eye for the personalities of headline figures tried as traitors. The characterizations are never pure mimicry, but it is obvious that Hiss, Coplon, and Elizabeth Bentley are in the film in slightly disguised performances by little known actors. These actors are at the top of their skill when de Rochemont is trying for stark realism (as in the FBI film shots taken of suspects) and at low tide on the sort of inauthentic reenactment he used on March of Time. One of the actresses, Virginia Gilmore, turns up on the FBI screen as an efficient runner for the spies, with a loping stride, a nervous headachey appearance, and ■ dedicated manner in everything from snubbing out cigarettes to kissing. In these newsreel-type shots, she is realistic in the manner of neo-naturalistic Italian actresses, with ■ jerky, erratic vitality that seems to belong in the rough gray atmosphere that is caught on location around Boston. However, when she is not being watched by a hidden FBI camera, Miss Gilmore consciously oversimplifies and overstates the mannerisms of a determined but somewhat unhinged neurotic (in line with de Rochemont's theory that a semi-documentary should be controlled and manipulated by its artists, resulting in a more expensive and studied-seeming film than the pure newsreel). Throughout the film the scenes that have an authentic look and the tangled energy of real life (the scientist's midnight walk to the church on Beacon Street, the Coplon figure snapping at her FBI questioner), are balanced by shots in which the movie crew deliberately plays to the audience in thriller fashion. The combination of styles gives the film its peculiar fugue-type composition as well as ■ certain kind of grotesque and schizophrenic effectiveness.

MOZART'S lovely Symphony K.543 lends itself to the quiet sensitivity and grace of Krips's performance with the London Symphony on a London record—the first good performance of the work on LP to come my way. In addition the violins, which have sounded thin, dry, and lusterless in previous London recordings, this time have sufficient fullness and radiance—the one flaw in the recorded sound being the occasional excessive power of the kettledrums. On the reverse side is ■ similar quietly sensitive performance of the Symphony K.297 ("Paris"), a work which is more effective with the sharper inflection of Beecham's old performance on 78, and with the prescribed Andantino tempo rather than Krip's Allegretto in the beautiful middle movement. The violins don't come through strongly enough in the tutti of the finale; but otherwise the performance is well reproduced.

As it happens, Columbia has issued a new performance of K. 297 by Beecham and his Royal Philharmonic—one which exaggerates the sharpness of the old performance to the point of brutal violence and distortion. To demonstrate the saddening deterioration in Beecham's work one need only play the old performance of the middle movement, with its easy flow and exquisite inflection, and then the ponderous distorting new performance. The recorded sound is brashly brilliant. On the reverse side is a good performance of the first movement of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, reproduced in B flat instead of B minor, and with poor violin sound, and an excessively slow and stodgy performance of the second movement, requiring stepping up of treble.

All three of Debussy's Nocturnes are on ■ London record performed by Ansermet with his Orchestre de la Suisse romande, providing an occasion for me to find again that the infrequently heard "Sirènes" is less interesting than the others. The first part of "Nuages" is played beautifully (some low bass notes are weak or inaudible); the un peu animé section seems to me too loud and impassioned. "Fêtes" is taken at a slow pace in which it is not festive or joyous; the violins sound dry and veiled, and the trumpets leap out at one in measure 23. Ravel's Rhapsodie espagnole is on the reverse side.

Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un faune" is played beautifully by Ansermet with the same orchestra on another London record (the antique cymbals come in ahead of the beats in the last measures); the violins again are dry. Stravinsky's Circus Polka, Ravel's "Alborado del gracioso," and the March from Prokofiev's "The Love for Three Oranges" are also on the record.

Neither Szell's performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony with the Cleveland Orchestra nor his performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony on a Columbia record has the refinements of sonority and execution that are to be heard in Koussevitzky's performance of the one with the Boston Symphony and Toscanini's performance of the other with the N. B. C. Symphony (the LP reproduction of the latter requires considerable stepping up of treble for sufficient brightness).

The Suite from Prokofiev's "Love for Three Oranges"—of which I find only the Scherzo and the music of the Prince and the Princess effective without the stage action—is well performed on a Urania record by Rother with the Radio Berlin Symphony. Well performed also by Steinkopf with the Berlin Philharmonic is Prokofiev's Russian Overture Opus 72, a sprawling, raucous work that I find unattractive.

It is a pleasure, of course, to hear the best of Chopin's Waltzes played as Dinu Lipatti plays them; but what is amazing is to hear the duller pieces in the series come off the Columbia record with engaging melodic and rhythmic life imparted to them by the subtle lyricism and grace of the playing. This makes the series of performances a tour de force of a wholly legitimate kind.

Eight Scarlatti Sonatas—most of them characteristically charming, and one of them, Longo No. 382, very powerful—are played by Kathleen Long on a London record. The playing is merely fluent and deft, without the sharpness and sparkle the brilliant pieces should have and the powerful tensions there should be in No. 382. The recorded sound of the piano—presumably a Hamburg Steinway—is remarkably beautiful.

The fine Mozart Piano Sonata K.570 is played sensitively by Jacqueline Blacard on another London record, together with the less consequential K.281, 283, and 545.

Horowitz's performances of Chopin's Sonata Opus 35 and Ballade Opus 23 on an RCA Victor record are things to skip. The performance of the Nocturne Opus 15 No. 2 is more acceptable; the passage-work of Liszt's "Au Bord d'une source" Horowitz plays exquisitely; the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6 I didn't listen to.

I have no prejudice against transcribing piano pieces for orchestra; but I see no sense in transcribing them for orchestra and piano; and I dislike the showy little concertos that Morton Gould has made for himself of some of Tchaikovsky's set of piano pieces, most of them charming, called "The Months," which includes the familiar Barcarolle "June." The orchestral sound produced by the Columbia record is excessively sharp.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

That Nietzsche Book: Fiction or Nonfiction?

Dear Sirs: In attempting to raise a question concerning the authenticity of Friedrich Nietzsche's "My Sister and I," recently published by me, Alfred Werner alleges that it displays familiarity with the main (post-Nietzschean) theories of Freud. Though there are passages with "Freudian" implications in "My Sister and I" they are no more culpable than similar passages in Goethe's "Dichtung und Wahrheit". . . .

Werner is also suspicious of Nietzsche's prophecy that his concept of the superman would be distorted by the Germans into a tool for the destruction of the Jews. Did not Nietzsche's sister, Elisabeth, constantly supply him with food for this belief, first by marrying the pathological anti-Semite Foerster, and, after her husband's death, by suppressing "Ecce Homo" in which Nietzsche demonstrated that his ideal man might be almost anyone but a Prussian? . . .

The most questionable aspect of the book, says Werner, is the autobiographical material which displays Nietzsche's alleged conquests of Cosima Wagner, a sadistic countess, and some women of lesser repute, when "according to Nietzsche authorities and his contemporaries, the philosopher led a temperate, modest life, except for a tragic experi- ence in his youth." (The italics are mine.) But who are Werner's authorities for this? Nietzsche wrote such notes as "Cosima, I love you," and confided to one of the hospital physicians that "Cosima, my wife, committed me here." Elisabeth reports constant quarrels with her and their mother because of Friedrich's attention to Lou Salome and other women. In that last tragic phase of his life, was there anything for Nietzsche to brood about that was more important to him than that "tragic experience in his youth" that had poisoned his blood?

When Nietzsche reached that terrible house in Jena, whether by force or his own contriving, his life had reached a climax that had to spill over into the notes from which "My Sister and I" are composed. Werner questions Nietzsche's ability to think clearly at that time. Doesn't Werner know that madmen have periods of lucidity as well as periods of confusion? And if he could carry on conversations with visitors, as has been attested over and over again, why couldn't he write?

Werner asked for my help in writing an article about "My Sister and I" for Commentary. . . . In two long interviews Werner raised all the questions contained in his Nation article, and professed himself satisfied with my answers to them. I explained the "Americanisms" by telling him that where there is a choice between the British and the American way of spelling a word I always use the American. He never asked me any questions about Dr. Levy's family, and I certainly never volunteered the information that Dr. Levy was a bachelor and died without progeny. Neither did I ever tell him that the carbon copies from which the book was set were on Dr. Levy's typewriter. . . . I did tell him about the censorial fire in which the original manuscripts were destroyed and of the mutilated verminderen carbon copies from which we reconstructed "My Sister and I."

Werner evidently took it on himself to write to Dr. Levy's surviving relatives, with the result that Maud Levy Rosenthal, his daughter, wrote Werner that she knew nothing about her father having translated "My Sister and I" and written an introduction to it. I was a little surprised at Mrs. Rosenthal's out-of-hand condemnation of the book, but not by her lack of knowledge about it. My agreement with Dr. Levy entailed his not being mentioned in connection with the book during the lifetime of Elisabeth Foerster-Nietzsche, with whom suing people was a zealous preoccupation. . . .

SAMUEL ROTH

CORRECTION

For purposes of condensation, the article Dam the Missouri Floods, which appeared in The Nation of April 26, was partially rewritten by us under circumstances which made it impossible to submit the revised manuscript to the author, Richard G. Baumhoff, for the usual check before press time. Mr. Baumhoff takes exception to certain of the revisions, notably the sentence, "Of committees, councils, and commissions, the Missouri Basin has more than enough; what it needs are more dams, levees, run-off and irrigation systems, and power plants." The author declares that this sentence "seriously misrepresents" his point of view. Mr. Baumhoff also calls attention to the fact that we inadvertently omitted the Federal Power Commission as a member of the Missouri Basin Interagency Committee, and referred to the recent floods as affecting the "lower" instead of the "middle" Missouri valley.

Naturally Mr. Baumhoff cannot be held responsible for these or any other changes in his original manuscript.

Look for Next Week's Issue of The Nation!

How free is free?

● A SPECIAL 64-PAGE NUMBER ●

ON June 28th The Nation will publish the most important special issue it has brought out in recent years. In preparation for nearly a year, this 64-page number will measure and describe the impact of the post-1945 witch hunt on the civil liberties of the American people, with particular emphasis on the occupations and categories that have been under direct attack.

This issue is not concerned with civil liberties in the abstract, but with civil liberties as an aspect of the economic security and well-being of rank-and-file citizens, including 6,000,000 government employees—federal, state, and local; of scientists and research workers; of authors, librarians, and the publishing industry; of the free professions of law, medicine, and the ministry; of the generation of students now in colleges and universities; of teachers and the public-school system; of radio and television and those who work in these industries; of actors, playwrights and the stage; of instructors in colleges and universities, and academic freedom; of the labor movement; of workers in the motion-picture industry and of motion pictures; of resident aliens and members of minority groups; and of other categories and occupations.

We are asking organizations and individuals to help us get this issue into the hands of as many readers as possible. Bulk orders should be placed now in order to insure prompt delivery. Make use of the convenient order form below.

Light on the World-Wide Problem of CIVIL LIBERTIES

THE RISE OF TOTALITARIAN DEMOCRACY

By J. L. Talmon

$4.75

Says Historian A. J. P. Taylor: "Professor Talmon's work seeks to show how totalitarian ideas grew out of Utopianism; how the extreme democrats of the French Revolution turned into the most ruthless dictators. This is a valid theme, admirably worked out. . . . Robespierre started on the road which ended with Stalin."

The author is described by The Times of London as "a Jewish scholar who must be placed in the first flight of modern European historians . . . a breadth and vigor of historical imagination which recalls de Tocqueville."

ATTACK UPON THE AMERICAN SECULAR SCHOOL

By V. T. Thayer

$3.50

American Journal of Sociology: "The secular public school is currently under attack from two groups: those who desire tax support for parochial schools and those who wish some form or degree of religious education to be promoted by the public school. Thayer's handling of a controversial matter is moderate, and his treatment of opponents is fair and dignified."

WALL OF SEPARATION BETWEEN CHURCH AND STATE

By Conrad Moehlman

$3.50

The New Leader: "This volume is a valuable addition to public understanding of the problem. . . . He has marshalled his evidence to leave no doubt of the intent of the American people to want church and state separated completely in a constitutional and legal sense."

STALIN'S SLAVE CAMPS:

An Indictment of Modern Slavery

By Charles A. Orr.

Paper 75¢; cloth $1.75

International Institute of Social History Bulletin: "It is a vigorous indictment of those states that maintain slave camps, such as Spain, and especially Russia and the satellite countries."

AMERICAN FREEDOM AND CATHOLIC

POWER By Paul Blanshard

$3.50

Says John Dewey: "Mr. Blanshard has done a difficult and necessary piece of work with exemplary scholarship, good judgment and tact." 200,000 in print.

COMMUNISM, DEMOCRACY, AND CATH-

OLIC POWER By Paul Blanshard

$3.50

Annals of the American Academy: "The power of scholarly documentation, the restraint in presentation, the logic of analysis goes beyond anything yet written of Communism. . . . This demands the attention and thorough examination of all those who are basically concerned with the future of freedom." 75,000 in print.

THE COUNTERFEIT REVOLUTION

By Sidney Lens

$3.75

Says Mr. Justice Douglas in The Progressive: "The story of Soviet Imperialism is told in as vivid a manner as I have read. The author of this book seeks to discover . . . why Communism—as cruel and oppressive as anything Hitler ever foisted on a nation—has such a hold on people who profess idealistic aims."

ONE GREAT PRISON:

The Story Behind Russia's Unreleased POW's

By Helmut M. Fehling

$2.75

The New York Times Book Review: "During the three decades of its existence, the Soviet regime has developed a cynical system of lying, exploitation, spiritual and physical mistreatment, complete disregard for human life and worth. The system destroys not only bodies but souls as well, and Mr. Fehling, a Catholic journalist by profession, shows it convincingly."

AMERICAN TRADITION IN RELIGION AND

EDUCATION By R. Freeman Butts

$3.50

New York Times Book Review: "A fully documented survey of the relations between church, state, and school from colonial times to the present."

THE UNION LABEL STANDS FOR THE THINGS YOU STAND FOR—

- For 35 years, the Amalgamated has been in the forefront of every battle for a better life for America's working men and women.
- We did our part in the great electoral victories of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, in the passage of the Wage-Hour Law, the Wagner Act, the Social Security Law and many others.
- Today we too are becoming increasingly alarmed at the hysteria that grips so large a part of our population. We will continue to dedicate ourselves to the maintenance of our traditional civil liberties—the cornerstone of our democratic way of life.
- The Amalgamated union label in men's clothes, in every price range, means skilled workmanship, quality production and a guarantee against the return of the sweatshop.

Equal Rights and Constitutional Freedoms for all people was demanded at our Eighth Constitutional Convention which called for:

A PLAN FOR Action

1. The passage of Federal, state and municipal Fair Employment Practices acts.

2. The enactment of a Federal Anti-Lynching Bill.

3. The passage of a Federal Civil Rights Bill to outlaw poll tax and all forms of segregation and discrimination in our national life.

4. Repeal of the Taft-Hartley Law.

5. Repeal of the Smith Act which outlaws America's traditional freedom of thought and expression.

6. Repeal of the McCarran Act under which concentration camps are now being built for political prisoners.

7. Defeat of the McCarran-Walter Omnibus Immigration Bill which imposes extremely rigid retroactive deportation standards on immigrants and aliens and provides to deprive American citizens of citizenship.

8. Defeat the Cox Resolution which would open the way for witch hunts among educational and philanthropic organizations, especially those devoted to improving the status of Negro citizens.

WE ARE TIRED OF PROMISES AND EVASIONS

While the platforms of both major political parties have given lip-service to the need for civil-rights legislation, nothing has been done.

Instead, mob violence, lynchings, witch hunts and intolerance of unpopular opinion have increased, making a bold hypocrisy of our nation's program to spread the graces of democratic freedom to all sections of the world.

The Christmas night assassination of Mr. and Mrs. Harry T. Moore in Mims, Florida; the cold-blooded murder of a manacled Negro prisoner, Samuel Sheppard;

the mob riots in Illinois; the lynchings and persecutions elsewhere in the nation have not brought convictions from the law enforcement agencies of government.

On the contrary, the government is engaged in another direction—further suppressing civil liberties.

New to the American scene is the construction of concentration camps for political prisoners, the hounding of aliens who are being denied the right to seek citizenship, and the closing of our doors to leading scientists, writers and teachers from foreign lands.

Kangaroo courts are set up by special committees of Congress, which seek to smear men and women whose political thoughts do not conform to the standards of Senator McCarran and Senator McCarthy.

This election year the people have an opportunity to speak out in defense of their vanishing civil liberties. We believe in the ultimate good sense of the American people who will serve notice on the major political parties that this is no time for double talk on civil liberties.

From here on out, there can be no retreat.

How Free Is Free?

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

IT ISN'T often that The Nation devotes an entire issue to a single problem. We have done so this time—in a format double the usual size—with an eye both to the overriding importance of the problem and to the critical need for an early solution. For we feel that the drift of the country has been such in the last few years that the question, How Free Is Free? cannot much longer go unanswered lest we lose even the freedom to ask it.

If the reports presented in this special civil-liberties issue have a theme running through them, it is fear. Like the nerve-tickling theme in "The Third Man," fear sets the tone that permeates all the events and conditions described in these pages. The other day Mrs. Roosevelt displayed her unerring sense of the dominant mood of a large part of post-war America—and her healthy response to it—when she said: "I am tired of being afraid." Fear is as uncomfortable to live with as an active infection, and a moment will come—soon, I believe, if general war does not come sooner—when this country, like any other strong organism, must throw it out of its system.

This is not to say that no dangers exist; that fear is wholly irrational. The earth was never a more insecure dwelling place than today, and the fear that rules our lives springs in large part from a feeling of helplessness in the presence of possibilities which seem too awful for ordinary men to grapple with. But the only answer to this can be found in a still greater effort to cling to reason, instead of forsaking reason for panic and the imbecile acts that panic breeds. As Bertrand Russell acidly remarked in his "New Hopes for a Changing World," "A captain who finds his ship in danger of sinking is expected to avoid hysteria, but an American statesman in the same situation is thought to be a fellow-traveler if he remains calm." The dangers that face us collectively are no greater and essentially no different from those facing a soldier in battle; yet a soldier is expected to fight even if his survival seems problematical. It should be equally expected that we meet our collective dangers at least as well: at its worst, the collective fate could be no more final than his.

But if fear is the motif, it is not the source of the trouble. The source is, plainly enough, the world revolution of which fear and the repressions it has generated are mere aspects.

To try to pin the trouble on Stalin is a temptation. For the expanding power of Russia, whether it is a major, imminent military threat or not, menaces a wide range of established values and interests, some inde-

The Path of Fear

The hour is very late, but not so late that we must ask the question whether we would be the weaker if we were to maintain the right of men to differ and to make their differences known without fear. We would be far more likely to have an informed and participating people believing in themselves and in their way of life, drawing into the government the very best, and committed to ends which have always inspired men to fight to the limit of their abilities. Why have we valued our Bill of Rights if it has not been because, as Mr. Justice Brandeis said, we know "that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; and that hate menaces stable government"; because we believe that the loyalty that gives strength is built on passionate belief in goals worth fighting for.—Laurence Sears, The American Scholar, Spring, 1951.

Men live by their routines; when these are called into question, they lose all power of normal judgment. . . . Discussion becomes a challenge; new ideas seem to be a threat. Men are gripped by fear, and fear, by its nature, is the enemy of thought. So that when men are too fearful to understand, they move to suppress, because they dare not stay to examine. . . . Invited to experiment, they act like children who are terrified of the dark. . . . They will listen to nothing save the echo of their own voices; all else becomes dangerous thoughts.—Harold Laski.

fensible and others worth cherishing to the last. But blaming Stalin is really too easy an out. For it excuses policies and behavior which bear no true relationship to the danger and provides an escape from the necessity of facing the broader meaning of the world revolution as a whole.

Bolshevism, in fact, for all its momentous and still spreading consequences, was the by-product of a world war which was itself only an incident of that revolution. It was not even a decisive by-product. Though it spawned smaller rebellions, from Belfast to Budapest, the revolutionary process was checked, not by its own success or by the growth of those new freedoms that Woodrow Wilson had promised the world, but by the decision of the victorious powers in 1919 to defend the Old Order—even in those countries whose aggression had precipitated the war—against the emerging forces of popular revolt. The purpose of the victors was to remake the Western world as nearly as possible in its pre-war political image. To accomplish this they not only did their futile best to smash the October revolution, but also vetoed those social and economic changes that might have saved the post-war world from the despair that bred counter-revolution. In Europe the old gang took over, heavily backed by American money. And in Washington Mitchell Palmer took over, and "normalcy"—which were America's version of counter-revolution.

When fascism began to creep across the Continent, the people in charge generally regarded it as a bulwark of the Old Order rather than the further crumbling of that order in a revolution of the right. Or, if they knew what it represented, they accepted it as a preferred form of social upheaval. Even its worst excesses, in Germany and in Spain, even the clear approach of World War II, were looked upon as less dangerous than the risk of a shift toward the left in the balance of political power. ("Better Abetz than Blum.")

Hitler smashed the dream of security through reaction. His war was another incident in the world revolution; this time not even the heads of states could ignore its political meaning. And for a short while, out of the fighting alliance between Russia and the West, out of the passion of the Resistance and the defeat of military fascism, hope of a different sort of "post-war" ruled our thinking. That hope created the United Nations, where it lingers like a hungry ghost. It might still be restored to life if the great Western powers, but especially the United States, were willing, this time, to recognize and accept the nature of the problem they face. But they dispersed and abandoned the magnificent forces of resistance, out of fear of communism; and abolished UNRRA, essentially for the same reason; and today treat with suspicion and distaste the demands of the "backward" peoples for peace and independence and a chance for a decent life. They are following this path toward new disaster because they still prefer any risk to the risk involved in a shift of power—even accomplished peaceably.

That the actual spread of Russian dominance in Eastern Europe and Asia encouraged and partly justified this preference is unarguable. But non-Communists who criticize American-Western policy do so because it is, in its deepest sense, an abdication to Moscow, a refusal to accept the imperatives of the world situation and direct national policy, not toward a new attempt to freeze the Old Order, which is now so obviously in dissolution, but toward applying democratic principles to the process of social and political change. The United States, leading the Western world, has abandoned the revolution to Moscow; and while the Russians are exploiting this opportunity with a brutal energy which may defeat the very purposes they proclaim, at least they have the initiative, while we carry the thankless, hopeless job of sweeping back the great tide of change.

In fact, what has happened is that the United States, together with its allies in so far as they can be held in line, is engaged in heading up the new counter-revolution; and revolution, right or left, has its own logic and its own consequences. It requires conformity—as Russia demonstrates—and rejects freedom of thought and speech and action because, obviously, these are the antitheses of conformity. It exaggerates the danger of its enemies, or invents enemies. It cannot tolerate critical, halfway adherents since they may undermine more effectively than outright opponents the dogma on which it relies.

On the other hand it accepts, if sometimes with reluctance, those fanatic supporters—the McCarthys—who may discredit it by their behavior but who must not be offended lest they turn nasty. Those who direct the operation use fear as a weapon, and soon fear becomes a force itself, dominating both the leader and the led, the informer and his victim, the cautious liberal and the cause he quietly abandons. Soon it comes to seem reckless not only to criticize the government's foreign policy but to speak in favor of socialism in Saskatchewan or French reforms in Tunisia—or academic freedom at home. Everything tends to be drawn into a single framework of what constitutes conformity—and the name of this sort of conformity is fascism.

AS THIS discussion has tried to show, the American witch hunt is tied, too closely for comfort, to the course of economic and political developments throughout the world. It would be naive to expect that as long as the cold war grinds on there will be an end to repression, official or otherwise, in America. But even the dialectics of world revolution permit periods of lessened tension and shifts of direction. The process going on today is infinitely complex; trends are mixed, in this country as elsewhere. The course of events itself can change in response to popular or official pressures; new political

Wind and Whirlwind

The unprecedented outburst of terror and terrorism which at the moment is venting itself upon Socialists, Communists, "Reds," and agitators of all sorts in this country grows in volume and intensity from day to day. . . . Every radical thinker or reformer in the United States today who belongs to any organization which the Department of Justice has put under the ban, or who expresses sympathy with the men and women who have been pounced upon, puts his personal liberty in danger if his sympathies be known. . . .

What must happen if this sort of thing goes on, every sober-minded citizen knows. . . . The belief, startlingly confirmed only the other day by no less respectable a body than the Carnegie Foundation, that there is in this country one law for the rich and powerful and another for the poor and weak, will be strengthened; as will the conviction that free speech, free debate, and free publication of opinion, whether for the citizen or the alien, are rights to be enjoyed by such only as say what the Department of Justice and powerful business interests approve. . . . We shall not safeguard liberty by repressing it; we shall not raise American prestige abroad by sending overseas the disillusioned and the unassimilated. The only way to end dangerous discontent in the United States is to remove its causes. Unless that is done, those who today are sowing the wind will before long reap the whirlwind.

—The Nation, January 17, 1920.

leaders will emerge and new governments be elected, and policies which themselves were responsible for encouraging the witch hunt may in turn be damaged by its impact—this is demonstrably the case with some of the foreign policies of the Truman Administration.

There is also the natural impulse of opposition which is set in motion by the piling up of cruel and unjust measures; if the rise of a new fascism generates fear, it also creates the will to resist. At some stage, also, infringements of people's rights become so obviously out of line with the supposed dangers they are intended to guard against that even the most docile citizen grows uneasy and ashamed and a natural reaction sets in. When the smear reaches enough well-known persons of high repute—Jessup, Acheson, even Eisenhower—doubt is cast on the whole enterprise; and when the point is reached at which other prominent individuals muster enough courage and concern to fight back, one can assume that abatement is under way.

It would be premature to announce that this has yet begun, though some hopeful omens can be spotted here and there. Among the most important have been the recent statements before Congressional committees of Owen Lattimore, Sidney Buchman, and Lillian Hellman. The successful faculty rebellion against the loyalty oath at the University of California; the formation of groups at the community level, as in Englewood, Scarsdale, and Berkeley, by citizens determined to fight for their rights; and the campaign to unseat Senator McCarthy, rapidly taking shape at this moment—all these can be set off against ugly signs of revived grass-roots vigilantism, such as the "Sixth Column" committees and various veteran and bundist groups—the boys who picket and burn cars and serve as self-appointed informers.

The elections offer a chance to focus and organize the scattered movements of resistance. From the conventions on through the campaign, people alerted to the need of action can force the civil-liberties issue to the front, demanding that candidates from the Presidential nominees down take a clear stand for the restoration of democratic safeguards and procedures. This special issue of The Nation is designed for one primary purpose: to provide an arsenal of facts and ideas for all Americans who are ready to take up this fight. The contributors have been chosen by and large from those occupational groups which have suffered most heavily from repressive measures, statutory and otherwise: science and education, the civil service, the publishing industry, the varied world of entertainment, the legal profession, and the broad field of organized labor. So in essence this issue is a compilation of the reports of specialists. We hope that their findings will be put to good use between now and November, to the end that the question, How Free Is Free? may be resolved in accordance with the traditions of liberal America.

Spies into Heroes

WHAT is constitutional may still be unwise. The reluctance of the Supreme Court to let the Bill of Rights block various activities meant to protect the nation from foreign attack and revolution merely puts constitutional objections out of the way. Other very serious objections to what is actually done under the law still remain and urgently require consideration.

The time has come for the American people to look at what is happening to us because of the numerous and novel types of suppression that are now in operation. Legal issues can desirably be laid aside while we engage in the much more familiar activity of watching men and women. What is being done to human beings in the name of national safety? What kind of human beings are doing it? Do they behave in ways we like or are they departing from American habits of kindness, fairness, and common sense? All this is the sort of thing we need to look at.

While trying to do some such observing, I find that a good many aspects of what is going on now disturb a man who loves the kind of country in which he grew up and fears that it may disappear unless present trends are checked. This is the place to speak of one matter which calls for a good deal of watching and thinking on the part of the regular run of American citizen.

I am disturbed by the growing inclination to turn spies into heroes. One of the earliest lessons learned by children is that tale-bearing is a dirty business. No doubt there are several long-recognized crimes harmful to the community, like counterfeiting, where conviction would often be hard to obtain without stool-pigeons and spies. Here the need for the betrayer's evidence is great enough to outweigh the evils of spies. But when one is considering a novel crime, it is a question whether the game is worth the candle. The use by employers of spies in labor unions shows what can happen. And when it comes to political crimes, historians of the Popish Plot and sedition laws in England during the French Revolution have demonstrated that spies were a black blot on such affairs. Spies sometimes become agents provocateurs who incite the very crimes they are hired to report. Hence it is disquieting to read the evidence against the eleven Communists in New York two years ago by at least three spies, working under the direction of the FBI, who joined the Communist Party and served on its recruiting committees. Thus these government employees were actively inducing American citizens to become members of a conspiracy against the United States. A still more pervasive evil of spies is the breakdown of confidence in social and family life. Intercourse is poisoned if one never knows whether his fellow guest at dinner is going to report his casual statements to the secret police. One would suppose we had heard enough of what went on in Germany under the Nazis or what goes on in Russia today to abjure this kind of thing.

The worst spy of all is the renegade. He has already double-crossed the community by engaging in wrongdoing and then double-crossed his associates by deserting them and helping to punish them. After such an experience, truth-telling does not come naturally. The renegade has to make a good story in order to obtain immunity for his own admitted misconduct. Hence there is a great temptation to exaggerate or falsify the behavior of his former associates. And since it is often his word against theirs, he has magnificent opportunities for gratifying personal spites.

The latest phase in the current glorification of the political spy is to compare him with Major André or Nathan Hale. There are sharp differences between the military spy and the political spy. In the first place, a man employed by an army to report on troop movements, fortifications, etc., is going to give facts. What he says can be verified. If he misleads those who employ him, his falsehood will soon be detected and he will pay a fearful penalty. The political spy, on the other hand, reports conversations and midnight contacts in dark alleys. There is usually no way to check up on him, and his opportunities for falsification are almost unlimited. Another difference is that the military spy does not have the temptation to lie. He is not accusing persons, but telling about things. The political spy can send human beings to prison or deprive them of a job, and so he may have strong motives to distort his story for personal reasons or to shield himself. The military spy has no chance to poison human relationships.

This is not to say that spies as witnesses against men accused of political crimes will tell nothing in court except lies. Undoubtedly, some of them will try to tell the truth during their whole testimony while others will mix a good deal of truth with falsehoods. But there is a much greater risk of false testimony from spies than from ordinary men. Every witness, no matter how honest, naturally wants to make a good case for his own side. But this desire is affected by several factors. Truthfulness is a requisite of most normal occupations from bookkeeping to the practice of medicine. An ingrained habit of telling the truth is carried on to the witness stand. And the ordinary witness knows that his lack of veracity may be detected when he testifies, as he usually does, about matters which are capable of proof or on which he can be contradicted by disinterested eyewitnesses.

But when spies appear in court, such checks operate in a much weaker way. The very nature of a spy's work requires lying. He has to deceive his associates into thinking him one of themselves. The longer he spies, the greater the tendency for the boundary between truth and falsehood to be blurred. One can never be sure that Dr. Jekyll has not changed into Mr. Hyde. Readers of Conrad's "Secret Agent" and "Under Western Eyes" will have no doubt of this. And the subject matter of a spy's testimony in political cases may not be susceptible of neutral verification. The only other possible eyewitnesses of the transactions he narrates are usually the suspected person he is helping to punish and other members of the alleged conspiracy. It is impossible to let in the light of day upon these dusky happenings.

The trouble is not that you can be sure a spy is lying. The trouble is you cannot be sure he is telling the truth. The risk of false testimony is tremendously increased. Therefore, the fact that it is hard to obtain convictions for political crimes without the use of spies is not an argument for using spies. It is an argument against having political crimes.

The Battle of the Books

BY MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

HERE we are in the early years of the American Century, called to lead the world, as we are assured, and this not only by the persuasive force of napalm bombs or A-bombs but by the power of ideas and the example of our moral beauty as a nation. However, many West Europeans, who are our allies in the cold war against communism, have begun to express doubt that we have the wisdom and self-command to lead the whole world. The metropolitan press of Western Europe has been reporting items touching on our bizarre folkways, under the heading Americana and presented in the style of Mencken's chronicles of the American "booboisie." Our political trials, our inquisitions of Hollywood movie actors, our American Legionnaires attacking schools and libraries, our mass hysteria over internal Communist enemies—all this is duly noted by our European friends and set beside our pretensions to be the saviors of Western civilization. I say nothing of what our ideological opponents in the East, whom we are so eager to liberate, may make of lessons in democracy such as the following (reported by the United Press on February 12, 1952):

Sapulpa, Okla., Feb. 11 (UP)—Charles Hartman, vice-president of the Sapulpa Board of Education, said today that some books in the Sapulpa School Library had been burned by the school after being criticized by a women's civic group for the way they dealt with socialism and sex.

He stated that only "five or six" books had been destroyed and they were "volumes of no consequence." He added that he believed one was a history judged to be too approving of socialism and the others fiction which dealt too frankly with sex.

"They just weren't good reading for teen-age children," Mr. Hartman declared.

That "it" has happened here, in an Oklahoma town of 13,000 inhabitants, and in several other small towns as well, should not surprise us. For years we have been told that we are in a state of crisis, though we are not officially at war. Some of our most prominent "Americanist" shepherds, in Congress and in the press, have been rousing up their flocks. A strange "battle of the books" has been going on for about five years, since the early stages of our political conflict with Russia. Of late it has reached an intensity that has frightened reasonable Americans who were disposed not to take alarm unduly at the occasional excesses of our small-town vigilantes.

SOBER reports of the American Library Association Bulletin indicate that there have been "hundreds" of incidents throughout the United States in which self-constituted guardians of the public safety have taken action to remove, censor, suppress, or destroy teaching material or books deemed by them "subversive" or "un-American." The curious thing is that these groups are made up of people who have never been interested in literature, or pedagogy, or scholarship, or science. Yet they come armed with fixed notions of loyalty or "Americanism" to which all other groups in the community, our learned professions and institutions, our publishers and writers, are asked to conform. Thanks to their petitions, new investigative committees are being set up in Congress, one of them vested by the recently enacted Gathings resolution with extremely broad and vague powers to make inquiry into radio and television productions, comic strips, pocket books, and other media of public communication, for "immoral" content or expressions "otherwise offensive."

"The book trade today is up against a new development, the threat of censorship on political grounds," according to a statement made by Donald Klopfer for the Book Publishers' Council a year ago. False information about books now widely circulated, he added, might lead to political censorship on the ground of national security.

A nation-wide study of the censorship movement made by Benjamin Fine, the education editor of the New York Times, was a front-page story in that newspaper on May 25, 1952. The country's leading educators, Fine wrote, are filled with anxiety at the widespread and concerted character of the attacks directed in recent months at schoolbooks and other reading material. "Self-appointed committees" are being organized in many different areas to "screen" books used by colleges and lower schools and free libraries, in order to halt the circulation of books by authors suspected of "subversive" ideas. Books long in use, it was reported, are suddenly being denounced by groups "not accountable to any legal body." Librarians are being intimidated. "A book-burning such as took place in Sapulpa, Oklahoma, does not often occur, but the end result is just as serious when books . . . are removed from school or library shelves."

Throughout the country organized groups are assuming the initiative and leading the local patriots into action against the alleged purveyors of "dangerous thoughts." The names of their organizations may be new or old, they may be Catholic or Protestant or Jewish, but their procedure is the same. The affair may begin, as at Worcester or Grand Rapids, by the publication of an anonymous letter in the local paper assailing the high-school superintendent or town librarian for harboring "subversive" books. The object is to ban not only works that seem to advocate social change but in many cases writings that are simply critical of our business morals, like James Rorty's "Our Master's Voice: Advertising," or Laura Z. Hobson's "Gentleman's Agreement," a novel about anti-Semitism. Or even, as in Peoria, Illinois, works which urge support of the United Nations.

At Bartlesville, Oklahoma, a group known as Pro-America levels its guns on the town librarian for keeping copies of The Nation and the New Republic on file. The librarian is promptly fired by the mayor, and so are the library trustees, for having tried to defend her. In Cleveland, the Mothers of World War II, assembled in convention, vote to investigate libraries, bookstores, schools, and newspapers in order to "purge them of all subversive material." In Peoria, as in many other towns, the local American Legion post goes into action to the same end. In suburban Scarsdale, New York, there is only a Committee of Ten that fights to stop the town from reading Mr. Louis Untermeyer's anthologies of modern American and British poetry. In Burbank, California, the library trustees themselves vote to label all books by placing stickers in the volumes of authors who belong to organizations on the Attorney General's subversive list or "similar lists."

Amid the excitement of the "battle of books" that gripped Burbank last autumn one notes that a team of public-relations men from nearby Los Angeles quietly offered to "check" on the authors of all books in the Burbank public library for the modest fee of $200. Their earnest intention was to extend this pioneering business to all the cities of California, while promoting the sales of Alert, a newsletter resembling Counter-attack, and offering "facts to combat communism" to a select list for $25 a year. These investigative and censorial procedures were eventually blocked in Burbank as in other California towns by the responsible municipi-pal authorities, thanks to the vigorous action of California members of the American Library Association.

Nevertheless, a new Citizens' Committee appeared in Los Angeles last May and was reported as calling for seventy-five volunteers to examine books used in the Los Angeles County high schools. Alas, only twelve citizens answered the call, and these were described by the newspapers as "elderly persons," all but three of them old ladies. They were much photographed by the press as they donned their spectacles and made ready to peruse some 600,000 volumes, including the spacious works of Hegel, Marx, Nietzsche, John Dewey, and Bertrand Russell. No reflection is intended against the old-age group in our population. On the contrary it is not our youth but the older folks, with their remembrance of times of full intellectual freedom, who have been putting up the stoutest resistance to the groups of frightened patriots and the professional bigots or "full-time complainers" who lead them. Meanwhile the climate of opinion, as reflected in these reports from the field, has thrown our authors and book publishers, as well as our theater and film producers, into a deep funk.

HOW does the hysteria in 1919, after World War I, compare with that of today? I remember how the returned war veterans, the fervent patriots, and the eager vigilantes joined in a hunt for "criminal syndicalists" who were credited with having perpetrated a series of bomb explosions. The FBI carried out a dragnet operation among masses of foreign-born residents. Two Italian anarchists, Sacco and Vanzetti, were picked up. Then as appetite for such business mounted, headquarters of many labor unions, both A. F. of L. and I. W. W.—for there were no Communists to speak of then—were raided by "volunteers" and not a few lynching parties took place in the provinces. Socialist leaders and pacifists were thrown into jail. Yet all this furor Americanus seems ill organized, spontaneous, and full of hearty animal spirits compared with the present movement. The people who were saving the republic then were not interested in ideas, books, or even journals of opinion.

Today's breed of super-patriots is a good deal better organized, less given to physical violence, and pretends to be literate. These people do not beat up women marching in labor-union parades, as in 1919. Instead, they go trooping into little Carnegie libraries or bookshops or high schools to spy out "Red-slanted books" and administer the anti-Communist "treatment." They know Karl Marx well and the "infiltration" methods of his votaries. Even our red-blooded American Legion has become ideological in its way. Why You Buy Books That Sell Communism is the title of a leading article by Irene Corbally Kuhn in the American Legion Maga-

I can think of only one way in which the Kremlin may still conquer us, and that without war. It is by so frightening us (but it is we who allow ourselves to be frightened) that for fear of the enemy within we transform our own society imperceptibly into an apparatus of totalitarianism indistinguishable from the society of Soviet Russia—a system which may not be criticized, whether the British parliamentary system or the American way of life, for fear of damaging national unity, the unity of the grave; a system in which the bully and the corrupt may not be denounced or the underdog uplifted because nobody will dare risk being called a Red.—Edward Crankshaw, "Cracks in the Kremlin Wall" (The Viking Press).

zine for January, 1951. Here sensational charges were made that "Commie-minded" bookshop clerks, editors, and newspaper book-reviewers "manipulate the book business to promote works written by their soul-mates and kill off opposition books." The author, as if citing a typical incident, pictured a patriotic book-buyer inquiring in vain for some anti-Communist work which is always reported to be out of stock. But when, cunningly, he used the trick of calling for a volume by Owen Lattimore, the salesclerk "fell over herself in her eagerness to haul out a fresh copy." Thus a stereotype of "Red-slanted bookstores" at every street corner was offered to the 3,000,000 readers of the American Legion Magazine and was reproduced in syndicated newspaper columns. Our leading newspapers, such as the New York Times and Herald Tribune, were accused in this article of employing chiefly "fellow-travelers" to write book reviews for their Sunday supplements and steer the innocent customers toward the party line. The most respectable newspapers, book publishers, and textbook houses were attacked in the same article for promoting or circulating books that favored "collectivism," while discouraging the literary productions of writers who had given their hearts to private enterprise. After Miss Kuhn's article had been hawked around the country, hundreds of persons, in a well-organized demonstration, telephoned or wrote letters to complain of the alleged "subversive" doctrines promulgated by those prudent, loyal, profit-seeking men who run the Times and the Macmillan Company.

The textbook trade is a large and lucrative business compared with that of publishers dealing in novels and general books. The principal textbook publishers have long cooperated closely with local politicians who in their different states run education commissions or school boards; indeed, no section of the publishing field is more practical than this. Textbook authors, in order to survive, have become the timidiest of all writers, diluting their product so that the most bigoted reader need find nothing to offend him. New editions of well-known textbooks have been constantly revised in the direction of extreme political neutrality and dulness. One can scarcely imagine any American boy or girl being impressed or persuaded by anything found in such texts. Yet as has been observed by Father James Keller of The Christophers, who has written pamphlets of vocational guidance urging young people to follow callings in which they might fight against "godless" doctrines, the school, and particularly the library, must be regarded as the "arsenal of ideas" to be kept under the control of right-thinking persons.

Another who has worked hard to alter our cultural climate is Lucille Cardin Crain, editor of the Educational Reviewer, a quarterly journal which urges the suppression of schoolbooks guilty of advocating change, or even simply of recording such change as has taken place in the past (under the New Deal). Miss Crain has been called an educational bigot by school authorities, and the new body that liberally finances her activities, the Conference of Small Business Organizations, has been styled by the House of Representatives' select committee on lobbying as a "pressure group" given to devious methods in order to secure—paradoxically enough—"big-business support" for its projects. In this same orbit we find also the familiar, undemocratic figures of Merwin K. Hart, of the National Economic Council, Allen Zoll, now running something called the National Council for American Education, and Zoll's old friend, Upton Close. It is they who suddenly profess acute alarm over a textbook like the late Frank Magruder's "American Government," used for a generation by millions of high-school students.

THE agitation at the school and library level has surely helped to depress the whole field of education and letters in America. Gradually the pattern underlying these seemingly spontaneous or sporadic incidents is becoming distinct. At least ten Front Organizations are trying to direct the course of our school system and our universities toward their own standards of "loyalty." This statement is based on surveys made by the National Education Association and by a special committee of the American Library Association. The attention of these Front Organizations is being extended more and more to the field of textbooks and literature, as well as of education. They claim that they seek only to defend the republic, but several of them distribute propaganda attacking the United Nations and movements for world peace and the reduction of armament.

A recent survey of these "professional bigots" prepared by the Anti-Defamation League—"The Trouble-Makers," by Israel Epstein and Arnold Forster, published last month by Doubleday—shows that they "work together through the exchange of 'sucker' lists and, by exploiting common propaganda, have established a nation-wide network." Their financial contributors, it is reported, are usually wealthy, middle-aged women of the type who regularly supported Zoll's so-called patriotic projects during the 1930's. "The outstanding common denominator of these professional propagandists is that they make money from their efforts." Seven such organizations reported that their combined income recently exceeded $1,000,000 annually.

WHY is there such intense activity in peddling the propaganda of prejudice, fear and hate? Nothing comparable was experienced during World War II when the country was in actual danger from the Nazis and the Japanese. During the period of our police action for the U. N. in Korea, federal and state loyalty boards, Congressional committees aiming at thought-control, and our big Drummer Boy Joe in the Senate have created a veritable panic over the alleged internal danger offered by a few Communists—a panic that has particularly affected our less sophisticated citizenry. (It is possible that the augmented power of suggestion or hypnosis now exercised by radio and television has not been fully estimated.) High-level officers of the Chamber of Commerce, the N. A. M., and the American Legion regularly deny that they favor movements for the censorship of opinion or the restriction of our civil liberties. Nevertheless, the editors of the American Legion Magazine, with a circulation of nearly 3,000,000, proceed much as they please.

Since 1946 the United States Chamber of Commerce, from Washington, has issued a series of widely distributed pamphlets on the subject of Communist Infiltration, one such pamphlet, entitled A Program for Community Anti-Communist Action, published in 1948 and reprinted since, has reached a circulation of 683,000. Its prescriptions, as careful students of the so-called "Americanist" movement have noticed, have been followed faithfully in widely separated communities throughout the country. Here are a few:

1. Subscribe to a good newsletter or magazine specializing in Communist exposure.
2. Read one or more books on communism each month.
3. See that books and periodicals exposing communism are in school and public libraries.
4. Ask newspapers, magazines, and radio stations to carry useful material on communism. Praise them when they do so.
5. Be sure that your local bookstore features good books exposing communism.

The public is further exhorted to support "patriotic ex-Communists who cooperate with the FBI"; to protest against public officials who display "softness" toward radicals and demand of them "a more patriotic attitude." The new patriots are warned to be on guard chiefly against liberals, who speak too much for civil liberties.

The enemies of free opinion, it would appear, proceed to the attack in four columns. One besieges the schools and their textbooks; a second assails the consumers of reading matter in libraries and bookstores; a third denounces authors by means of anonymous letters and "smear" articles in publications that welcome such material; a fourth has begun a drive against the publishers. There is a "fifth column" too, as we shall see.

THE "smearing" of book publishers began in earnest with the January, 1951, issue of the American Legion Magazine. Angus Cameron, for many years vice-president and editor-in-chief of Little, Brown of Boston, was singled out for "treatment" because he had continued to publish Howard Fast and had taken an active part in the Progressive Party's Presidential campaign for Henry Wallace in 1948. Last year there were rumors that the book-publishing trade, like motion pictures and radio, would be investigated by the Un-American Activities Committee. Then, on August 31, 1951, Counterattack devoted an entire issue to Little, Brown and Angus Cameron—who, according to Time, has sometimes been called "the foremost United States book editor." It was charged that thirty-one authors on the Little, Brown list were either avowed or secret Communists. As "evidence" of guilt the fact was cited that some of their books, like James Aldridge's "The Diplomat," had won favorable notices from a Communist Party official in the Daily Worker. A number of the authors and books mentioned as "objectionable" had only the slightest connection with Little, Brown; some were not even handled by it.

The directors of Little, Brown seem to have been thrown into confusion by the attentions of Counterattack. After two weeks the firm replied by issuing a printed statement that refuted many of the allegations made against it. Moreover, the great preponderance of its publications, it was explained, were those of popular-fiction writers like J. P. Marquand and Mazo de la Roche, the works held "objectionable" by Counterattack being estimated at only 4 per cent of its book volume. At the same time, though Little, Brown's management said nothing, it became known that Cameron had resigned, upon request, of course.

Other publishers were greatly incensed at Little, Brown's dropping of Cameron the moment the firm came under attack. Shortly after this incident, which received a good deal of attention in the press, a meeting of representatives of thirteen New York publishers was called by Douglas Black, head of Doubleday and president of the American Book Publishers' Council. Black's aim was to persuade the other publishers to close their ranks and reach agreement on the position they would take in case of further attacks by professional propagandists or by Congress. Instead of panicking like the film producers and the radio broadcasting companies, the publishers had hitherto maintained a dignified reserve during the furor over "subversive" literature. The tradition of a free book press was strong in most of the publishers. A member of the group was assigned to compose a "Book Publishers' Bill of Rights," to be displayed in all bookshops. A similar directive, based on the civil-rights clauses in the Constitution, had been issued several years before by the American Library Association to its thousands of members and displayed by them on their bulletin boards throughout the country, with good effect on the bigots. Here it was affirmed, as the policy of the A. L. A., that "in no case should any books be excluded because of the race or nationality, or the political or religious views, of the writer"; nor should sound reading matter be "proscribed or removed from library shelves because of partisan or doctrinal disapproval"; or through the coercive action of "volunteer arbiters of morals or political opinion."

The publishers were also going to stand together for the "free access to ideas and full freedom of expression that are the tradition and heritage of Americans." For the group of publishers a subcommittee on censorship, headed by Donald Klopfer, began to gather data on false propaganda about the book trade and on current attempts to suppress or "label" books.

SINCE the autumn of 1951, however, a succession of unpleasant episodes have markedly lowered the morale of the publishers and disposed them to bow to what they call the "climate of opinion." The organized "smearing" of Max Lowenthal, author of a book on the FBI, and of his publisher, William Sloane Associates, as "pro-Communist," in newspaper columns and over the air, is one of the worst of these incidents. The attempt—eventually frustrated—to remove the books of Mark Van Doren from the library of a New Jersey state junior college was another such affair. This was provoked by a man who had never read them and was unaware that they were entirely unpolitical. The slandering of many of our leading writers in Congress by Representative George Dondero, of Michigan, also makes it possible for false, inaccurate, or exaggerated statements to be quoted from the public records with immunity.

Publishers, who are for the most part small business men, have no more courage than others to face constant slander or misrepresentation. Thus the "Book Publishers' Bill of Rights" has been put away in a drawer. No powerful effort at publicity—which the publishers know a good deal about—has been made to counteract the "Americanist" propaganda. With a few noteworthy exceptions the publishers have adopted a policy of silence, to avert further attacks which may result in their being cut down one by one, as the more far-sighted have warned.

"We are doing things we never dreamed of five years ago, or that we thought could happen only in Mussolini's Italy," a publisher said to me recently. One well-known firm, after contracting to publish a manuscript by a "controversial personality" and announcing it in its spring, 1952, catalog, turned chicken-hearted and wriggled out of its agreement because it suddenly realized that the distribution of such a book would invite attacks. Most publishers are turning to innocuous, non-committal, or "right-thinking" books which, they hope, will entertain the public and offend no one. Editors do not admit that they reject manuscripts because they might be branded "un-American" or stir up controversy, but only that such books might not sell or "would not appeal to women readers."

OUR book press is one of the last outposts of free inquiry and opinion. Newspapers, radio-television, and slick-paper magazines are all affected by the advertisers and it is becoming increasingly difficult for intelligent readers to find disinterested information in the press or on the air. Our very business interests would seem to require the publication of books on foreign affairs that do not mislead us about what a fine job Chiang Kai-shek or Syngman Rhee is doing. The suppression or silencing of men like Edgar Snow and Owen Lattimore, for example, who know a great deal about the Far East, leaves us in danger of flying blind. Less and less of a hearing is given to our "loyal opposition." Should a change in foreign policy become necessary, we may find that we lack the knowledge needed to prepare us for it.

In Nazi Germany a people who were among the best read in the world were reduced to reading only what Goebbels believed was good for them. Will American publishers and their authors also wait patiently until everyone is "coordinated," that is, made to think the same thoughts and read the same few books? What, then, will become, even materially, of our once flourishing book-publishing enterprises? For our poor bigots are merely literate—"mechanized peasants," in a sense—reading few books and buying fewer. The solid core of our reading public, a tiny proportion of the population compared with Denmark or England, is composed of liberals. The success of Paul Blanshard's "American Freedom and Catholic Power" (190,000 copies sold) despite its rejection by a score of publishers, and that of Thomas Sugrue's "A Catholic Speaks His Mind," strongly support such a view.

During a recent stay in Italy I heard Alberto Moravia make some illuminating observations about the state of literature under the Fascist regime. He was then a fledgling writer, but one of his first books was suppressed by order of Mussolini. The Italian authors, Moravia said, were all trying to write "little still lifes" which would avoid offending the regime: trivia about domestic life and love or tales of the past that shunned social questions. Literature, and publishing as well, stagnated until the Allies arrived in 1943-44.

WE MUST conclude that our writers, and their official organization, the Authors League of America, have been as meek and inoffensive during this crisis, of censorship as their publishers, who, after all, are men of trade. One would have thought that some of our writers who had attained great fame and age might have considered themselves, like Zola, "expendable" in the true interests of civilization. Yet I can think of few who have lifted their voices effectively against the self-appointed thought police. Up to date the Authors League, as the official writers' organization, has not made an issue of freedom of thought versus censorship, or strongly pleaded its own cause before the public.

Whatever resistance there has been has developed among the 400,000 school principals and teachers of the N. E. A. and, particularly, the members of the American Library Association. Much credit is due to the national directors of both organizations, who have steadfastly applied their influence wherever danger has threatened. For the A. L. A. courageous leadership has been furnished by David K. Berninghausen, librarian of Cooper Union, who up to 1951 was secretary of the A. L. A.'s Committee for Cultural Freedom. By his reports in the A. L. A. Bulletin on the professional bigots, by his patience and vigilance in rallying A. L. A. members and their friends to defensive action at the various focal points of trouble, Dr. Berninghausen (together with his A. L. A. associates) has demonstrated that our modern Know-Nothings can be held in check—as has happened lately in California, New York, New-Jersey, Ohio, and elsewhere.

A questionnaire issued in 1951 by the A. L. A. to librarians in twenty-four states asked for their opinion of proposals to label books on political grounds and segregate some of them in "subversive" rooms or reserved bookshelves. But were these not precisely the methods of Stalin, several librarians asked? The answers were more than five to one against such action.

One wrote: "I'm an adult. Sound mind. Good education. Who the hell has the right to tell me what to read or warn me what not to read?"

And another commented: "How soon after we start labeling books will we begin to burn them?"

They have begun.

Behind the Asbestos Curtain

BY GILBERT W. GABRIEL

NEVER meddle with actors." So pleaded one Cervantes Saavedra, four hundred years ago. As a hack playwright who had had a pretty bastard by a loving player, he might have been accused of special pleading and some slight bias. But, no, he was out to state a rule for the general public, and to stand up proudly for the stage. "Actors are a privileged class . . . merry people," he said, "who give pleasure, and whom everyone favors and protects."

Up to now, the American theater has enjoyed just this sort of fond, fairly easy existence. Its practitioners have been less troubled by sponsors' prejudices and mob pressures than those in practically any other branch of the entertainment world. Its produce has been listened to with that smiling leniency—and that half an ear, often—which mark it as bright but readily forgivable stuff from the mouths of babes. We've had no royal prohibition snapping back at an impertinent Beaumarchais. Our stage folk, in or out of grease paint, have never been much else than Cervantes' merry people, unminded and—unless they took to killing Lincolns—habitually exempt.

That's how it was. Of such old flats and cut-outs was the scenery of this fools' paradise assembled until today. Until today, too, it still looked good and handsome from out front, still giving off the grateful shine of that privilege to say, sing, dance, act, produce whatsoever piece, hire whatsoever talent, the theater itself desired. All over the country, from Broadway to the remotest summer barn, our living theater was going to go on proving itself one of the least troubled refuges of our right to the free expression of fun, stir, sympathy, ideas, the truth.

It looked good, yes, and sounded all the better in contrast to those strange new codes in the rest of the cousinly trades around. The movies might have to beat their celluloid breasts and mumble a billion-dollar mea culpa, but nobody could involve the theater in such nonsense. Video might vie with the universities at extracting loyalty oaths and firing employees in crocodilic sorrow, but the theater was honestly too busy to be bothered. Ex-editors could give their all—and their ex-comrades' all, of course—in suddenly glorious, solidly profitable serials which the book clubs would canonize, but the stage would never be stampeded by their breed. Disgruntled academic painters could cue an obliging Congressman to explode into official ranting against all modern painting trends as traitorous, subversive, Communist per se, and a phalanx of one society of sculptors accuse the Metropolitan Museum of deliberately harboring maleficent left-wing bronzes, but the theater was too wide, too wise, ever to let itself be dragged into such an antic zone of dervish exhibitionism. Well, so we thought, and so were reassured.

GRANTED, we had been getting some gossip-column warnings to the contrary. We were already hearing it on the wind, how the "Red Channels" outfit, having paled the complexions of Hollywood and Radio City, would proceed to catch and skin all the tawnier showcats of the Times Square district. We were encountering certain theatrical celebrities loath to tell, but who nevertheless told with bated breath, about other theatrical celebrities being summoned mysteriously to appear in Washington. We'd had rumors, first or second hand, of acrimonious politico-patriotic powwows inside the sundry professional guilds, equities, and unions. These were bad things to hear. They made us want to believe in the theater all the more.

Our faith wasn't shaken even when, last winter, the ladies' advisory council of a benevolent producing organization—we shan't identify it further for it has a large heart and an ability to bring whole series of plays, well done and at nearly nominal prices, to several scattered neighborhoods of New York—resolved that hereafter no works shall be allowed upon its list which are composed by known or suspected—mind you, suspected—Communists. The ladies backed up their resolution with three examples of the playwrights they were banishing. One of this poor trio has been turning out a frantic yearful of articles, plus an entirely denunciatory full-length novel, to prove how much he hates Communists. One is deservedly famous for beautiful but weepy studies of female psychopaths and probably never had a political notion of palest hue. The third has since repented publicly a short party membership, and so will undoubtedly be readily returnable to the collective bosom of these ladies.

Let's stop grinning about this: the theater is still a happy-go-lucky institution, happier of purpose and luckier in its several latitudes of make-believe than most, but if we don't watch out it will not be so for long. Let's be blunt: the threat to freedom in the theater is only just beginning, but it has begun. It has already reached that borderland of the ridiculous where, during a recent tryout of the revival of a play as sentimental and gaily old-Czarist as "Tovarich" in the national capital, Legionnaires felt it an affront to our native land's honor and flung up a picket line.

GILBERT W. GABRIEL, drama critic for Cue magazine, is president of the New York Drama Critics Circle. Formerly drama critic for the New York Sun, New York American, and New York Telegram, he served for several past years as chairman of the Anti-Censorship Committee of the Authors League of America.

This picketing of plays is fairly new. So far it is also fairly intermittent and none too effective. When the Theater Guild produced John Wexley's annal of the Scottsboro Case, "They Shall Not Die," back in 1933-34, nobody organized any militant cordons to save innocent audiences from its heat. But when the same piece was revived a couple of years ago by a smaller producing unit which—sin of sins—wanted to remind its listeners that some parallel doubts were permissible in modern Trenton, it had a rough sidewalk treatment throughout its engagement. To its credit, it continued to run. Only small companies can.

FOR around the theater picketing is a peculiarly dire threat. A book will often outlast its noisiest critic. A magazine has subsequent issues in which to justify itself anew. An offending radio program is not necessarily a lasting loss. But plays are much bigger risks, much more perishable, grimly mortal. It costs major efforts and round fortunes to bring productions to Broadway nowadays. Failing, they seldom win second trials anywhere, even amateurs mistrusting them, and must be whiskbroomed off with a sickening finality and speed. Axiomatic, but there's the theater's weak point—its total dependence on a usually passive, easy-come, easier-going audience. Regrettable, but there's the reason for the theater's increasing jitters—that ghostliest chance of any play's surviving the two or three successive empty houses which low-jinks measures like picketing and boycotting can all too immediately bring about.

There were a couple of plays last season which had to recognize this bull by the shadow of its horns. Long before their first nights, shenanigans commenced. Their bewildered New York producers were being pestered by New Jersey phone-calls, anonymous advices to quit, abandon work and all contracts, finances, and hopes forthwith. Some of their actors were thumbed from the rehearsal wings to hear similar abuse. The author of one of those plays—his was merely an adaptation of a classic—had a dream of doing something defensive in advance. He spoke of declarations all prepared and paid for to the billboard firms and newspapers. He conceived a battle plan of counter-picket lines drawn up in reserve and of a protest meeting which might beat any hoodlums to the punch. His dream, speech, plan got nowhere. Fellow playwrights of more experience and weightier reputation quickly turned them down. They smacked of press-agentry, some murmured; worse still, others implied, of totalitarian domineering. In our democratic play-world, it was pointed out, the picketing of productions is all right, whereas counter-picketing reeks of the Left. That menace, in short, remains. Play picketing is in. Some of us fear it may be in for bigger use and sheer abuse next season.

THE American theater has been passing, not without growing pains, through twenty years of propaganda plays. This period seems to have begun with a near-masterpiece of romantic invective, John Howard Lawson's "Processional." It included things as exciting as the journalistic "One Third of a Nation," several of the Group Theater's better choices, and, at this end of the trend, Arthur Miller's magnificently protestant tragedies. Seven times out of ten, the rest were pretty poor plays, although that ratio can also be applied to other brands of plays with equal justice. The propaganda sort gradually built up a public, a minority public but an intense one, given to such fierce hurraing for any of its first nights, good, bad, or plain dull, as almost to suggest an opera claque or the gallery at that historic Victor Hugo opening. But, anyway, this period is already on the wane. Thanks to frightened managements and reluctant audiences-at-large, it looks pitifully close to being past, leaving behind it little except a compunction to scent ulterior purpose and tainted politics in every light-headed young farce we go to see.

Sorry, we are not exaggerating. Not when an anemic but well-meant piece like "The Legend of Sarah," which is much ado about the double-bedded memoirs of a brave mistress of the Revolution—ours, ours in 1776, please!—and is just corn-fed fun throughout, gets the pummeling it lately got in Pasadena. Not when Garson Kanin's hilarious hit "Born Yesterday," which deals with a junkman's graft on a world-war scale, gets the shilly-shallying treatment it got in some typical hinterland repertory. Not when our own Manhattan drama departments' mailbags are suddenly brimming with wild remonstrances against the revival of "The Male Animal," the Messrs. Thurber and Nugent's strictly hundred-percent American salute to an ordinary college professor's rudimentary courage. Not when Ibsen is gravely indicted in one daily reviewer's court of higher learning as a dangerous source of Red influence.

That did befall. A new version of Ibsen's "An Enemy of the People" was produced the winter before last. It was a version much needed. It had a burly force to it, a colloquial tang, which made it a change from—if not a complete improvement on—the scholarly gentility of previous translations, and so it was much welcomed. Favorable notices prevailed. Within a week, however, the tabloid editorials were scenting something wickedly subversive in such an association of brazen ideas with such bold talents—both the adaptor and the stars having lately had some Counterattack trouble—and a critic who had written one of those favorable notices was backtracking and admonishing all his readers not to be caught in another Commie trap. That chap Ibsen had gone bad.

Don't hold it against us drama critics as a whole. Most of us do fight on the sane side. Our circle has, at the very least, a liberal circumference, and we've done out decentest to deplore this rabid mess. We should naturally prefer to sit down to live plays than to dead ducks, no matter by whom or what about, but our plurality has social as well as aesthetic consciences, and the stage we still want is a free-speaking, adult-thinking stage. Richard Watts of the Post will not hesitate, therefore, to chide his favorite aisle-seat neighbor when he finds him ivory-towering at the above-mentioned "The Male Animal." Brooks Atkinson of the Times, in his sage Sunday corner, points out the clear and present validity of that same play by citing last autumn's actual gag-rule on the Ohio State campus. He likewise gives "Born Yesterday" a clean bill of realism by recalling how, only this spring, two junkmen were put up for influence-peddling in Washington. "Life catches up with the theater now and then," he concludes, displaying a characteristic affection for life on both banks of the footlights. But how long—here's the glum question—can a thin file of rueful critics stave off a rush of fools?

ITS PROVED popularity remains a play's best self-defense. In New York, where "Death of a Salesman" originated and ran for a gratifyingly long time, there may have been some moron-fringe mutterings against its emotional impact and message, but nobody dared any open interference. It was too well liked, well respected, for that. Red Channels & Co. would have to wait until it took to the road before advocating that.

The road of the middle-sized cities is a comparative cinch for idiocies and alarums. The Midwest road is known among amusement folk as the Ambush League. Peoria, Illinois, is part and paragon thereof. Peoria was having itself a rousing Anti-Subversive Week, where the principal speaker before its heterogeny of veterans' associations, business-men's lunch clubs, and fraternal orders was an on-the-spot representative of "Red Channels." That gent was no mean opportunist. Spotting a placard which announced that "Death of a Salesman" was soon to arrive, he proceeded to demonstrate his inside dope. The author, the producer, the principal actor of this troupe, he proclaimed, all belonged to Red-front organizations and had been contributing stated portions of their earnings from the play to the Cause. Patently, anybody who'd buy a ticket to that play would be helping to support the Communists. Obviously, boycott it, everybody; and so, then and there, vote to boycott it everybody did. The Peoria papers made front-page features of the yarn, the gent's accusations—without troubling to investigate them—the glowing speech, the sweeping vote, the editorial amens, all. It was one of the most sterling smears in years of semi-yokel print. Four days later, of course, those papers had the horse sense to publish—as their attorneys may have advised them, even if without the grace of a single regret—the explicit denials which the author, the producer, the principal actor, had wired back. But what about the boycott, who'd stop that? What about that poor, lost-in-the-shuffle issue of a mighty good play it would have done the people of Peoria much good to see? The Authors League sent an optimistic but apparently unpersuasive telegram to the mayor of the city, detailing how many prizes the work had won and urging him to keep his citizens from being altogether silly. A national picture magazine talked of sending out a photographer, in case they still were. But there's only this left to add: a week or so afterward, that road company of "Death of a Salesman" called quits, closed down, was done. Now the play belongs to the movies.

THIS brings us, by uneasy stages, to this very drama's director, and to some other prominent and successful commanders of the play parade in our area and our time, and to what has been lately done to them, and what they have lately done in turn to their theater and ours. We are arrived at personalities.

That rumor of certain theatrical celebrities being called down to testify in Washington came true with the appearance there of Elia Kazan. An eminent director now for both stage and screen, he had once been a member actor—an excellent one—of the Group Theater. He testified that he had concurrently been a member of the Communist Party. His repentance of that error was resonant, and not only orally so. He also made simultaneous recantation in an advertisement in the press, going the whole hog of his erstwhile peccancy and his present patriotism with a fervor which would win him rounds of paragraphers' applause. Kazan supplied the committee with several names. He supplied some which had been only tentatively mentioned hitherto, and some which had not been even that. His intentions specifically to the contrary, he nevertheless came pretty close to giving the impression that a connection with the late Group Theater had been next door to inevitable partnership in a Communist cultural plot. Talk—as we have—to assorted ex-Groupers and they'll tell you, as affrighted as indignant, that that impression is unfair, false. Talk to those of them who, by today's process of associational tarring, have been finding it almost impossible to get jobs in pictures, radio, or television, and you'll understand why they are now resigning themselves to similar block exclusion from the stage. It may all be supposed to save our country, but it's sure hell on the theater.

Kazan named his old friend and Group comrade, Clifford Odets. Since Odets is one of our foremost playwrights, this gave us a proper jolt. It may even have jolted Odets. He took his turn down in Washington. He seems, according to the news accounts, to have spoken somewhat more heartily than Kazan had. He got off some good, strong truisms in explanation of why he had joined the Communist Party in his "ten-cents-a-day" days, and why he had quit it within nine months. "It wasn't for me." They'd misused his talents, misappropriated his signature, and he was a liberal and still is. His liberality now allowed him to do as others did, to give other party members' or ex-members' names. One was a new name, that of an actor last seen on Broadway in—don't let this depress you—an Odets play. Another actor was J. Edward Bromberg, who had recruited him into communism, so he told. A year ago, appearing before this same House committee, Bromberg had refused to name anybody. Half a year ago, suddenly deceased, Bromberg was being memorialized by Odets as having suffered an unnatural death, a death "by political misadventure" . . . and, "Goodnight, sweet friend." Odets now took pains to corroborate that John Garfield had never been recruited into the party, but it probably occurred to nobody to solicit his goodnight to that sweet friend, too. He made it anyway. "Julie, dear friend," Odets wrote in the New York Times (May 25th), "I will always love you."

One more distinguished dramatist, Lillian Hellman, has—at this moment of writing—appeared before the inquiry in Washington. She did so with exceptional dignity. She was fully willing to talk about herself. She refused to tattle about anybody else. Her Congressional rewards may be meager, and that's predicting it mildly. But she alone, of this fresh batch of theatrical witnesses, has done the theater no disservice and lost none of its respect.

We whose knowledge of the law comes mostly from old Al Woods courtroom melodramas can deliver no expert opinion on whether it's so unalterably necessary for such witnesses to spill their giant-killing beans about their fellow pygmies. We who've been so busy going to plays that we've never had much time or temper to go to party meetings of any tinge at all, are still left wondering what ill wind eddying through Shubert Alley could ever persuade one melancholy bit-player to take an active interest in politics in the first place, to hanker for the cold comfort of a Communist cell in the second, third, and *n*th. We who never were, are not now, nor ever will be, and all those solemn so-forths of the most exhaustive loyalty tests, still contend that even the ex-Communists are none of our business. No, and none of our pleasure, either. But the theater is: the theater which, we were praying, would retain its four-hundred-year-old right to favor and non-meddling; the theater of the one-time merry people where, it now stands to unreason, the slaughter of the semi-innocents may next be going on.

"Actors are afraid to act, writers are afraid to write, and producers are afraid to produce anything amateur sleuths could possibly attack." This gospel afterthought was uttered by whom but Elia Kazan himself, supplementing his Washington testimony with an address at Harvard. He should know. He should have showman's instinct enough to be afraid of this, besides: that that large, passive, habitually so patient public has its own rights to stay away in disgusted droves, saying, "a plague on all your playhouses."

Hollywood Meets Frankenstein

BY "X"

Hollywood, California

ON OCTOBER 24, 1947, three of Hollywood's top directors sent a telegram to scores of key figures in the film industry. The wire read:

THIS INDUSTRY IS NOW DIVIDED AGAINST ITSELF. UNITY MUST BE RECAPTURED, OR ALL OF US WILL SUFFER FOR YEARS TO COME. YOUR AID IS REQUIRED IN THIS CRITICAL MOMENT. THIS IS MORE IMPORTANT THAN ANY PICTURE YOU EVER MADE. SIGNED, JOHN HUSTON, WILLIAM WYLER, BILLY WILDER

The pseudonym X is used for a group of top-flight writers who have important positions in major Hollywood studios.

"This critical moment" was an investigation of Hollywood by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, and the issue of "The Ten," then still this side of prison.

In those first days of the committee's onslaught, a broad group of film people stood up and fought back. More than fifty stars appeared on two nation-wide broadcasts. Others made a junket to Washington to watch the shabby circus in action. Several top studio executives, among them Dore Schary and L. B. Mayer, said brave words. Both insisted that what mattered in the case of talent was performance, not politics.

But in the hierarchy of the film corporations, men like Schary and Mayer are less than kings. The overlords of the industry are the New York executives who control financing, distribution, and the theater chains. The motion-picture business is primarily a real-estate operation, and the real estate is in the hands of men like Loew's Nick Schenck, Paramount's Barney Balaban, and Fox's Spyros Skouras. It was these big boys who, at the close of the committee hearings, whistled the studio heads to a meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria. The high-priced hired help were given a brisk caning and a lecture on the facts of life. They emerged from the meeting to issue a statement announcing the firing of "The Ten." A portion of that document is worth quoting, for it has become a Pike's Peak of irony:

In pursuing this policy, we are not going to be swayed by any hysteria or intimidation from any source. We are frank to recognize that such a policy involves dangers and risks. There is a danger of hurting innocent people, there is the risk of creating an atmosphere of fear. Creative work at its best cannot be carried on in an atmosphere of fear. We will guard against this danger, this risk, this fear.

Actually, with the firing of "The Ten," Hollywood created for itself a monster that was to grow as gruesome as any that ever frightened the wits out of children at a horror matinee. Since that day, the film industry has been in panicky retreat before every attack on civil liberties. It is now a hapless pushover for any witch-hunting outfit that seeks to collect blood or blackmail.

THE spectacle of a giant monopoly gibbering with fright may seem curious until one recalls a bit of Hollywood history. The film executives (not unlike those in other industries) have always had an abiding faith in "the fix." They would rather buy off a racketeering union boss than sit down with an honest labor leader. It was this policy that led to the B-picture episode, a few years back, when the studio heads left a satchel of greenbacks in a hotel room to buy off Willie Bioff. It was this faith in the fix that (when a cog slipped somewhere) led to the landing of 20th Century's Joe Schenck in the federal pokey for income-tax evasion.

Hollywood is a company town, and beneath the fancy publicity it is not so different from a coal town in Kentucky or a cotton town in Alabama. When a strike broke out in 1946, the studios smashed it by using tear gas, fire hoses, and gun-toting deputies.

A few final details to fill in the background. Nineteen fifty-one was a rocky year for motion pictures. The Supreme Court had handed down an anti-trust decision ordering the divorcement of theater chains from production facilities. The public, hit by high prices, began to cut down on money spent for entertainment. Television antennae darkened the sky. In Los Angeles, movie attendance dropped 30 per cent. Hundreds of neighborhood theaters shut their doors. 20th Century's Skouras asked his 130 highest-priced personnel to take salary cuts, some up to 50 per cent. Warner Brothers (showing a comfortable profit for the fiscal year) fired five department heads, one of them with twenty-three years' service.

The film industry, following a national pattern, was searching for a way to slash employee's paychecks and intimidate their unions. Many movie executives looked upon the investigations of Hollywood as a faintly noxious blessing. True, they created nasty publicity. But they also made workers fearful and reluctant to press wage demands. They also kept the unions from becoming militant. Hadn't the conviction of "The Ten" knocked off half a dozen leaders of the Screen Writers Guild?

Meanwhile, the witch hunters were busy. After "The Ten" came the hearings of last year, which used Larry Parks for a burnt offering. Then the Hollywood subcommittee session at which Sidney Buchman turned out to be the main event. Each of these investigations was regarded by the employer element as the big crisis which, once past, would get everybody off the hook and permit a return from panic to Hollywood's normal condition of twittering nervousness. A spokesman for the Un-American Activities Committee actually told an interviewer on TV that last year's hearing would definitely wind up the investigations of "Red influence" in films.

Early in 1952 there seemed to be some easing of the pressure against studio personnel. Studio heads were no longer (or less often) making rousing speeches against The Menace. (One top executive, at a compulsory meeting of the entire staff, from producers and stars to grips and messenger boys, demanded that every one of the workers become an informer and report immediately anything of a suspicious character in the words or actions of fellow employees.) But this sort of thing decreased and a numbed weariness settled over Hollywood. The monster had been fed, it seemed, and for a while would be content to digest its victims.

THIS prediction turned out to be wishful thinking. A new quarry was marked for the hunt—liberals and "fellow travelers." This meant attacks on more than isolated writers, directors, actors, and a few producers. It meant the impugning of certain top executives themselves, no matter how fervid their protestations of anti-communism, no matter how many anti-Communist pictures they had produced.

Dore Schary (in charge at Metro, the biggest studio of them all) became a prime target. So did Paramount's chief of production, Don Hartman. So did Stanley Kramer. The Wage Earners Committee, a local nuisance group, picketed theaters throughout the Los Angeles area and paid its respects to Schary and Kramer with placards, on one of which their names dripped blood.

Neither Schary nor Kramer took it lying down. Both filed suits for more than a million dollars against the Wage Earners, and these actions are now pending in the courts. Schary took a big ad in the movie trade papers and the Los Angeles dailies, defining his suit as "a challenge to all those who recklessly and viciously peddle the tawdry wares of defamation and personal slander." Even the right-wing Producers Association came out in behalf of the libel suits.

The picketing did not stop. But for a moment, there seemed to be a stiffening of resistance. The worm turned, ever so slightly. People who had long ago resigned themselves to a relentless and inevitable McCarthyism crawled up from their cyclone cellars. There even seemed to be a ray of sunlight. When the Republican faction on the Un-American Activities Committee released a report denouncing Hollywood for having failed to purge itself of Communist influence, elements of the Producers Association blasted the report. So vigorous was this reaction that the Democratic members of the committee later dissented from the Republican stand.

Had Hollywood had enough? Had the loss of talent and revenue and the acres of damaging publicity finally exasperated the studios? Had they glimpsed, in the light of events, the shadowy reflection of a lost principle, the principle of civil liberties? It almost seemed as though the saturation point had been reached when, as in the Salem witch hunts, the fanatics started to go after the higher echelons.

PERHAPS by coincidence, perhaps by design, but at this moment—at a time when Schary and Kramer found themselves on the barricades lately manned by people who are now for the most part jobless—Howard Hughes joined battle with the Screen Writers Guild over the issue of monies and credit due screen-writer Paul Jarrico. The latter, a Fifth Amendment casualty, demanded both credit on a finished picture and $5,000. Hughes galloped into the fray, Sir Galahad in tennis sneakers, doing the noble thing to defend free America. That is, it began to be noble after $3,500, for which sum Hughes was originally willing to settle with Jarrico. The Guild, whose contract with the entire industry stipulates that it alone shall arbitrate credits, tried to force Hughes to honor a contract which he publicly and blandly renounced. So far, two courts have upheld Hughes, or at least relieved him of the obligation to fulfill his contract with the Guild.

And since we've come to the courts: recently a jury in federal court awarded Adrian Scott (one of "The Ten") $80,000 due him under an unfinished contract with RKO. Judge Ben Harrison, acting on the appeal of the studio, reversed the decision on the ground that the jury didn't know everything it should have known about the case. In announcing his decision, Judge Harrison also made a pejorative statement concerning what he thinks of a man who refuses to answer a question at a Congressional hearing. At the same time, it is only fair to say that in the case of another member of "The Ten" the judge allowed a verdict for a smaller amount to stand.

The Hughes controversy broke at just about the time that Elia Kazan (with a juicy new contract pending) confessed all to the Un-American Activities Committee and published an advertisement in which he urged "liberals" to "speak out" and inform on associates. The blasts from Hughes and Kazan sent a good many liberals scuttling back to their cyclone cellars to sit it out in what they hoped would be silence.

Then came a development that reached down into the cyclone cellars.

THE American Legion for some time has had a proscribed list which feeds the hungry maw of the American Legion Magazine whenever that publication feels the need for more red meat in its diet. About three months ago, the Legion's Americanism experts found a brilliant new way of harassing the studios and getting them to lop off reddish pinks and pinkish whites. The method: picketing.

One or two pictures were picketed in one or two cities, and immediately Representatives of the Industry (run when you hear that phrase) rushed to the Legion experts with a view to arranging some kind of truce. The idea was to arrive at a formula whereby the studios would get a guarantee that pictures would not be picketed. What was dreamed up was a clearance mechanism that may well become Exhibit A in the evidence of this era's corruption of the American tradition. The mechanism works something like this:

Actor or writer finds himself on the list. He is called in by the chief in charge of such matters at the studio which employs him and is given a dossier of "charges" against him. These range from parlor gossip to hearsay quotes from the Tenney Committee reports, to scuttlebutt from the pages of "Red Channels," to data from state and county volunteer committees. Mention in the Daily Worker, other than outright attack, is considered a charge.

Out of the "appeasement" meeting between the Legion and industry representatives came a preliminary list of some 300 names, furnished by letter to each studio. The letter stated that if the studio employed any of the listees, picketing on a national scale would ensue when the picture involving the person's services was released.

To meet this, the studio now calls the listee, presents him with the charges, and asks him to write a letter "to the head of the studio" answering, by what is known as an Affidavit of Explanation, the following questions:

1. Is this so?
2. The reasons for joining organizations cited in the charges.
3. The people who invited you to join.
4. Did you invite others to join?
5. Did you resign? When?

The letter or affidavit (copies of which go to various agencies and organizations, and to certain individuals, including, so it is said, George Sokolsky, Howard Rushmore, and Freddy Woltman) is then submitted to a vague "central committee" for "clearance."

What makes this of particular interest, even among the exhibits of atrocities against civil liberties that are so plentiful these days, is the unblushingly investigative character of the questions, as revealed in the third and fourth items. This goes beyond the Un-American Activities Committee in asking liberals or "sympathizers" to name other liberals or "sympathizers."

In addition to Hollywood's troubles with the Legion, the Un-American Activities Committee has announced a new round of hearings for this coming autumn. Its process-servers are as busy as ever. Throughout the spring, deputy marshals sought out Los Angeles physicians, lawyers, radio, and television artists. Film folk were not ignored. One of the latest to be subpoenaed is a screen writer who received his summons on the floor of a Screen Writers Guild meeting—a meeting presumably open only to members in good standing. Considering the fact that the writer's address and phone number appear in the local directory and that no attempt was made to serve him at home, so far as he knows, the choice of time and place was clearly a calculated intimidation. Fear, suspicion, and wild rumor can be kept at fever pitch without the necessity of formal hearings. All the committee needs is an unlimited supply of pink subpoena forms.

As matters stand today, Hollywood is using half a dozen blacklists, as well as supplementary graylists based upon the vaguest sort of innuendo. The assumption that a person is guilty until proved innocent has become standard operating procedure. A weedy growth of professional witch-hunting outfits has sprung up. Fingermen are doing a brisk business, hourly supplying additional names. In an effort to protect themselves from the cruder forms of blackmail, the studios are hiring their own investigators. Quite likely the talent scouts who once signed up young starlets are now combing the country for promising ex-FBI men.

All this has its effect on the kind of films that are being made. A fair cross-section of the pictures now in production includes the following: "Time Bomb," "Tribute to a Bad Man," "Apache Trail," "Flat Top," "Road to Bali," "Pleasure Island," "Something for the Birds," "Springfield Rifle," and "Bela Lugosi Meets the Gorilla Man"—plus two others whose titles seem uncomfortably autobiographical: "Panic Stricken" and "Tonight We Sing."

It is the opinion of the seasoned if not shell-shocked observers out here that if the industry goes all the way with appeasement of the Legion or any other pressure group on the setting of standards for employability, it will finally deliver itself to the Sokolskys, the McCarthys, and the Wage Earners Committee. After that there can only be darkness and television.

Trouble on Madison Avenue, N. Y.

BY MERLE MILLER

A FEW months before John Garfield's death his agent, Bobby Sanford of the Music Corporation of America, received a telephone call from the producer of one of the better dramatic shows on television.

"Who," the producer asked Sanford, "have you got like John Garfield?"

Sanford, a small, aggressive man with a disconcerting habit of speaking his mind, reported later: "I say, 'What do you mean who've I got like Garfield? I've got the boy himself. Why don't you use him?' And this producer says, 'We just can't do it. I'm sorry but we just can't, and you know why we can't.' I tell him, 'You're damn right

I know why.' But I wanted him to say it. Not that they ever will."

The next week Dane Clark played the part which might have been Garfield's. Clark is not listed in "Red Channels," a 213-page publication issued on June 22, 1950, by three war-time appointees of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Garfield is.

Shortly after Canada Lee's recent death Walter White, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, wrote in the Philadelphia Bulletin, "A whispering campaign was circulated among broadcasting and advertising executives that Mr. Lee was 'too controversial' because he had appeared at benefits for organizations purportedly fighting race prejudice which subsequently had been placed on the Attorney General's subversive list.

MERLE MILLER is on the National Board of Directors of the American Civil Liberties Union and is president of the Authors Guild of America.

"... He told me," White reported, "of four lucrative television appearances which had been offered him, in each of which the sponsor told him that he would employ Mr. Lee after he had 'appeared on some other program.' But none had the courage to be first."

Lee, according to White, had wanted to dramatize his problem by buying a shoe-shine box and setting it up in front of the Bijou Theater where the movie version of "Cry, the Beloved Country" was playing. Lee's performance had been highly praised by the critics; nevertheless, not only was he without work in radio or television, he did not receive a single movie offer either. He proposed to place placards on the shoe-shine box explaining the boycott against him.

"Now," White wrote, "I know I was wrong in dissuading him from his melodramatic plan."

IF GARFIELD and Lee were still living, neither of those experiences could be related without doing them further harm. In the present atmosphere in radio and television, any mention of a performer's or writer's name in such a context makes him more "controversial" and, therefore, more unemployable.

There are several blacklists in use within the industry; for example, the Columbia Broadcasting System has its own catalog of those not to be employed on its programs, but, two years after its publication, "Red Channels" is still the most powerful, and one of this country's largest industries remains prostrate at the feet of what Fortune magazine has called "a handful of busybodies."

A well-known and widely respected television writer named in the book recently tried writing under another name because he was unable to get any assignments under his own. He has nevertheless been turned down for one hour-long dramatic assignment on television—told his pseudonym "just doesn't have enough credits."

A long-time radio actress is now clerking in a department store; a distinguished actor has turned to teaching; a script writer is unsuccessfully attempting magazine fiction; a former network executive is entertaining at a summer resort; a second is "hopefully" shooting films in Mexico. He has yet to make a sale.

These people are all named in "Red Channels"; Canada Lee is not. Gilbert Gabriel, the novelist and dramatic critic, is not. Nevertheless, a year ago he was at the last minute turned down for a television quiz show on which he had been scheduled to appear regularly. When he asked the reason, he was reminded that he was then head of the censorship committee of the Authors League of America. "What difference does that make?" he asked. "I'm afraid," he was told, "it makes you too controversial."

But the fear is not confined to New York and the Mecca of the advertising agencies, Madison Avenue. For more than a year Dr. Harold H. Story, head of adult education for the Los Angeles Board of Education, appeared almost weekly on one or another panel show on Station KLAC-TV in Hollywood. In April, on a program called "Hollywood on Television," he said that members of a local pressure group, the Freedom Clubs, were largely "Ku Kluxers in dinner jackets." The Freedom Clubs and their affiliates, the Liberty Belles, went to work on the program's sponsors; two immediately canceled their contracts with the station. Dr. Story was told that he could no longer appear on any of KLAC's programs.

A few days later Paul Price wrote in his column in the Los Angeles Daily News, "Right now—this very minute probably—some of these vicious and vociferous organizations are trying to sabotage our more liberal and free-thinking newsmen and commentators." In Dr. Story's case, Price went on, "... KLAC took the easy way out. ... It doesn't have to be that way. ... Harry Maizlish of KFWB [a local radio station] proved that you can fight these organizations when they attacked his program for presenting Eleanor Roosevelt. This particular attack was as usual well organized and two sponsors withdrew their support from the program. So do you know what Harry Maizlish did? He countered by presenting Eleanor Roosevelt twice a day!" There are very few employers like Mr. Maizlish in the industry.

Shortly after the infamous August weekend in 1950 when because of a few telephone calls (some say 20, others 200) Jean Muir lost the role of Mother Aldrich in General Foods' "The Aldrich Family," she told the press that she would not cooperate with any committee that wanted to "make a cause out of me." She was, she added, afraid that the Communists would work their way into any such campaign.

"I don't want the Communists to use me," she went on. "I want to stay clean. The best way for me to refute these charges is for me to get a job in television, radio, or in some acting capacity. There must be someone with enough courage to hire me." Up to now, no one has.

True, there has not been another Muir case; it seems unlikely that there ever will be. According to Frank Reel, executive secretary of the American Federation of Radio Artists, "These days they just don't hire anybody who might get into trouble." Or, as the manager of a network station in New Orleans put it, "Now if you have to drop anybody, you simply say you are making a change in the programming. ... These things can be handled very simply if management is alert. ... I have had complaints about a couple of my people, and if there's any more trouble, it's off with their heads."

As for questioning the ethics of using a blacklist, no one in the industry has—publicly anyway; no one has questioned the motives of the three men mainly responsible for "Red Channels"; apparently, no one has even bothered to find out who or what they are.

Theodore C. Kirkpatrick, John G. Keenan, and Kenneth M. Bierly resigned from the Federal Bureau of Investigation shortly after the end of the Second World War; early in 1947 they set up a firm with a capitalization of $15,000 called American Business Consultants. The first issue of Counterattack, a weekly newsletter of "Facts to Combat Communism," was published in mid-May. Most of the money to launch the publication came from Alfred Kohlberg, the wealthy importer who has been one of Chiang Kai-shek's most active and vocal backers in this country as well as one of the most influential supporters of Senator Joseph R. McCarthy.

American Business Consultants was a success from the start. Keenan, its president, told a representative of the trade magazine Sponsor, "Conservatively, you can say we gross [from all the firm's operations] between $50,000 and $100,000 annually." But he hurriedly added, "That isn't really much. Why, we know plenty of other ex-FBI men who make a lot more dough than we do working for big corporations." A long-time admirer of the organization was even more flattering in his estimate. "They have an annual income, a net income, of about $70,000 from Counterattack alone. I know that for a fact."

Among the targets of the newsletter have been Trygve Lie ("Stalin's choice"); the U. N. itself ("Its officials deny it is a shelter or cover for Communists and pro-Communists"); a judge of the New York State Supreme Court who used the words "witch hunt" in one of his decisions; William L. Green and Philip Murray; the Blatz Beer Company, for using a "fellow-traveling" actress from Milwaukee in one of its ads (the newsletter asked its readers to write directly to the brewery and complain); the book-review sections of both the New York Times and the Herald Tribune (sometimes for damning a book like "Seeds of Treason" of which Counterattack approved, again for praising a volume the newsletter disliked); the Yale Law School, for having "Reds" on its staff; the Associated Press, for distributing an article "misleading" the public on communism in Hollywood; the "slick, sophisticated New Yorker magazine . . . read in all parts of the United States . . . for what the C. P. calls its 'upper-middle-class' type of humor and culture"; Life, Look, Time, the Atlantic, Fortune, Standard Oil of New Jersey, U. S. Steel, all the major radio and television networks, and scores of producers, directors, actors, singers, and dancers, and, of course, The Nation.

BESIDES the weekly publication, American Business Consultants provides what the National Better Business Bureau has described as "... information on subversive activities to newspapers, periodicals, radio, and other public-opinion media"; it also "offers to business firms research services on subversive activities on a fee basis." The fees often total several thousand dollars each.

Despite the fact that the organization does not have access to the files of the FBI and has never been officially approved by J. Edgar Hoover, a book publisher reports that in a recent interview one of A. B. C.'s salesmen strongly emphasized the FBI theme. "He didn't exactly say Keenan and Kirkpatrick still get a look at the FBI files," the publisher declared, "but he had a moth-eaten letter which pointed up their former association, and his whole approach was the 'fear technique,' implying that the firm might get in a lot of trouble if we didn't have an investigation made of our people or, at the very least, take several subscriptions to Counterattack."

Actually, many firms using such "research" have been dissatisfied with the results. The managing editor of a New York newspaper said, "We were led to believe we'd be getting some 'inside dope' on a certain Commie reverend we were gunning for. . . . There wasn't a thing we didn't already have in our morgue or, for that matter, hadn't already published ourselves, but the whole thing cost us $500."

Shortly after Counterattack remarked that, "All networks let some Communists and Communist frontiers get on their programs, but C. B. S. is worst of all," the network hired the publishers to "investigate" its employees. The results, a high official has said, "were completely worthless. It was the same kind of thing they put in 'Red Channels.'"

Herblock in the Washington Post

"Whatever Happened to Freedom from Fear?"

Perhaps coincidentally, shortly after the Hutchins Advertising Agency turned down an offer for an investigation of the personnel used on the radio and television programs it handles, including the Philco account, Counterattack had an item headed "Philco Does It Again" in which it denounced an actress appearing on one of the Philco programs and urged its readers to protest. Nevertheless, the agency still did not accept A. B. C.'s proposal for a $1,000 "research" job.

According to Sponsor, "Whether intentional or not, the organization is in the position of hanging a double-edged sword over the head of broadcast advertisers. It serves at one and the same time as disturber of the peace, prosecuting attorney, judge, jury, and detective agency. That is to say, it publishes allegations in 'Red Channels,' then follows them up by urging letter-writers to put pressure on sponsors in Counterattack; later holds hearings on the accused in its private offices; and personally solicits sponsors to hire its detective agency 'research service.' " Meanwhile, the two branches of the business continue to operate side by side.

RECENTLY, however, the firm has been undergoing internal dissension. For example, Vincent W. Hartnett, a dark, thin-faced, intense young man who now advertises himself as the "author of 'Red Channels,'" is no longer associated with American Business Consultants; Keenan has said that he never was and Kirkpatrick has added, "He is not an employee and has no other connection with us whatsoever except that he did write the introduction [to 'Red Channels']."

Despite that, Hartnett not long ago placed an advertisement in the Brooklyn Tablet with the headline, "'Red Channels' Was a Piker." The booklet, the ad went on, "only scratched the surface of Communist influence in radio and TV." To hear "the full, documented expose," Hartnett urged the readers of the Tablet to book him for a lecture, "A MUST for every Holy Name Society, K. of C. Council, C. W. V. Post." His rates in and around New York are, he has said, "usually around fifty dollars a lecture." Out of town, the fee is higher.

Moreover, as the self-styled "nation's top authority on communism and communications," Hartnett has gone into the publishing business for himself. His office, complete with files, is in his crowded East Twentieth Street apartment in New York City. As his first independent venture, Hartnett brought out a mimeographed loose-leaf book called "Confidential Notebook (File No. 13)." The book, which is sold by the publisher himself, is in the hands of a good many sponsors and advertising and network executives, most of whom, as usual, deny ever having seen it.

The technique employed in assembling the material is approximately the same as that used in "Red Channels," and many of the names also appeared in the earlier book, sometimes with more "front" organizations which those listed allegedly belonged to or supported. However, "Confidential Notebook" includes additional names of playwrights, musicians, book and magazine publishers, editors, and writers, newspaper columnists, and even a few well-known lawyers. In some cases, again as in "Red Channels," Hartnett uses the Daily Worker, a letterhead, or a report of the Un-American Activities Committee as the source for his allegations. In others, he credits only "a private source." During the Second World War, Hartnett was an officer in Naval Intelligence.

To supplement his income, Hartnett occasionally makes his files available "to a few qualified persons." "By qualified," he explained, "I mean not everybody would understand them and be able to weigh the information properly." This service is not given gratuitously even to the "qualified." "The price," Hartnett declared, "varies, but you might say it's frequently in the neighborhood of $500."

Finally, the one-time intelligence officer is working on what he is said to have described to potential subscribers as "an encyclopedia of communism and Communists in the United States." The new book, he is quoted as saying, will "contain several thousand names, some of which will be a complete surprise to everybody, and there will be a lot of textual material too." He adds that owning the book will be "essential to anyone in a position of authority who is a true anti-Communist." It will be available only in a limited edition—understandably, since he told the executive quoted above that the price will be $500 a copy.

IN ADDITION to Hartnett's separation from American Business Consultants, Bierly, one of the founders, has also parted company with the firm in a manner which he says "you couldn't exactly call friendly." He has moved his office to a West Fortieth Street address and has set up a new organization, partly concerned with "getting people out of the trouble 'Red Channels' got them into." One of his more lucrative accounts is Columbia Pictures.

His first job for Columbia was "to clear up the confusion about Judy Holliday," a "Red Channels" listee who has frequently been denounced in Counterattack as well. Miss Holliday has not recently appeared on either radio or television, but she did play the lead (and won an Oscar for it) in the movie version of "Born Yesterday," and, currently, in "The Marrying Kind." When the pictures were released there were threats of a picket line wherever either was shown. ("Born Yesterday" was in fact picketed in New York when it played the Victoria.) However, most of the threats did not materialize, and Bierly has said, "You might put it that I had something to do with getting the facts, the true facts, to the right people. . . . You can say . . . that Miss Holliday is not a Communist and never has been, and neither are a lot of other people in it." By "it" Bierly meant "Red Channels."

More recently, Kirkpatrick himself is reported not to be active in the organization for which he was so long the most vociferous spokesman. At this writing, the office of American Business Consultants will say only that, "Mr. Kirkpatrick is on vacation." They add, "The time of his return is uncertain." Kirkpatrick himself is not available for comment, but the rumor is that he plans to run for Congress in Queens on the Republican ticket.

Thus, of the founders of American Business Consultants probably only Keenan remains, a man described by Bierly as ". . . more the business man and . . . the most right-wing of us." Keenan, now forty-one, was born in Brooklyn, graduated from Fordham, received his law degree from St. John's, and, before joining the FBI in 1941, was a member of his father's long-established law firm, Alexander and Keenan, at 42 Broadway. Now he is a partner. It was Keenan who said, ". . . After the hullabaloo of 'Red Channels,' and the Korean War following after that, and all this hodgepodge and mess, we felt we had laid an egg that was a bombshell. . . ."

Nevertheless, although its ranks are depleted, American Business Consultants goes on; Keenan is still its president; Counterattack continues to appear every week; the firm continues to sell its "research" and "Red Channels" remains "the Bible of Madison Avenue."

THERE are 151 names in "Red Channels"; they include such notable playwrights as Arthur Miller (who was told by a radio producer, "We'd like to repeat some of those adaptations you did for us right after the war, but you're in 'Red Channels,' brother") and Lillian Hellman; there are important directors, and world-famous actors and actresses. Some of those listed were only well-paid hacks and a few of the performers never advanced much beyond an occasional soap opera, but their talent or lack of it is unimportant. All of them have suffered, financially and spiritually. One influential and vigorously anti-Communist lawyer, some of whose clients are named, puts it this way: "Every one [of the 151] has been affected. A few don't even know it, but they've all lost some shows. A majority have lost a great many jobs, and a good-sized minority just aren't working at their professions any more."

After each of the 151 names is a list of organizations which the person is "reported as" having once belonged to or supported. Although the subtitle of the book is "The Report of Communist Influence in Radio and Television" and the cover shows a giant red hand grasping a microphone, the publishers of "Red Channels"

In Whose Image?

Speaking at the Baccalaureate services for George Washington University on May 26, the Very Reverend Doctor Francis Bowes Sayre, Jr., Dean of Washington Cathedral, called attention to the fact that men are forced nowadays to account to the American Legion and "other 100-per cent American groups" for their character and integrity. "To me," he protested, "that is the next thing to being answerable to Moscow. In whose image are we created? In that of the American Legion or of God?"—From the Washington Post, May 26, 1952.

have not said that all or any of the 151 is a Communist or even a Communist sympathizer. According to Bierly, the book was published because early in 1950 it had ". . . been quite some time since we had any special report at all. Most of our subscribers [to Counterattack] had come to expect these occasional things, and we were wondering what perhaps might be desirable or timely." They decided on radio and television; there had been previous special reports on such subjects as the Progressive Party and the Mundt-Nixon "Communist-control" bill.

However, in putting the book together the publishers made no attempt to differentiate between what Kirkpatrick was later to call "the dupers and the duped." Such a distinction, according to Bierly, was impossible. "It was immaterial whether they [the 151] were Communists, entirely immaterial to what we were trying to do. It had no bearing on whether they were Communists. In the first place, we don't know who is a Communist. In the second place, we couldn't find out if we had asked them who were anti-Communist and who were pro-Communist."

No attempt was made to check with those named to find out whether or not the allegations were true. Irene Wicker, for example, is listed only as having been a member of the Committee for the Reelection of Benjamin J. Davis. When her attorney failed to find her name among those of the 30,000 nominating Davis for office, he forced a retraction from the Daily Worker, which had published the allegation first. Miss Wicker was officially "cleared" in Counterattack. Nevertheless, she is still not working in radio or television.

Many of the listees have taken part in clear-cut anti-Communist activities; with a few exceptions, these are not mentioned. Gypsy Rose Lee has denied each of the four activities attributed to her; more important, she points out that she played benefits for France and Britain during the non-aggression pact; she took part in another for Finland when that nation was being attacked by Russia. No party member or fellow traveler would have done so. Yet these facts are not mentioned in "Red Channels." Miss Lee has said, "If a man (or woman) is to be judged by the company he keeps, he should be judged by all the company he keeps."

But Bierly has said, "... we do not really concentrate on collecting anti-Communist statements as such. . . . We didn't go out and . . . actively try to find out how many Communist statements they [the listees] made at cocktail parties, nor how many anti-Communist statements they . . . made at cocktail parties or in business, or anti-Communist organizations they belonged to, nor did we try to find out whether they were Communist, pro-Communist, Fascist, or what have you. . . ." When "Red Channels" was published Miss Lee was working

A Citizen's Creed

None of us can know how much of this inquiry into the private lives of American citizens and government employees is necessary. Some of it is necessary—but we have no way of knowing which, when, or where. We have seen enough to know for sure that a great deal of it is altogether irresponsible. Well, there is a way of making it all responsible, of fixing responsibility. As one citizen of the United States, I intend to take that way, myself, from now on.

Representatives of the FBI and of other official investigating bodies have questioned me, in the past, about a number of people and I have answered their questions. That's over. From now on any representative of the government, properly identified, can count on a drink and perhaps informed talk about the Red (but non-Communist) Sox at my house. But if he wants information from me about anyone whomsoever, no soap. If it is my duty as citizen to tell what I know about someone, I will perform that duty under subpoena, in open court, before that person and his attorney. This notice is posted in the courthouse square: I will not discuss anyone in private with any government investigator.

I like a country where it's nobody's damned business what magazines anyone reads, what he thinks, whom he has cocktails with. I like a country where we do not have to stuff the chimney against listening ears and where what we say does not go into the FBI files along with a note from S-17 that I may have another wife in California. I like a country where no college-trained flatfeet collect memoranda about us and ask judicial protection for them, a country where when someone makes statements about us to officials he can be held to account. We had that kind of country only a little while ago and I'm for getting it back. It was a lot less scared than the one we've got now. It slept sound no matter how many people joined Communist reading circles and it put common scolds to the ducking stool. Let's rip off the gingerbread and restore the original paneling.—Bernard De Voto in Harper's Magazine, October, 1949.

regularly in radio and on television; she no longer is.

In the two years since June 22, 1950, the industry has been seeking an answer to "Red Channels." Mostly it has simply not hired those named in the book. In addition, the Columbia Broadcasting System has required each of its employees to sign a "loyalty statement." One or two resigned; the majority were humiliated and indignant; so far no "subversives" have been turned up. There was talk of an industry-wide screening board and of asking the federal government to declare the industry "sensitive" and thus use governmental screening agencies. The board never materialized; the government refused. The American Federation of Radio Artists set up a clearing house for voluntary statements by those listed in "Red Channels" or accused elsewhere of being "disloyal." A year after the plan was initiated, the union's executive secretary, Frank Reel, said, "... in my opinion it has been a failure." A vehemently debated constitutional amendment aimed at those who have "... maintained membership in . . . or joined the Communist Party since December 31, 1945," has not at this writing been tested. It probably will not be.

Actually, no one in authority in the industry, on either the union or management level, has publicly defined what is being looked for. Is one affiliation in "Red Channels" enough to bar a man from future employment? Are a dozen required? Are forty-one necessary? Who can say?

To date, no one has even tried. A multi-billion-dollar basic industry has simply knuckled under to the pressure of a trio of troublemakers capitalized at $15,000.

SHORTLY after the publication of "The Judges and the Judged," a man from Atlantic City who identifies himself as "a man on the street" but whose name is known to this writer wrote to the president of the Columbia Broadcasting System suggesting a way to deal with a blacklist. "I am giving it to you first because I like your 'Invitation to Learning' program," he wrote.

"All pressure groups," he continued, "are overrated. Like pressure, they blow up, and the man on the street goes in the store and buys your stuff anyway. Why don't you and your sponsors hire anybody, no matter who he or she is, just as long as he, or she, or they, have the talent for the job, even if it's being president of the company?"

"In the first place, it is legal, which means it is constitutional . . . and . . . it is democratic . . . and it is virtuous, too. The results? Well, there will be a lull, the first few days, a lot of stupid talk, and then everybody on the other networks, and his brother, including the sponsors, will want to join your act. . . . And, finally, it will be the finest thing that ever happened to this country since Columbus came over and started all the trouble."

Confessions of a 33d-Degree Subversive

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

MYSELF, I've been as subversive as my energy and other means have permitted me to be. If I weren't subversive I couldn't endure myself. In 1948 the Department of Justice published a list of subversive organizations and, according to the press, I was, or had been, or was alleged to be, connected with most of them. Then, in the spring of 1950, Congress appropriated a large sum of money for the Un-American Activities Committee to prepare and publish a sort of Who's Who in American Subversion. The volume will probably require a five-foot shelf, for by press accounts it will contain the records of more than a million individuals. I hope mine will take up at least a page.

I don't know—and in a way don't care—how many subversive organizations I was, or still am, or was or am alleged to be, connected with. But I claim that I belonged to, or was on the sponsor list, or appeared on programs of several of those that favored the Loyalist government against Franco in Spain; went through the motions of protecting the foreign-born; believed in improving the status of Negroes; supported the war effort under Roosevelt; favored the idea of avoiding World War III immediately after World War II; preferred friendship to conflict with any country, yes, even with the Soviet Union; objected to the execution of Greek subversives under the aegis of the Truman Doctrine because, as reported in the press, they had "leftist leanings"; and so on.

The Un-American Activities Committee never informed me of the data it had on my subversiveness; but whatever it has is all right with me, as far as it goes. I'm sure, however, it doesn't go far enough. I am guilty of derelictions that the committee isn't aware of yet; and to get the space I deserve in the forthcoming Who's Who in American Subversion, here's the record.

In my study hangs a framed diploma-like document that recognizes my help in selling war bonds during 1943-45. Some of the millions I wangled out of the American public doubtless went—through the channels of the American "free-enterprise" system—for lend-lease to the Russians. This document on the wall of my study is signed by F. D. R's personal friend, Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr., a fanatic anti-Nazi who put forth the Morgenthau Plan to disindustrialize Germany. I daresay Morgenthau will get into Who's

Who in American Subversion too, for advancing the plan, unless of course the Herculean job is abandoned when Washington discovers that practically everybody in America is subversive and that there's no point competing with the telephone book.

While I was abroad in 1949, friends sent me clippings of news stories which reported the latest "revelations" about me by "ex-Communists" and self-confessed Soviet spies converted to Catholicism and out to make a name for themselves. Reading the clippings, I found out that I was "a tower of strength" behind I don't recall what organization, a Stalin stooge, and, at the same time, a Tito-tooter. One paper said that somebody in Washington had compiled a list of thirty-two "really dangerous subversive organizations and publications" and that I was or had been a member or sponsor of, or a contributor to, thirty-three.

THE discrepancy bothers me. Was it my book reviews for the New York Herald Tribune that made me a thirty-third-degree subversive? Could be. According to Westbrook Pegler, a rooter for the Un-American Activities Committee, the Herald Tribune, while nominally a Republican sheet, is suspect for employing editors and critics who are ill-disguised Reds. And Karl Marx wrote for the Tribune when it was edited by Horace Greeley, a radical to the left of Lincoln who was denounced by the Peglers and Thomases of his day for being not merely subversive but an out-and-out traitor. Or was I a thirty-third-degree subversive because I was a long-time member of the American Legion?

To be a member of the American Legion one has to have served in the armed forces of the United States. Could that be it? I did serve in the American army in World War I, but subversion was no problem then. So I reviewed my connections with the United States army during World War II, and I swear on a stack of Sears, Roebuck catalogs that all I remember is the following: I talked with Commander-in-Chief Roosevelt three times. I urged General Staff and Intelligence officers to bone up on the Tito movement before they decided to invade and liberate Yugoslavia. And one evening in the Carlton Hotel bar in Washington I bawled out a general who had had a couple of highballs too many and practically revealed the date set for the Normandy invasion. Could any of these items have fattened my subversive record?

Or was I a super-subversive because I wrote "The Native's Return" on a Guggenheim fellowship? That made me a Guggenheim fellow traveler for life, along with the poet who wrote "John Brown's Body" and the novelist who wrote "God's Angry Man"—both in praise of a crazy character so subversive he had to be hanged.

Or let's consider this episode in my reprehensible career. One day in 1937 I was sitting on the stage in a ballroom in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel during the proceedings of the annual New York Herald Tribune Forum when the polite stranger next to me introduced himself as David Stevens and turned out to be the head of the Humanities Division of the Rockefeller Foundation. Instead of listening to the speakers, most of whom were subversives of one kind or another, Mr. Stevens and I held a whispered conversation about a magazine article of mine he had just read, and the first thing I knew he asked me if I could use a grant-in-aid. I wasn't exactly broke at the time, but the offer was one of those flukes that could happen only in America; and who was I to scorn our Way by refusing a Rockefeller grant? On the other hand, being a subversive and hep to some of the history of great American fortunes, and also being tired after finishing a book, with my whole character in a wobbly and sagging condition, I didn't—I couldn't—refuse Rockefeller money. In short, I took it. And for a while in 1949, thinking back, I was almost sure it was that which made me a thirty-third-degree subversive. For guilt-by-association is a subtle, haphazard, long-armed, wide-ranging invention that's almost bound to drag you in. There's no dodging it except maybe if you live on an island all by yourself and have nothing against anybody or anything—and then you might as well be dead.

Scientists in the Doghouse

BY KIRTLEY F. MATHER

MEN and women who devote their time and energy to scientific research are peculiarly vulnerable to suspicion, recrimination, and punishment in times like these, when irrational fear restricts the fundamental freedoms. The headquarters files of the American Association for the Advancement of Science are rapidly filling with documents, many of them confidential, revealing the startling extent to which individual scientists in all parts of the country are suffering the consequences of the effort to gain security through secrecy and of the campaign to paralyze all independent thought, discussion, and dissent concerning America's foreign policies.

There are some obvious reasons why scientists are favorite targets of those who look for potential traitors and subversive characters behind every bush. In the first place, scientists, by the very nature of their mental habits, are internationalistic rather than chauvinistic in outlook. They know that fellow scientists in foreign lands are working on problems more or less akin to their own. More than anyone else they are aware of the deep indebtedness of American technology to the scientific research pursued by citizens of other countries. They know that the progress of science is most rapid when there is the greatest freedom for uninhibited communication among scientists throughout the world. All who can afford to do so belong to one or more international organizations of researchers in their own special field. As a group, scientists want to reduce the keeping of scientific secrets to the absolute minimum necessary for national security. It is only natural that they should heartily dislike the red-tape curtain dropped around the United States by the 1950 McCarran act.

In the second place, scientists are necessarily devoted to the most important and most fundamental of the democratic freedoms, the freedom to think one's own thoughts and to express them so that they may be appraised in the court of public opinion. The fraternity of scientists is, in fact, the outstanding example of a "free society" in modern civilization. Each scientist is not only permitted but encouraged to form and express his own judgment. When he thinks others are wrong, he says so. By the same token, he is ready to submit his opinion to the judgment of his fellows.

It is not surprising, therefore, that scientists occasionally speak up in defense of a fellow scientist who is charged with disloyalty because of his associations or who is being persecuted for alleged "un-American" ideas he may have expressed. Even though one scientist may strongly disagree with another's opinions, he knows he must defend the other's right to express them, else he will be false to his high calling as a seeker of the truth. He trusts the laws of libel and misconduct to take care of any pernicious extension of the principle of freedom, and with Thomas Jefferson, who was a scientist as well as a statesman, he says, "We are not afraid to follow truth wherever it may lead, nor tolerate error as long as reason is left free to combat it." And if there enters his mind the suspicion that perhaps in times of ideological conflict a little thought control might be desirable, he has only to remind himself of the sorry plight of the biological sciences in the Soviet Union.

These attitudes, the inevitable fruits of the intellectual discipline of science as a method of gaining knowledge, are of course in perfect accord with the genius of American democracy. Once confirmed by training and experience in the laboratory, they are almost certain to characterize the scientist in all aspects of his life, as a citizen as well as an investigator of nature or a technician in industry. Indeed, therein lies the danger for the man of science. Freedom to think for oneself and to express one's own thoughts in the comparative safety of the white-tiled, gadget-crowded laboratory is one thing. To carry over that habit into the world beyond the laboratory is quite another—as many a scientist has learned through bitter experience in recent years.

THE machinery for teaching scientists that lesson is unfortunately extensive and well oiled. There is as yet no equivalent of "Red Channels" for the nation's scientific man-power, but Counterattack is right on the job, and Senator McCarthy has made a start in compiling his own blacklist of scientists. On October 20, 1950, the ineffable Senator spread on the pages of the Congressional Record a blacklist of seven prominent scientists who, according to him, are "supporting the causes of Stalin's fifth column in this country."

The Subcommittee on Subversive Activities of the National Americanism Commission of the American Legion periodically publishes its blacklist of lecturers, writers, and others "whose past activities make them unsuitable or inappropriate for Legion sponsorship." Several well-known scientists are included in this list. Although the directive concerning the use of the "information" by Legion posts states that it was compiled so that no Legion post would endorse, or its members participate in a meeting with, a subversive person, the practice in many local posts goes far beyond the instructions from national headquarters. On many occasions over-zealous Legionnaires have made strenuous attempts—not all unsuccessful—to bar scientists from appearing on local programs.

Scores of scientists connected with institutions of higher learning are listed in "Red-ucator Dossiers"—"Red-ucators at Harvard," "at Columbia," "at Chicago," etc.—issued by the National Council for American Education "as part of its campaign to rid the schools and colleges of socialistic, un-American teachings and teachers." Fortunately, the stronger universities have stood their ground. But the campaign has made headway in other institutions, and its repercussions have ramified throughout the entire company of American scientists. Younger men and women, especially, have regretfully decided that the opportunity to pursue their chosen profession undisturbed can be gained only by completely avoiding controversial issues.

The election of Dr. E. U. Condon to the presidency of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in December, 1951, was seized upon by Representative Richard B. Vail, of Illinois, as the basis for an attack upon the association itself. "What manner of organization is this association and what sort of people comprise its membership who elect such characters as their leaders? I commend the outfit to the attention of the FBI and the Committee on Un-American Activities." Fulton Lewis, Jr., eagerly picked up the Representative's allegations that the association follows "the typical Commie line" and spread across the country smearing insinuations about its officers and members in his syndicated newspaper column.

Without exception, the tactics of these would-be repressors of the civil liberties of scientists involve the use of the obviously un-American procedure now known as "guilt by association." Justification for labeling a person "fellow traveler," "Commie sympathizer," "pinko," or "Red" is based upon his alleged affiliation with organizations that have been listed as subversive by the Attorney General, the Un-American Activities Committee, or the legislative committees to investigate communism that have been set up in several states. Scarcely any publicity has been given to the Supreme Court's stinging denunciation, in the case of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, of the Attorney General's procedure in compiling his blacklist, without notice or hearing, a rebuke that presumably would apply to legislative committees as well. This ruling was handed down nearly a year ago, and yet no hearings have been granted, and the list still stands.

Although the heads of many scientists are bloody but unbowed, the heads of many others have been lopped off. The number of such tragedies is far greater than any statistician can ever discover. Both the unfortunate victims and the institutions by which they have been employed have characteristically shunned publicity, for reasons that may differ from case to case but add up to a definitely "hush-hush" policy.

THE major portion of research activities in university laboratories is subsidized by federal agencies—which makes the universities and science particularly vulnerable to the Congressional witch hunt. Consequently, political screening, rather than mere technical competence, has been accepted as necessary at many academic institutions even when the work is completely unclassified and does not involve access to anything that could be considered a military secret. Administrators dare not risk charges that might be made by Congressional committees or radio and newspaper commentators that they are employing "red" scientists. Visits of FBI agents to heads of departments, project directors, deans, and presidents did not cease with the war. Some institutions have their own security officers, who are concerned not only with classified projects but also with research projects not covered by security regulations. Particularly where academic tenure has not been a stumbling block, it has been comparatively easy to dismiss, or bar from employment, capable scientists accused of past association with organizations now considered questionable or subversive.

There are, moreover, other ways of punishing scientists who are under suspicion of political heresy. Especially since the passage of the McCarran act, despite President Truman's wise and strongly worded veto, the Department of State has been exercising increasing control over the movements of American as well as foreign scientists, both in and out of our country. The power to withhold passports and visas is a power which, when improperly used, can deal a serious blow to scientific progress. International gatherings of scientists have been seriously curtailed, both in America and abroad, by the establishment of political and ideological tests of fitness. Freedom to travel may not be one of the justly celebrated "Four Freedoms," but for the man of science it ranks at least as high as any other.

The seriousness of the present situation and the attitude of responsible scientists toward it are accurately portrayed by the resolution adopted unanimously by the Council of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in Philadelphia last December:

The Council of the American Association for the Advancement of Science is profoundly disturbed over the present world conditions which so severely impede the free interchange of knowledge even among friendly nations. Danger to the future of our nation is implicit in such restrictions.

The Council recognizes the need for measures which will effectively safeguard our security, but expresses its troubled concern over the manner in which such measures, in particular the McCarran act, are being administered, to prohibit American citizens from going abroad and citizens of other nations from coming here to interchange knowledge of science which does not affect security.

The Council strongly urges that the administrative procedures under the McCarran act be reviewed and modified so as to minimize injustices and to increase both our internal strength and our prestige abroad.

The Council further urges revision and improvement of the relevant portions of the act, to retain the objectives of necessary security, but with adequate provisions to maintain free interchange of knowledge that has no security implications.

Since the adoption of that resolution there have been numerous incidents that emphasize the wisdom of giving consideration to its recommendations. For example, a letter was recently received at the Washington office of the Federation of American Scientists from Louis Leprince Ringuet, eminent physicist and member of the French Academy of Sciences, concerning the difficulties encountered by several French scientists who wanted to attend scientific gatherings in the United States or to accept invitations to teach or do research in American institutions. He wrote, in part:

Many French physicists who would like to have contact with their colleagues in the United States are no longer willing to make the request, since the resulting formalities will complicate their lives. . . . We are often ignorant, moreover, of the reasons for these delays. . . . Conversations with the American officials often raise hopes that visas will be granted after a short period, and this impression is repeated at each request for a complete inquiry. . . . The applicant has the real feeling of being a suspect who is put off from week to week; the more so because he receives a long interrogation as if before a police magistrate. This state of affairs seriously impedes the possibilities of contact with scholars in the United States and is most detrimental for science. . . . Lastly, the multiplicity of instances of delay produces a deplorable effect on French opinion. . . . I have even seen the expression "iron curtain of the West" applied to the United States. . . .

THE other aspect of the passport problem is the refusal of the State Department to grant passports to American scientists for foreign travel, which often prevents them from pursuing research projects of vital importance to the United States. There have been many such instances; one of the most glaring is that of Linus Pauling. Dr. Pauling is one of our most eminent chemists, former president of the American Chemical Society and chairman of the Division of Chemistry and Chemical Engineering at the California Institute of Technology. His outstanding contributions to our military strength during World War II won him the Medal of Merit, bestowed on him by President Truman in 1948. Dr. Pauling applied for a passport to enable him to take part in a conference of the Royal Society of London, this spring, on the structure of proteins. His application was denied; the only explanation offered by the State Department was that it had refused to issue a passport on the grounds that issuance would not be in "the best interests of the United States."

Not only does this appear to be unreasonable and unusual punishment of Dr. Pauling, but the repercussions of such events throughout the great body of American scientists cannot but be deleterious in the extreme. Not knowing what alleged crimes have brought this penalty upon one of their number, the scientists, upon whom the future security and prosperity of our country depend, will find their efficiency decreased in subtle but significant ways. Each will decide that the only way to avoid a similar fate is to withdraw completely from all participation in public affairs. No longer will they dare to give critical consideration to the social implications of their work. In one large compartment of their lives, in which they should accept their responsibilities as citizens in a democracy, they will fit their minds into the Procrustean bed of rigid conformity to official governmental policies and majority opinion. How soon this acceptance of authoritarian dictates will carry over into the other compartment of their lives, in which scientific habits of thought have proved so invigorating for scientific progress, is a neat question for the psychologists. At the moment, it is generally held that schizophrenia is quite bad for a man.

The Bigots and the Professionals

BY VERN COUNTRYMAN

FOR years the House Un-American Activities Committee and its allies in bigotry have had three favorite targets: labor unions, entertainment stars, and government employees. Recently there have been growing indications that the bigots are beginning to focus on certain other professional groups: lawyers, ministers, doctors, and newspapermen.

The attack on the lawyers is of longest duration, and understandably so. Many people haled before committees on "un-Americanism" have retained lawyers who, with varying degrees of success, have opposed the typically high-handed methods of the investigators. And as any members of a committee on un-Americanism can tell you, a person who opposes the committee is a Communist.

This sort of reasoning was employed in the House committee's report of September, 1950, labeling the National Lawyers Guild the "legal bulwark of the Communist Party." In addition to a typical distortion of the Guild's record to make it coincide with the "party line," proof for this charge was found in the fact that a number of Guild members had advised their clients to invoke the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination when asked about Communist Party membership. (In December, 1950, the Supreme Court held this to be sound advice.) These attorneys, said the committee, "knowingly or unknowingly function under a directive issued by the . . . Communist Party which prohibits its members from cooperating with the committee."

The committee also charged that "almost without exception" Guild leaders "seek to bring the courts and its [sic] procedures into disrepute." Evidence for this sweeping charge was found in Judge Harold Medina's

Certainly the scientists of America cannot be expected to do their best work as long as they remain in the doghouse. The appeal to get them out into the fresh air, where the winds of freedom and confidence will once more stimulate them to high intellectual adventure, is based not so much upon selfish desire for the personal welfare of individual scientists as upon the recognition of what is absolutely essential to the continuing health of science as an important contributor to the future of America.

action holding five Guild members—three of them Guild officers—in contempt of court for their conduct of the defense in the Dennis case. Although the Supreme Court confined its review of these contempt actions to procedural matters, three justices expressly indicated that they considered Medina as much at fault as the lawyers for the spectacle the trial provided. But Medina was promoted and the lawyers went to jail.

Nor was that the extent of the punishment, for some of the lawyers at least. Two of them have been disbarred and proceedings are pending against a third. Strangest of these proceedings is the action of Federal Judge Hincks in disbaring Harry Sacher for "an excess of zeal." The incident which most offended Hincks was a remark by Sacher that if the prosecutor were a contemporary of Jesus he "would have had Jesus in the dock." This remark, said Hincks, was "crowning proof . . . that Mr. Sacher is a skilled master in the art of inflammation and so habituated to the practice of that art that he cannot safely be left as a member of this bar." Thirty-two years ago, in another Communist prosecution, Clarence Darrow charged that the prosecutor "would have sent Christ to jail just the same as you would these defendants." In the comparative calm of the 1920 Red hunt no one thought of disbaring Darrow or holding him in contempt. And the bar weathered many more years of his zealous arguments for the defense.

The House committee's latest move on lawyers came in its Los Angeles hearings last January when sixteen local attorneys who had been active in liberal causes were subpoenaed. Because the sixteen opposed the subpoenas on constitutional grounds, the committee has not yet moved to compel them to testify. But the nature of its proposed inquiry can fairly be anticipated from its past attempts to compel lawyers and their clients to disclose confidential conversations covered by the legal privilege for attorney-client communications.

This type of harassment is not confined to lawyers.

VERN COUNTRYMAN, associate professor of law at Yale University, is the author of "Un-American Activities in the State of Washington," a study by the Canwell Committee.

Judges who preside over convictions in political cases are promoted and successful prosecutors get judicial appointments. But judges who make rulings favorable to the accused feel the wrath of the bigots. Judge Edward Dimock, when he permitted certain Smith act defendants to leave New York to collect defense material, was subjected to bullying editorial abuse by the New York World-Telegram and the Journal-American. When Judge Delbert Metzger reduced the bail of Smith act defendants in Hawaii from $75,000 to $7,500, Senator O'Mahoney denounced his order as "outrageous" and declared that Metzger, whose term expired a month later, would not be reappointed. Three months later the Supreme Court reversed a federal judge in California who had fixed bail for still another group of Smith act defendants at $50,000, and bail in their cases was ultimately fixed at $5,000 to $10,000. Judge Metzger has not been reappointed.

Longest under attack has been California's Federal Judge Leon Yankwich. In 1947 the Tenney "Little Un-American Activities Committee" labeled the People's Educational Center in Los Angeles a Communist organization and listed Judge Yankwich (who had delivered one lecture before the center in 1945 attacking Hitler's racist theories) as a member of its "faculty." Years later, Judge Yankwich presided over a suit for breach of employment contract brought by Lester Cole, who had been discharged by M-G-M because of his failure to answer questions of the House committee. When the jury gave answers favorable to Cole on certain factual questions submitted by M-G-M, Yankwich entered judgment for Cole for $75,000. This judgment was reversed on appeal because of some erroneous instructions to the jury, but M-G-M, apparently far from confident of its case even in a new trial with corrected instructions, settled out of court with Cole and Dalton Trumbo, who had a similar suit pending, for a sum reported to exceed $100,000. A few weeks ago, Representative Richard B. Vail reached into the grab-bag of unsupported charges, pulled out the Tenney Committee's attack on Yankwich, added his own charge that Yankwich had interpreted "the law and the evidence in diametric opposition to the national interest" in the Cole case, and demanded a Congressional investigation of the judge's fitness for office.

FACED with the intimidation of lawyers in political cases, disregard of the attorney-client privilege, and insistence that judges interpret the law and the facts in accordance with the "national interest," it might be supposed that the American Bar Association would become concerned about such constitutional fundamentals as the right to counsel and a fair trial. But the A. B. A. is preoccupied with other matters.

In February, 1951, it adopted resolutions excluding from the A. B. A. and urging disbarment for all lawyers who are members of the Communist Party or who "advocate Marxism-Leninism." Since that time it has been engaged in circulating a Brief on Communism: Marxism-Leninism, prepared by a committee working "in close cooperation with the American Legion." The brief fails to define "Marxism-Leninism" in any comprehensible way, but it does throw some light on how the A. B. A. resolutions are to be interpreted: (1) "All Communist conspirators are not members of the Communist Party"—some of the "most important . . . Communists and fellow travelers are forbidden . . . to hold official membership." (2) "The Communist conspirators . . . may be depended upon to support the increased domain of government in business, in credit, in transportation, in communication, in housing and power projects." (3) Any lawyer "who is a member of the Communist Party . . . or who embraces and practices the doctrines of communism, either as an ardent Communist or as a fellow traveler," should be disbarred.

MINISTERS are less frequently involved in political causes than lawyers but have no greater immunity from attack if they do participate—on the wrong side. Three years ago the Reverend John Howard Melish was removed by the Protestant Episcopal Church from a pastorate he had held for forty-five years because his son and assistant had been identified with a number of "Communist-front" organizations. More recently, the Reverend George Abbe of the First Universalist Church of Annisquam, Massachusetts, was dismissed by his parish committee because he joined a committee for the defense of Professor Dirk Struik of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who is charged with violation of a Massachusetts version of the Smith act. And a few weeks ago the Reverend Henry J. Carpenter, executive secretary of the Brooklyn Division of the Protestant Council of New York City, was denied a passport to visit Japan for the State Department's usual non-revealing reason: his trip would be "contrary to the best interests of the United States."

A less publicized but still current instance is that of the Methodist Federation for Social Action, which for many years has been under attack by the Hearst and Scripps-Howard press. Late last February—and less than two months before the Methodist Church's quadrennial conference—the House committee released a special report on the Federation, consisting of a collection of previously published statements (principally from such reputable sources as the New York Herald Tribune, the Daily Worker, the Chicago Tribune, the National Republic, and the Bureau County [Ill.] Republican) and concluding with a simple exercise in addition: "The Federation advocates social-economic planning in order to develop a society without class distinctions and privileges.

William Z. Foster . . . said: 'Socialism is the first stage of communism.' " The Methodist conference in April voted to request the Federation to drop the word "Methodist" from its name and to vacate its offices in the New York Methodist Building. The conference also amended its Social Creed to endorse "the principle of the acquisition of property by the Christian processes. . . ."

The bigots were less successful with the Reverend Stephen Fritchman, minister of the First Unitarian Church in Los Angeles, who refused last September to violate the confidence of his congregation by answering questions of the House committee about activities in his church. On December 14 Counterattack labeled Fritchman and his church "a center of front activity" and urged its subscribers to complain about Fritchman's regular Sunday broadcast over station KFWB. On December 21 Fritchman was notified that his contract had been canceled because the station "had been subject to criticism." The board of trustees of his church—which had also endorsed his position before the House committee—promptly appealed his case to the public and stirred up such a protest that the program was reinstated on December 30.

FOR doctors, signs of a concerted campaign began last September and were repeated in January when the House committee summoned a number of them to testify about their own and others' political activities. One of those who refused to answer the committee's questions at the first hearing was Dr. Murray Abowitz of Los Angeles. Two months later, as described by Hannah Bloom in The Nation, May 3, 1952, Drs. Abowitz, Richard Lippman, and Alex Pennes—all of whom had opposed the Tenney Committee's proposed loyalty oaths for licensed professions—were dropped from the staff of Cedars of Lebanon Hospital, without hearings or charges, for "political" reasons. Only concentrated community action forced the hospital trustees to reconsider their decision.

Coincident with the committee's hearings was the announcement by Henry Kaiser's Permanente Hospital, also in Los Angeles, that it would employ no doctor "whose loyalty to the United States government is not established to the satisfaction of Permanente." This same policy is required of all public hospitals in California under the Levering act, which imposes a loyalty oath on all state employees. Pennsylvania's Pechan act imposes the same requirement, and Philadelphia General Hospital last April dismissed a resident physician, a nurse, and a group of internes because they refused to take the oath.

The Doctors' Draft law of 1950, permitting the drafting of doctors up to age fifty while others are subject to draft only up to age twenty-six, has also become an instrument for testing loyalty. Doctors who will not take a loyalty oath are denied commissions. Without a commission the army will not permit the doctor to practice. But he is drafted anyway—as a private—and, if he is lucky, may be assigned to duty as a laboratory technician.

So far the intimidation of doctors for their political views has brought no protest from the medical associations. The A. M. A. has busied itself, instead, with voting contributions to the American Legion's All-American Conference to Combat Communism, memorializing Congress to investigate the schools for "infiltration of un-American fallacies of collectivism," and pinning the "socialist" label on all who support national health insurance. And the New York State Medical Association last May raced ahead of the A. M. A. by adopting a resolution that made the loyalty oath obligatory for all of its members.

NEWSPAPERMEN thus far have been subjected to few attacks from the investigators of "un-Americanisms," but this is not surprising; with very few exceptions the press has given the investigators invaluable support by headlining their irresponsible charges and, in many instances, embellishing them somewhat. But when Drew Pearson criticized Senator McCarthy, the Senator's appeal for a boycott of Pearson's radio sponsor pushed Pearson off the air for several months, and McCarthy's response to similar criticism from Time magazine was: "I am preparing material on Time magazine to furnish all your advertisers." Senator McCarran resorted to the same technique against a Las Vegas newspaper which had the temerity to criticize him in his own bailiwick.

There is evidence, moreover, that the House committee is not fully satisfied with the performance of the press, and that newspapers and magazines may expect fuller treatment. In its hearings last January the committee produced two ex-Communist newsmen to begin revelations on a "cell" of journalists in Los Angeles, and Tom O'Connor, managing editor of the New York Compass, was haled before the committee last month. This inquiry may work from the bottom of the profession up, following the bait tendered by Bishop Fulton J. Sheen, who—speaking either from divine revelation or from some remarkable detective work for a man in his position—told a Rome audience last April that in the United States in 1936 "there was hardly a prominent newspaper commentator who did not have a Communist secretary." Louis Budenz, one of the Bishop's converts, will doubtless supply references as needed.

Resistance to this assault can be successful if it is vigorous, courageous, and prompt. Meanwhile, Americans must apparently be careful about what they confide to their lawyers, ministers, or doctors—their confidences may make newspaper headlines any day now.

6,000,000 Second-Class Citizens

BY RALPH S. BROWN, JR.

MANY people today refuse to admit that there is any difference between political liberalism and communism, and assert the right and duty to impose on others their own standards of belief and conduct. One group that is especially vulnerable to such imposition is the six million Americans who work for the government—federal, state, or local.

Working for the government means working for all of us. If "we" want to limit the civil liberties of our employees, several rationalizations are available. One is to assert that since public office is a public trust certain disabilities attach to its acceptance. A less velvety way of reaching like results is to advance the doctrine that public employment is a privilege, not a right, and may therefore be burdened with conditions. Another approach derives from the contrary assumption that the government employee, far from being a servant, is our master. We must put hooks into Leviathan. The immense opportunities of bureaucrats for corruption, sabotage, oppression, and subversion must be held in check, even if the process deprives the bureaucrat of liberties cherished by other free-born Americans.

The Hatch act, with its brood of little Hatch acts in the states, was directed at overt political activity. It left untouched the right to vote, to belong to a political party, to contribute to it, and to join in petitions. Little noted at the time was another provision that marked the beginning of loyalty tests for federal employees. Section 9-A of the Hatch act denied federal employment to anyone who belonged to an organization advocating the overthrow of the government.

If 1939 marked a turning point in the civil liberties of government employees, as it did in so many aspects of human affairs, its importance was soon submerged in the tide of war. Section 9-A and similar requirements in appropriations acts were interpreted to refer, essentially, only to membership in the Communist Party, the Bund, and a few other clearly Communist or Fascist organizations. The Civil Service Commission was the chief enforcing agency; its War Service Regulations permitted denial of an appointment if there was a "reasonable doubt" as to the applicant's loyalty—the same standard that is now in effect in the federal loyalty program. But it was applied with a difference: the commission's instructions implementing the regulation showed some sophistication and restraint. By the time the Truman Loyalty Order came into effect, more than 1,300 applicants had been declared ineligible by the commission. Loyalty dismissals by employing agencies probably did not exceed 200.

During the war little public attention was directed to this program, or to the dismissal of civilian employees on security grounds, which the military departments were making in considerable numbers. When in 1947, under Congressional pressure and amid confused cross-currents of public opinion about spies and "subversives" in the government service, President Truman inaugurated the present loyalty program by Executive Order 9835, he attached considerable importance to its aim to protect the employee as well as the government. Procedures and criteria were now to be uniform, in contrast to the mists of obscurity that surrounded the war-time programs.

WE HAVE now had almost five years under Executive Order 9835, and the mist is still swirling. With the federal government showing the way, anti-subversive legislation has proliferated in the states and municipalities. Congress has added trimmings here and there, and a ponderous capstone in the Internal Security Act of 1950.

Since national security was the ostensible goal of all the turmoil, special efforts were directed toward the agencies most concerned to protect it. There is no question that they have been given ample powers to eliminate security risks and have exercised them alertly. The war-time legislation authorizing summary dismissal by the military departments was revamped in 1950 and extended to the State Department, Justice, Commerce, and other agencies that deal in state secrets. In its present form it might better be called a "summary-suspension" statute, for the procedures leading to final dismissal do not differ significantly from those of the loyalty program and are usually carried out by joint loyalty-security boards. The Atomic Energy Commission stands a little apart, with its own statutory command to satisfy itself of the "character, associations, and loyalty" of every employee, and of every contractor's employee having access to "restricted data." But its procedures also follow the general pattern.

Consistency of procedures between security and loyalty programs is a normal development, but one might have expected sharp differences between the standards for dismissing an electronics expert and a charwoman. The standards, however, have tended to merge. When an agency has both loyalty and security jurisdiction, the only distinguishing mark of a loyalty case may be that it goes to the Loyalty Review Board, which does not have security jurisdiction. Critics have called for a sharper description of sensitive positions and for a refinement of security standards, but the overlap exists, so that the main problems persisting after five years are usually common to both security and loyalty cases.

These problems, as they affect the fairness of the programs and thus, both directly and indirectly, the civil liberties of government employees, are fairly well known. One way of listing them, as The Nation (May 17, 1952) and others have done, is in terms of the deviations of loyalty cases from what would be considered constitutional rights in a judicial trial.

In this piece I shall not discuss how close to a judicial trial these proceedings ought to be; legally, there is no present constitutional necessity for any resemblance, in view of the Supreme Court's failure to upset the decision of the Court of Appeals in the Dorothy Bailey case. If we are to consider the effect of the program on the freedom of the employee to hold, voice, and act on unpopular opinions, three elements stand out: the lack of any intelligible published standards, the consequences of secrecy (these two are of course related), and the multitude of apparently groundless cases.

IF A government employee is fired because there is a reasonable doubt of his loyalty, everyone, including the administrators of the program, agrees that the stigma is overwhelming. But does the decision—as a matter of underlying standards, not just the facts of the single case—mean to imply that the victim is another Benedict Arnold? Or only that he is not another Nathan Hale? If we can take at face value one of the definitions that have been proffered by the chairman of the Loyalty Review Board, Nathan Hales are called for. Mr. Hiram Bingham, addressing the American Bar Association in 1951, said, "Where there is reasonable doubt as to whether an individual will put his country above his personal interest, his employment constitutes a potential danger to the security of the government."

One can surmise that everyday administration is not so exacting for if unswerving subordination of personal to national interest were in fact the test, the executive department would have been decimated, while the imagination recoils at the hypothetical application of such a test to the legislative branch. Indeed, there is more than surmise that the standards in fact consist of a rather mechanical schedule of so much involvement with proscribed organizations and so many associations with suspected individuals.

The present point, however, is not what the cases would show, but that it is settled policy for them to show

"Constitutions must be defended by the wisdom and fortitude of men. These qualities no constitution can give. They are the gifts of God, and He alone knows whether we shall possess such gifts at the time we stand in need of them."—Edmund Burke nothing, except the final decision of the boards. Even for internal use, opinions and findings are discouraged. Though the facts of a number of celebrated cases have been widely ventilated, mostly by Congressional curiosity, in literally only one case do we know what influenced the departmental board (as it happened) to clear and the Loyalty Review Board to dismiss. That was the result of the State Department's insistence on explaining why when it was finally ordered to fire John Stewart Service.

This secrecy is defended in the interests of security because of the counter-espionage elements that may be present in some cases, or in the interest of protecting the employee, of which more later. The failure to expound, even in expurgated summaries, the meaning of the work of the loyalty boards is thus part of the general pall of security censorship that makes these cases so difficult to defend. As is painfully familiar, the FBI and other investigative reports that form the basis for federal loyalty-security cases need not be disclosed to the respondent if in the judgment of the investigators the security of their operations would be prejudiced, and the source of reports may be withheld even from the boards.

This policy has two major consequences. First, the charges may be incomplete. Second, the presentation of the defense is hampered by the inability to confront witnesses and to know what the board may have up its sleeve. These obstacles are not insuperable. The respondent is not barred from guessing at what episodes in his life lie behind the charges, and he is free to develop at length what a good boy he is, in the hope that a shining record of anti-communism (if he can prove one) will either meet the lurking but unspecified accusations or overbalance them. Further, there is said to have been a marked improvement from the primitive and suspicious beginnings of the programs. But however great the ingenuity of employees and their counsel at divining that a disgruntled landlady is at the root of it all, the burden of defending a loyalty case is still exhausting. Even if a successful defense led to a certificate of purity instead of to further harassments, the difficulty of making it seems certain to curb freedom of action.

The resolution of the security dilemma has so far stumped the experts. Professor Zechariah Chafee, Jr., doughty battler though he is, accepts the proposition that if all witnesses had to appear, "the operations of the FBI would be crippled." One of the great riddles of the loyalty program is whether this concession is necessary.

It is in partial recognition of the inadequacy of standards and the potential unfairness of decision, I suspect, that the reviewing mechanism of the program has become so elaborate. As Alan Barth says, several heads are no better than one when they are acting on faulty premises, but the troubled administrators seem to welcome the gamut of screening and appeals that, though it may only multiply fallibility, at least spreads responsibility for it. The Loyalty Review Board was probably designed in part to take the heat off administrators, and it served this function boldly, for example, in finding no grounds for denying William Remington's present loyalty at the time when he was under public attack.

OF LATE, however, the board seems to conceive its function to be turning on the heat. To substantiate this view one need not resort to the pungent minutes of a board meeting that someone leaked to Senator McCarthy and that were never disowned. The 1951 shift in the formal standards from the requirement that "reasonable grounds exist for belief that the person involved is disloyal" to the present rubric that requires dismissal if "there is a reasonable doubt" was initiated by the board. There have been a number of attempts, both official and amateur, to define the difference between these formulas. The best is probably that proposed at a recent meeting of the American Society for Public Administration: "Another turn of the screw."

Besides turning the screw, the Loyalty Review Board persists in a policy that to my mind is the worst defect of the program, because, unlike the two already mentioned, it could easily be corrected. That is its insistence on having cases carried through to formal hearings, though the statistics show that most of them should not be. To minimize the effect of the program it is customary to point out that fewer than 400 employees have been fired (these figures, based on detailed tabulations, refer to the loyalty program; no adequate data have been published on the security cases). Walter Gellhorn and other acute critics argue that this is not a boast but an indictment, when it is compared to the number of adjudicated cases, now about 10,000. That is, no more than 4 per cent of the loyalty cases have resulted in "convictions." The defendants in the other 96 per cent have had the dubious blessing of being cleared—until something else turns up and proceedings start again. The board views the hearings simply as an extension of the investigative process and points to a supposedly beneficent kind of secrecy, their confidential character. This is an illusory safeguard. Aside from the suspicions aroused among neighbors and others by a "full field investigation," the defense of a case, as former Attorney General Francis Biddle has pointed out, requires the employee to enlist the aid of his family, his friends, his associates. Total strangers need know nothing about it.

The chief impact of the federal loyalty program has come from the hearings and the threat of dismissal, rather than from sweeping purges. The search for disloyalty has diminished the liberties of civil servants in three ways. First, there are the procedural shortcomings. Second, an employee who has once been involved in a proceeding loses a good deal of his former freedom to transfer to a different job, either outside or (especially) within the federal service. These effects are felt by those who have got caught in the wheels. Third, and this affects millions rather than thousands, it seems certain that a program of "thought surveillance" operates to twist the political and social thought and action of anyone who is or may want to be a federal employee. A job applicant, by the way, may never even get to the hearing stage. If the personnel officer thinks the record might lead to a hearing, the prudent course is to find the applicant "unsuitable."

THE effects of the program on the morale and independence of government employees, of which we have had many impressionistic reports, are now receiving experimental verification. Marie Jahoda and Stuart Cook of New York University have made a preliminary study based on seventy extensive interviews, the results of which were published in the March issue of the Yale Law Journal. It seems likely that a wider survey would produce further evidence that the threat of loyalty or security proceedings has made federal employees less willing to read, to criticize, to join civic groups, and, what is most depressing, to trust their fellows.

For what have we paid this price? The goal of all the programs is supposed to be to strengthen national security. It is ostrich-like to deny that spies and saboteurs exist and that the government must make strenuous efforts to frustrate them. But we have chosen a terrifying device. No one, I think, claims that the loyalty mills have caught a single spy.

Political tests have so far been applied to circumscribe the liberties of government employees with a Communist record or with a radical record that, any time in the last generation, could easily be smirched by Communist associations. But there is nothing to prevent the Communist smear from being spread thinner and thinner. Finally it may represent only a token allegation whenever a majority, or a resolute minority, is bold enough and illiberal enough to take hold of the existing loyalty machinery and use it without restraint against its opponents. The djinn is out of the bottle.

Some people still look to the courts to rub their lamp and dispel the monster. The judicial record to date on the issues should dispel the hope. Fear of communism, or, as Arthur Sutherland has shrewdly suggested, anger at communism, has provided the driving force for these programs. One can only hope that it will abate before we have got too used to having a djinn to do our bidding.

A recent modest request by the Civil Service Commission for legislative assistance illustrates this last point. There has been a long and obscure struggle within the government over the control of the hiring and firing of hearing examiners. The Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 confirmed their quasi-judicial status and provides that they can be removed only "for good cause." The commission would like Congress, please, to relax this requirement. It has had loyalty complaints about some of the examiners, but its hands are tied. Why? Because of some troublesome constitutional rights. "Good cause" means that hearing examiners are entitled to due process of law.

Labor and Civil Liberties

BY ARTHUR EGGLESTON

THERE are those who say that the effect of the witch hunt on the learned professions, the schools, the churches, the universities, the courts, and the institutions which concern themselves with things of the spirit and intellect may be even more serious in the long run than on the labor movement. That may be true, but if the labor movement is destroyed, there will be no "long run." It is important, moreover, for professional and academic people to understand that the organized-labor movement stands between them and the abyss of complete conformity and spurious scholarship, if only through sheer weight of numbers, its strategic position, and its traditional concern for civil liberties and the general welfare.

What is the proof of these statements? Simply this: the employer groups who are behind the Taft-Hartley, Smith, and McCarran acts, the new anti-labor proposals in Congress, the assault on minimum-wage laws, the witch hunts on all levels and in all segments of society are not interested in ideologies or abstruse theories. No high principles, for example, prevent them from granting the union shop to one union on Monday and withholding it from another on Tuesday.

Their attack on the labor movement, using the witch hunt to divide and confuse it, is right out of the adding machine. If their calculations had shown them in 1945 that by continuing the labor practices of the New Deal they would have been able to increase net profits, life in America would have been very different these last few years. But the adding machine told them that if labor improved its relative and absolute economic position, profits and dividends would shrink. And if, as they thought in 1945, and are beginning to think again in 1952, a depression is on its way, there will have to be a concentrated drive to weaken the bargaining power of labor—to prepare for wage cuts, mass lay-offs, and the speed-up.

From 1945 on it has been war—against all labor organizations. No matter how "anti-Communist" the union and its leaders may be, no matter how actively they support the defense program or the Administration, when it comes to cents-per-hour, contract benefits, and labor's rights to an equal voice in determining wages and conditions, the war is against all unions. Effective unions and leaders can never "purge" themselves unless they allow themselves to be captured, neutralized, or destroyed.

The witch hunt is a tested device. The first recorded use of the "foreign-agent" theory of labor troubles was in Boston in the 1820's. Carpenters struck for the ten-hour day. The master-employers could not believe "this project to have originated with any of the faithful and industrious Sons of New England, but are compelled to consider it an evil of foreign growth."

So it is today. Under the guise of rooting out "foreign agents," the drive got under way in 1947 with the loyalty "purge" of government employees a year after the United States Chamber of Commerce suggested that this might be necessary. Then came the Chamber's demand for publication of a list of "Communist-controlled front organizations and labor unions"—a suggestion now being seriously considered by the labor-management subcommittee of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. But the real drive was foreshadowed in a report of the Chamber early in 1947 on Communists within the labor movement, which predicted: "It is probable that the Eightieth Congress will modify the Wagner act so that employers can work more effectively and without fear of law violation with American-minded employees in opposing Communists within the labor movement." Congress got the point immediately and in June, 1947, passed the Taft-Hartley act.

So the witch hunt, which began with "foreign agents," is being extended to cover liberals of all shades of economic and political belief. Those who do not conform must be barred from factories, business offices, schools, colleges, government, the entertainment world—in short, from their jobs. The Chamber of Commerce is behind this suggestion, too.

ARTHUR EGGLESTON served as labor reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle for several years, received a Nieman Fellowship at Harvard, and was formerly Chief, Press Branch, Information Control Division, American Military Government in Germany.

Congress is acting promptly. The Senate labor-management subcommittee, headed by Hubert Humphrey, is considering the best methods of "ridding unions of Communist-domination," without, as Secretary of Labor Tobin puts it, "injecting the government too far into the regulation of the internal affairs of unions." It is getting helpful advice on how to deprive members of accused unions of their jobs. James B. Carey, head of the C. I. O. International Union of Electrical Workers, which is fighting one of the independent left-wing unions, the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, does not favor new legislation to bar Communists from union offices. But he likes the method used by the Atomic Energy Commission, which simply refused to allow companies working on its materials and supplies to deal with the U. E. This method, it seems clear, could easily be used by other government procurement agencies.

THIS is not an isolated case. Albert Epstein, a labor economist, told the Humphrey Committee: "The problem of civil liberties is not involved since it is already public policy to disestablish company-dominated unions and one could hardly contend that a Communist-dominated union should enjoy any more privileges than are allowed to a company-dominated union. It is clear that we are dealing in an area where government intervention is accepted and proper."

Members of a union choose their officers; employers impose both leaders and union on employees in the case of company-dominated unions. There is no similarity between the two situations. Neither the Communist nor the Republican Party imposes Harry Bridges on the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union. The members elect him by secret ballot and can remove him at any time by recall proceedings which can be instituted by only 20 per cent of the members. Yet the National Labor Relations Board told the Humphrey Committee that since the C. I. O. Steel Workers have barred Communists from holding office, Congress can bar Communists from holding union office. No doubt the board would argue that because the C. I. O. convention expelled a number of unions, Congress can expel a number of unions from the C. I. O.

Benjamin C. Sigal, attorney, wants government procurement agencies to set up tripartite boards to investigate charges of communism against unions and leaders and withhold contracts from firms which continue to deal with unions found to be dominated by Communists. Sigal, who has represented a number of unions, including the United Shoe Workers, recently learned what it was like to be on the receiving end of the witch hunt. He and John Brophy, C. I. O. members of the Wage Stabilization Board, were "Red-baited" by Representative Richard B. Vail at a recent public hearing of the House Labor Committee, as the chairman listened without objection and the other committeemen, including some "friends of labor," maintained an embarrassed silence. Both men, of course, denied the charges. So it goes. The purgers are purged and then the purgers of the purgers are purged.

DO THESE examples indicate that division and confusion have gone so far that labor leaders have lost their grip on reality? No. A number of sane voices are raised now and then in protest, and if the trend observable in recent conventions is an indication, the heyday of the witch hunt in the labor movement is over.

An outstanding recent instance of this trend was the strong stand which Hugo Ernst, general president of the A. F. of L. Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, took in defense of Abram Flaxer's refusal to turn over membership lists of the United Public Workers to the McCarran Committee. Ernst did this because, he said, "if we don't rise up to defend ourselves against these violations of our basic rights, we are certain in the end to pay heavily for precedents now being set at the expense of the 'untouchables.'" He cited, too, with approval the protest made by Charles MacGowan, president of the A. F. of L. Boilermakers Union, and Dan Tobin, president of the A. F. of L. Teamsters, against the Supreme Court decision upholding a Taft-Hartley act $750,000 damage suit against the I. L. W. U. Both leaders are ultra-conservative, but as MacGowan said, the fact that the union involved was considered to be "Communist-led does not change the fact that if they can legally do it to that organization, they can likewise impose it on the most conservative labor organization."

A few sane voices were raised, too, before the Humphrey Committee recently. Joseph Curran, president of the C. I. O. National Maritime Union, bluntly told the committee: "Unions in a free country should be permitted to take their own action to keep their house in order. Repressive legislation cannot help. There already exists enough law to protect our country against treason, etc. Committees should examine into the questions on which Communists thrive, discrimination, slums, and so forth, with a view to helping to stamp out violations of democratic ideals."

William Green, president of the A. F. of L., also opposed legislation to deal with Communists in the labor movement. Let the movement handle the problem, he said. "It would be extremely difficult," he told the committee, "to prove that members in a labor union are Communists, to establish beyond peradventure of a doubt that members of a labor union or those who are members and dominate a labor union are Communists."

Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O. and of the United Steel Workers, termed the committee's apparent move to pass laws which would intervene in trade-union elections "unnecessary and unwise." He said:

As a basic philosophy, we in the C. I. O. believe that the right of American workers to choose their own collective-bargaining representatives is as fundamental to our democratic way of life as the right to speak, to worship, and to assemble freely with one's fellow-men. Encroachments upon this fundamental right to choose collective-bargaining representatives should never be undertaken except after a showing that such encroachments are vitally necessary to our national safety. We do not believe any such showing has been made. We believe that if the government undertakes to determine what unions can represent workers in this country, it will have embarked upon the long trail toward government control of unions.

J. B. S. Hardman, veteran labor editor, warned the Humphrey Committee, "not many will buy anti-unionism disguised as anti-communism—nor will union members accept ineffectual union leadership merely because it is attired in anti-Communist battle dress." "Unions," he added, "do not seem to respond easily to compulsion. Legislation, and likewise the courts, proved unable to check unionism when that was the objective in the early days of the Republic. They succeeded only in making union advance painful, halting, and more costly." That is a delightful reminder to the labor movement, which sometimes becomes pessimistic, and to its attackers, who are sometimes too optimistic, that the movement has more vitality than appears on the surface.

Of all the testimony concerning the latest phase of the witch hunt against labor which was introduced before the Humphrey Committee, the most revealing was given by L. R. Boulware, vice-president of General Electric, and Gwilym A. Price, president of Westinghouse. These were not off-the-cuff statements, but formal responses of two key industrial executives to a policy question posed by the committee. Boulware is one of the newer militant and surprisingly frank industrialists who have to deal with labor organizations but don't like them and don't pretend that they do. He starts off by saying: "Concern for the national security in this area [presumably electrical manufacturing] involves necessarily the consideration of some possible limitation on free choice of representatives by employees." He wants Congress to use its full powers to hunt Communists out of labor unions, to identify and expose them, to place Communist-dominated unions on "subversive" lists and thus remove the possibility that strikes for "political" purposes will be called. But here is his dilemma:

In practice, however, it is not only difficult to determine what strikes are "political," but we would hardly feel justified in identifying unions as being Communist-dominated merely because they call or support strikes in defense plants. Certainly in the present defense period, the various anti-Communist or right-wing unions are at least neck and neck with any left-wing unions—publicly suspected of subversive tendencies or dangers—in their threatened or actual interruption of critical defense production in our own atomic, steel, electronics, and aircraft plants.

Our own actual day-to-day negotiations and other such governmentally compelled relationships have not provided us with any conclusive evidence for our reliably and authoritatively determining that one or more of these unions were in actual fact under Communist domination. In certain anti-Communist unions, we so often find ourselves dealing with substantially the same leaders in a new role who only yesterday and for years past were in the camp they now denounce.

Now it comes! How lasting is conversion? What does it profit a right-winger if he used to be a left-winger? And how do you tell whether he's a right-winger who used to be a left-winger or a left-winger posing as a right-winger? "It is our impression," says Boulware, "that the employees and the country at large are entitled to know authoritatively who are the leaders who have shifted for reasons of internal union expediency or, more important, who are agents of new infiltration of the reformed group."

And then he levels on the whole basis of the witch hunt without realizing that he is giving the show away:

One of the criteria we hear most frequently urged—for use as positive proof of Communist Party membership or other such dangerous association—is sworn testimony before the Un-American Activities Committee or other Congressional committees. But we have never been able to convince ourselves that we could determine what unions or individuals were Communists merely upon the existence of such testimony, for the reason that we did not believe that we were qualified to determine the . . . trustworthiness of the individuals who testified.

It seems to us to be obvious that individual employers such as we, cannot and should not make the determination as to what unions are led by Communists even on the basis of sworn testimony, for the reason that some of those union leaders who are now most avowedly anti-Communist have, in fact, been identified by testimony under oath as having been at one time members of the Communist Party. For example, there is testimony under oath before the House Un-American Activities Committee in October, 1939, that Mr. James B. Carey, secretary of the C. I. O. and now president of the International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers (C. I. O.), who is quite vocally opposed to communism and Communists, was a member of the Communist Party. From anything we know, we should think that such a statement was inaccurate in the extreme.

Obviously anti-communism, no matter how loud, is not enough. If you still continue to represent a union which presses for increased wages, benefits, pensions,

Next in importance to personal freedom is immunity from suspicions and jealous observation. Men may be without restraints upon their liberty; they may pass to and fro at pleasure: but if their steps are tracked by spies and informers, their words noted down for crimination, their associates watched as conspirators, who shall say that they are free? . . . The freedom of a country may be measured by its immunity from [espionage]. Rulers who distrust their own people must govern in a spirit of absolutism; and suspected subjects will be ever sensible of their bondage.—May's "Constitutional History of England."

seniority—for all the things that interfere with an employer's unilateral determination of his workers' wages and conditions—you're from the other side of the railroad tracks. Incidentally, Mr. Boulware, who wants the government to prepare blacklists and void union elections, gives as support for his recommendation his view that the left-wing unions were expelled, "not because they were found to constitute a danger or threat to the country, but chiefly because they had refused to follow the political and other policies which had been adopted and endorsed by the C. I. O."

Mr. Price, head of Westinghouse, doesn't express as many doubts about what to do as Boulware does. He has a sort of "germ theory" to apply to labor leadership: "Active participation by an individual in the affairs of a union found to be Communist-dominated should create a presumption that the individual is a Communist supporter, and that presumption should taint other labor organizations with which the individual becomes associated. . . . The active participants in the affairs of Communist-dominated unions should bear that stigma with them wherever they go." But sometimes Communists deliberately refrain from taking office so they can operate under cover. Or they actively oppose the union leadership. Therefore, government must investigate everybody in the union, officials and members. And any "interested party," including employers and rival unions, should be able to initiate investigations of individuals and should be free from libel and slander charges. In addition, employers should be permitted to suspend individuals whom the employer has accused.

Well then, what are the witch-hunters up to? Are they worried about Communists and foreign agents or are they worried about so many cents per hour, vacations with pay, pension plans, and the like? Listen to Mr. Boulware. Recently he testified that the attitude of several anti-Communist unions in wage negotiations with General Electric "is just as much help to Joe [Stalin] as if these union officials were, in fact, Communist agents." And to which unions was he referring? The conservative and anti-Communist A. F. of L. International Association of Machinists, the anti-Communist C. I. O. United Automobile Workers, the anti-Communist A. F. of L. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the anti-Communist C. I. O. International Union of Electrical Workers. What price the witch hunt?

All these attacks are hopeful signs that the mask will soon be ripped off, that the labor movement may cease to be confused and divided into warring sections which destroy one another. Recent conventions representing nearly three million workers spoke out strongly against the Smith, McCarran, and Taft-Hartley acts, against the McCarran immigration act, against attacks on minimum wages, and against attacks on civil liberties. Frank Rosenblum, vice-president of the C. I. O. Amalgamated Clothing Workers, declares that these measures have "created, in effect, a parallel legal system superseding the Bill of Rights, the Constitution, and our traditional body of law. . . ."

THERE are other equally hopeful indications that opposition to the witch hunt with its "parallel" system of law is mounting. Under a Presidential Executive Order of October 12, 1950, the Coast Guard has been screening the nation's waterfronts and ships. At first the longshoremen and seamen accepted the screening in good faith as a necessary part of what was termed a "port-security program." But evidence has been growing that it is being used to bar from the docks men with militant trade-union backgrounds.

The contention of the maritime workers who have been "screened" off the docks and the ships—and out of their jobs—that the Coast Guard has failed to observe due process in its investigation was recently upheld by Federal Judge John C. Bowen in Seattle. In a decision which is destined, perhaps, to become an important trade-union and civil-liberties precedent, Judge Bowen ruled that "the loyalty-screening proceedings . . . violate the due-process-of-law requirement [of the Constitution] because the defendants are not advised of the nature of the disloyalty charges against them and [are not] given a hearing on those charges before adverse findings are made." This, in effect, is the decision which the United States Supreme Court avoided making in its 4-4 split on the Dorothy Bailey case last year. If upheld, Judge Bowen's ruling will put an end to star-chamber proceedings of this type.

The words of a longshoreman who was screened out of a flour mill by the Coast Guard—not off the ships or the docks but out of a flour mill—are worth recording. After pointing out that screening as practiced by the Coast Guard has been a thought-control and black-listing device, this man remarked: "The real solution lies with the labor movement and with the people in general. It is traditional in America for people to come to the aid of anyone who is being mistreated—once they realize what is going on."

The Witch Hunt and Civil Rights

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

THE past few years have witnessed an anomalous development in the struggle to safeguard human freedoms. Some progress has been noted in the effort to extend civil rights, but serious setbacks have occurred in almost every category of civil liberties. The more obvious this paradox has become, the greater has been the stress placed on the distinction between civil rights and civil liberties—as though it somehow explained the paradox.

The distinction has, of course, some historical basis. Since the passage of the original federal civil-rights act, rights which stem from legislation aimed at preventing discrimination on account of race, creed, or color have been called "civil rights," whereas the basic liberties are those previously sanctioned by the Bill of Rights. Though historically valid, the distinction has been used to create the impression that human rights are adequately protected, when in fact the opposite is true.

Recent events explain the emphasis now placed on the distinction. When President Truman presented his civil-rights program to Congress on February 3, 1948, basing it on the report of his Committee on Civil Rights, he created an issue that was a major factor in his election that fall. But by then the cold war had begun to make serious inroads on civil liberties. Even earlier, in fact (March 22, 1947), the President had signed the executive order creating the federal loyalty program; and it was not long before a marked change was noted in the climate of national opinion. The freedom of public debate and minority dissent which had been allowed with few restraints in the war years began to be sharply curtailed. For example, many outstanding radio commentators with a liberal point of view who had won large audiences during the war found that the networks now had no place for them, and the radio time of the few that were retained was reduced to an insignificant minimum. It also became clear that the people were accepting without question the slanted opinion dealt out to them.

At first the inconsistency of distinguishing between civil rights and civil liberties remained unnoted. The great ferment of the war years about human rights seemed to carry into the post-war period. The cold war even appeared to add impetus to the movement for civil rights. We could hardly continue, many hopefully believed, to sanction racial discrimination at home while bidding for world leadership abroad. But by the end of 1949 disturbing signs had appeared. The joint report on civil rights issued by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the American Jewish Congress for that year called attention to "an ominously increasing recourse to violence by groups intent on maintaining existing discriminatory and racist standards. . . . The opposition to racial equality was able to stymie the federal civil-rights program in the United States Congress so that not a single civil-rights measure was enacted."

In 1949, it will be recalled, occurred the savage Peekskill riots, which began as an "anti-Communist" demonstration but quickly became the occasion for the manifestation of extreme hostility not only to Negroes but also to Jews. Compelling evidence of the same trend may be found in the killing of two unarmed Negroes in Westchester County, New York, by a retired Yonkers policeman and his recent acquittal by an all-white jury. The year 1949 also witnessed the Peoria Street riots in Chicago, which lasted off and on for five days, and the week-long violence in Groveland, Florida, over the alleged rape of a white girl by four Negro youths. Reports of the N. A. A. C. P. and A. J. C. refer to thirty-four Negroes killed in 1949 while "in the custody of the police," to forty-one cases in which Negroes were injured by mobs, to forty-two acts of anti-Semitic violence, and to scores of attacks on Negroes who sought better housing in Chicago, Atlanta, Richmond, Chattanooga, Nashville, Birmingham, and Washington.

THE trend continued the following year. According to the joint report of the N. A. A. C. P. and the A. J. C., "after fighting broke out in Korea, the civil-rights issue rapidly lost ground. It failed to figure in the election of 1950 to anything like the extent it did in 1948." Moreover, "the Eighty-first Congress, which came to office in an election generally regarded as a clear-cut victory for the civil-rights program, belied the promises of both the Democratic and Republican 1948 platforms by failing to enact any major civil-rights measure. The civil-rights issue was no more than a political football." At the same time the outrageous attack on the appointment of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg as Assistant Secretary of Defense indicated how anti-Semites had begun to use the "anti-Communist" sentiment generated by the witch hunt for their own ends.

By 1951 the full impact of the witch hunt on the struggle for civil rights had become apparent. The murder of the Florida N. A. A. C. P. leader Harry Moore and his wife, the Cicero housing riot, and a succession of dynamite bombings in Miami designed to terrorize

Negroes, Jews, and Catholics were a few of many symptoms of the increased tension. In 1951 at least 131 cases of police brutality involving members of minority groups were reported, and 33 Negroes were killed "while in the custody of the police." While the number of lynchings declined in the post-war years, the night-time dynamite bombings greatly increased. Thoughtful citizens could only conclude that the reason for the decrease in the lynching rate was that mobs no longer needed to lynch Negroes—the police killed them "by due process of law." "More disturbing than the resort to violence itself," reads the joint report of the two organizations for 1951, "was the apparent unwillingness or inability of organized government to deal with it. . . . This increasing spread of lawlessness and the use of brutality have consequences far beyond the struggle for civil rights. Human freedom is indivisible, and we cannot advance on one sector of the struggle while we retreat or are forced back in another. The social atmosphere of the past few years has been surcharged with political emotion and, too frequently, with panic."

In an attempt to identify the causes of the retrogression noted the same report states:

The excesses of many of the loyalty investigations and the unreasonable character of much of the federal and state security legislation have intensified the tendency to identify support of unpopular or controversial causes with subversion. The blacklisting, official or otherwise, of persons suspected of unorthodox opinions or associations has had an intimidating effect. Opposition to segregation or discrimination has too frequently been cited as an indication of disloyalty or unreliability. Thus . . . many persons have refrained or withdrawn from active participation in or identification with the cause of civil rights.

The direct effect of the loyalty program on the struggle for civil rights is clearly shown in the accounts of loyalty hearings. For example, among the questions asked to determine loyalty have been these: "Did you ever write a letter to the Red Cross about the segregation of blood?" "Do your convictions about equal rights for all races and classes extend slightly beyond the normal feelings of the average individual?" One Loyalty Board member said: "Of course the fact that a person believes in racial equality doesn't prove that he's a Communist, but it certainly makes you look twice, doesn't it? You can't get away from the fact that racial equality is part of the Communist line." And members have asked: "Do you associate with Negroes? Do you invite Negroes to your home?"

This "fear of the smear" has today become a major deterrent to participation in committees concerned with cases involving civil rights. The knowledge that federal employees, despite civil-service status, have lost their jobs because they contributed to the Scottsboro defense fifteen years ago, has effectively paralyzed the impulse to make similar contributions today.

The "smear" has also a reverse application. When extreme left-wing elements have displayed an interest in a particular civil-rights case, liberals have shied away. On the other hand, when liberals have taken the initiative and organized a defense committee, they have frequently been so fastidious about their associates and so concerned with keeping their committees or picket lines "pure" that little else has been accomplished.

The consequences of this disgraceful internecine feuding have been tragic. Witness the outcome of the chief causes célèbres in the past half-dozen years: Willie McGee, the Martinsville seven, the Trenton six, the Groveland case, the Cicero riots, the Cairo bombings, and the murder of Harry Moore. In the Groveland and Moore cases, where the facts were especially shocking, the sponsorship of the protest was impeccable, but no national or international action of significant proportions has been organized after six months, and neither the state nor the federal government has announced any clue to the identity of the perpetrators of the Moore bombings.

THE failure to break through the divisive walls of prejudice and partisanship is not to be explained solely in terms of the sins and shortcomings of the leftists. Sooner or later the advocacy of civil rights was bound to reach a point where it ceased to be intellectually fashionable. Even now the struggle is being conducted on the assumption that full equality can be won for minorities without substantial changes in the political and economic status quo. But it is impossible to achieve fair employment practices without at the same time being seriously concerned about full employment. Nor can segregation be abolished in the public schools of the South without a great expansion of existing school facilities. Paradoxically, the so-called progress that has been made in civil rights has contributed to the impasse we now face. It is one thing to have brought about the admission of a few Negro students to a state-supported law school; but a new problem arises when we attempt to use this precedent to compel admission of Negro students on a non-segregated basis to the public graded schools of a state. The Clarendon County, South Carolina, decision is a case in point.

The present impasse in the struggle to enact a civil-rights program has become a source of acute embarrassment to those who conduct American foreign policy. Every act of racial violence undermines the prestige of the United States. Not only do our spokesmen at the United Nations find it difficult to offset the damage, but the same forces that block the civil-rights program in Congress intimidate those who protest before the U. N. Under the lash of McCarthyism many formerly militant American spokesmen now hesitate to support humanrights declarations in the Assembly which they formerly sponsored or initiated. At the same time the Administration has increasingly sought to use minority spokesmen—American Negroes, for example—to explain domestic Jim Crow practices and defend American racial policies. To the extent that minority representatives have cooperated in this endeavor, minority protest against discrimination has been weakened in the United States.

Since 1949 it has indeed become increasingly clear that the civil-rights program cannot be enacted as long as the witch hunt goes on. It is folly to think that any major civil-rights legislation can be enacted by a Congress that has approved the McCarran immigration act. On the other hand, the moment the demand for full civil equality begins to find expression in independent political action, the struggle for civil rights will become one with the struggle to maintain civil liberties. At this point the protagonists of civil rights will either be smeared as Reds or threatened with legal action as disturbers of the peace. For example, just as in Chicago the first indictments in the Cicero housing riots were returned not against the rioters but against those responsible for the presence of a Negro tenant in the project, so in Cairo, Illinois, the leaders of the movement to eliminate a Jim Crow school were indicted. That both indictments were later dismissed is of secondary importance.

Civil liberties and civil rights are not separable. One cannot be achieved while the other is denied. Indeed, the most important item on the agenda of organizations concerned with civil rights should now be to bring the witch hunt to a speedy end. This is not to say that in the field of civil rights token concessions will not be granted; they may in fact be granted as a means of dividing the forces which if united might terminate the witch hunt. But any concessions granted by the witch hunters will be subject to the implied condition that minority groups continue to talk about civil rights, not civil liberties, and agree to support the cold war.

In short, the witch hunt threatens to retard the movement for both civil rights and civil liberties for a long time unless there is early and widespread realization, particularly among minority groups, of the truth pointed out by Walter White, executive secretary of the N. A. A. C. P., and David Petergorsky, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, that "human freedom is indivisible."

The Public Schools Retreat from Freedom

BY GOODWIN WATSON

A PICTURE of what has happened to educational freedom in the period of general reaction since the death of President Roosevelt can best be seen in perspective. From the earliest days of public education communities have often made special demands on their teachers: church attendance, Sunday School teaching, celibacy, no dancing, no smoking, no card playing, no drinking, no cosmetics or bobbed hair. There have been epidemics of loyalty laws during or after each major war—1862-67, 1919-23, as well as since 1945. The depression decade, 1929-39, intensified both the criticism of our social order and the consequent curbs on such utterances. Almost every convention of teachers was then discussing issues which today would be regarded by even the leading academic organizations as dangerously subversive. But at the same time restraints and attacks on educational freedom were multiplying.

Attacks on schools, curbs on teachers, and purges of texts are an old story. But during the past half dozen years, as the social pendulum has swung to the right throughout the Western or "free" world, there have been five significant changes in the nature of the problem of preserving educational freedom.

1. Established policy.

The sporadic incidents of repression which occurred during the New Deal and earlier have become organized and accepted public policy. Restraints once limited to certain localities are now the law of the land.

The number of states with one or more laws designed to assure teacher "loyalty" and freedom from "subversive" tendencies has grown to thirty-three. Twenty-six now require "oaths," despite increasing evidence that such tests of orthodoxy are worthless as security measures. Massachusetts has required a loyalty oath since 1935; only three employees have refused to sign and they were all conscientious persons of undoubted loyalty. Opposition to the oath requirement at the University of California was headed by Edward Tolman, a psychologist of unimpeachable character and patriotism who well merited the honorary degree Yale gave him in recognition of his leadership in the cause of freedom.

Maryland's Ober law, enacted in 1949, is one of the most sweeping efforts to curb "subversives": to become or to remain a member of a subversive organization is a felony; the public schools must bar from employment anyone who "aids, . . . advises, or teaches by any means any person . . . to overthrow, destroy, or alter . . . the constitutional form of the Government of the United States or of the State of Maryland . . . by revolution, force, or violence, or who is a member of a subversive organization." Pennsylvania's Pechan act, like the Ober law, requires that all public employees sign an oath. Here again the few "screened" by the oath test turned out to be highly valued and respected public servants.

The Feinberg law enacted in New York calls upon the Regents to promulgate a list of subversive organizations and requires dismissal of any teacher who belongs to them. When the Supreme Court sustained this law in February, 1952, John O'Donnell exultingly proclaimed in his column in the New York Daily News, "Guilt by association is now the law of the land." In his dissenting minority report Justice Douglas warned: "The law inevitably turns the school system into a spying project. . . . The principals become detectives; the students, the parents, the community become informers. . . . It produces standardized thought, not the pursuit of truth."

Even before the Feinberg law was upheld, New York's Superintendent of Schools William Jansen had used his power to remove teachers for "misbehavior and unfitness" and to suspend on charge of "insubordination" and "conduct unbecoming a teacher" those who resisted his inquiries into their past political affiliations, their attendance at meetings, their contributions, their friends, and their libraries. Teachers with a record of many years of excellent service were removed by procedures which offered few legal safeguards for the suspects and were unrelated to anything they were alleged to have said or done in the classroom or with their students. Similar actions have been reported from Philadelphia; Silver Spring and Chevy Chase, Maryland; Arlington, Virginia; Honolulu, T. H., and other cities.

What has been the effect of bans against Communists upon the freedom of non-Communist teachers? This is a critical question with far-reaching implications. One faction holds that successful attacks on Communists encourage reactionaries to make more vigorous attacks upon the next group: "fellow-travelers," "Socialists," "pinks," "progressives," "New Dealers," "liberals," and finally anyone who opposes McCarthyism. Another holds that once the real (i.e., "Commie") subversives are ousted, a better and stronger defense can be made for the freedom of the remaining teachers. The course of events seems to support the first thesis. The battle to remove the tiny number of Communist teachers has been pretty well won but the furor is not subsiding. The post-war witch hunt is seeking more victims. Eleanor Dushane was suspended in Buffalo (later reinstated by court action) on charges the gravest of which was announcing to her class a lecture by Max Lerner. Mobs demonstrated in Gregg Township, Indiana, against School Principal William Lewis and forced him out of his job, although his refusal to salute the flag (he stood at attention while pupils saluted) stemmed not from communism but from his religious beliefs. The two teachers, Eugene Leroy Mercer, Jr., and Paul W. Goulding, dropped on April 1, 1952, for refusal to sign the Pennsylvania oath were Quakers and neither had been charged with any Communist connections. None of the Pasadena board members who fired Superintendent Willard Goslin really believed that he was then or had ever been a member of the Communist Party or any other group committed to violent overthrow of the government. Frederick G. Cartwright's attempt to fire five Englewood teachers was not based on evidence that these teachers were or had been party members. Similar attacks in Port Washington, New York; San Angelo, Texas; Ferndale, Michigan; Montgomery County, Maryland; Arlington, Virginia; and Denver, Colorado, were aimed not at Communists but at persons vaguely called "subversive."

John T. Flynn's tirade in the Reader's Digest attacked educators who have been as vehemently anti-Communist as he is. When the National Society of Sons of the American Revolution declares that "subversive textbooks are in general use in the public schools of most of the states," it does not mean that these books are instruments of the Communist Party; it means only that its spokesman finds passages which he considers radical. Dr. Corliss Lamont reported recently (New York Times, April 6, 1952) that a twelve-year-old girl had been reprimanded by her teacher for quoting in her paper on American foreign policy a statement by that famous old subversive Herbert Hoover. The evidence that present curbs spread beyond the debatable "Communist" issue is overwhelming.

2. Subsidized attacks.

A second development of the past seven years has been increasingly effective organization of the forces opposed to freedom in education. In an unusual Publisher's Introduction to "This Happened in Pasadena," a spokesman for the Macmillan Company writes: "It is a fact that certain forces, vicious, well-organized, and coldly calculating, would like to change the face of education in the United States." The best-known is the National Council for American Education, run by Allen A. Zoll, who claimed a "large part" in engineering the ousting of Pasadena's very competent school superintendent, Goslin, and referred to "the millions of pieces of literature we have sent out during the past two and a half years to tens of thousands of molders of public opinion."

Zoll's N. C. A. E. is not alone in its efforts. One also finds the Guardians of American Education, Inc.; the Institute for Public Service; the Committee on Education of the Conference of Small Business Organizations (their publication is Mrs. Lucille Cardin Crain's Educational Reviewer); the American Education Association, headed by Milo F. McDonald; the Committee for Constitutional Government, founded by Frank E. Gannett and led by Edward A. Rumely; the American Parents Committee on Education, headed by Merwin K. Hart; the Church League of America, run by George Washington Robnett; the Constitutional Educational League, piloted by Joseph P. Kamp, who edited the pro-Nazi Awakener; the Employers' Association of Chicago, with Gordon L. Hosteller as executive vice-president; the Foundation for Economic Education; the Friends of the Public Schools of America, Inc., under retired Major General Amos A. In addition there are numerous local groups.

A slick scheme has been evolved which usually works like a charm. A local committee is formed, with prominent names to screen the actual agitator. The starting point is any dissatisfaction with the schools, and there is always plenty to be found. Taxpayer organizations want costs cut down. "Americanism" committees want texts and teachers purged. Clergymen deplore the "godless" curricula. Employers complain that pupils can't spell, are disrespectful, or don't work hard enough. Any

CIVIL RIGHTS IN THE UNITED STATES

By Alison Reppy, Dean, N. Y. Law School

PRICE $4.50

This book constitutes the most intensive coverage ever drawn up concerning the development of civil rights in the United States.

"One is necessarily impressed by the clarity and simplicity of this book, as well as the industry of the writer. Dean Reppy has not only presented the law, but has provided interesting reading both for laymen and lawyers. At the same time the legal problems presented are skillfully analyzed and treated with a measure of judicial impartiality seldom found in dealing with a subject which is as inherently controversial as is the subject of Civil Rights." ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

Innovation in the school program, redistricting to meet population shifts, "social studies," sex education, intercultural education, delayed beginning reading, or study of the United Nations may be played up as an indication that old-fashioned virtues have been lost. Local newspapers seize on the charges and counter-charges, for controversy makes news. Leading citizens make statements and pressure groups are enlisted. Those who defend a modern school program are linked with atheistic communism. Too often the school administration, seeking to restore harmony at any price, accepts the dictatorship of the obstreperous minority.

3. Self-censorship.

The third change—increased precaution against any possible charge of subversion—is a consequence of the growing prestige and power of the witch-hunters.

A Colorado teacher was advised to discontinue a study of the Mexican laborers in beet-sugar fields as "too controversial." A home-economics teacher concluded that a project in which pupils had tested certain advertised brands of household appliances would be criticized by business men and should be dropped. An English teacher found it wise to remove John Steinbeck's books from the literature course. A biology teacher was forbidden by his principal to continue use of the film "Human Growth." A Kansas teacher reports that he interprets the state oath to mean that "a teacher must be thoroughly sold on the American system of free enterprise" and must not support rent control or price control.

While there still are numerous reports of texts being banned—Frank A. Magruder's classic, "American Government," for example, has been dropped by Houston, Texas, and all Georgia schools—the repressive action now affects the stage at which books are being prepared. Publishers take few chances. An editor reported to the United States Conference on UNESCO in 1952 that D. C. Heath has been requested by one school board to omit from its textbooks any reference to the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. Manuscripts intended for school texts now must be censored in advance of publication by the same type of mind which continues to ban The Nation from New York and Newark school libraries. Speakers proposed for school conventions are checked against "Red" indices and only the "safe" ones are invited. Hence a row such as that raised by trustees over Professor Harold Rugg's speech at Ohio State University, or the controversy caused when Red Bank, New Jersey, canceled its invitation to Professor Theodore Brameld, or when the Englewood, New Jersey, Board of Education barred Mary McLeod Bethune, occurs only when the precautionary process has failed.

4. Faint-hearted defense.

A fourth feature of the present predicament is the pusillanimity of the fight for educational freedom.

Earlier attacks upon educational freedom aroused vigorous and often successful opposition. Seven states introduced an oath of allegiance for teachers during the Civil War period, but in five of the seven, counter-attacks led to repeal. The Lusk laws in New York after World War I were met by a fight which forced their repeal within two years. The "Little Red Rider" in the District of Columbia was thrown out after two years. Ohio's 1919 oath was wiped off the books in 1935.

Valiant struggles for educational freedom still are reported from a few communities—Scarsdale's embattled citizens, strengthened by a remarkable local newspaper, refused to bow to demands from its one-man "Committee of Ten"—but instances of successful resistance are not too numerous. Frequently an effort is made to keep some measure of enlightened education by throwing to the wolves the most contested part of the program—a teacher workshop, a guidance program, a controversial book, or any effort at objective study of Soviet Russia.

When, in 1949, the House of Representatives Committee on Un-American Activities sent to colleges and state education boards questionnaires asking for lists of textbooks, a number of colleges raised a rumpus, but the public-school officials quickly complied. When the N. E. A. Committee on Tenure and Academic Freedom recently polled its 400 advisory members (especially selected because of their concern with educational freedom) only 168 replied, and of these only 3 per cent believed teachers should have more freedom.

When charges of dangerous ideas arise they are no longer met by the answer that in a democracy we are not afraid to examine all sides of controversial issues. The standard defense is now one which accepts the totalitarian assumptions of the witch-hunters and merely insists that no deviant ideas are to be found in the local texts or teachers. This is surrender without a struggle.

5. Religious controls.

A fifth feature of the present disturbed scene is the growing influence of religion in public education. Between 1926 and 1950 the proportion of church members in the population of the United States rose from 46 per cent to 57 per cent, a change which tips the scales noticeably. Parochial schools are expanding. The pressure to bar The Nation from the public schools arose because it published Paul Blanshard's criticisms of the social and political activities of the Roman Catholic church. In January, 1948, the New York City schools banned Dr. Bernhard J. Stern, a lecturer in sociology at Columbia University, from conducting one session in a workshop in Intercultural Education designed as in-service training for teachers. The official explanation was that long before, in a pamphlet no longer in print, Dr. Stern had been critical of established churches.

In 1951-52 the Board of Regents of the State of New York drew up a prayer to be used along with the pledge of allegiance to the flag. One regent stated that the prayer was to be—"only a beginning." The Supreme Court, asked to rule on a New Jersey law requiring Bible reading and the Lord's Prayer, evaded the issue by a most significant ruling (March, 1952) that since the petitioners did not show tangible damage, such as loss of money or property, but claimed merely a violation of spiritual values, rights, and freedom, they had not established a sufficient degree of interest in the case to warrant their suit.

On January 20, 1952, Principal James P. McGeough of East High School, Pawtucket, Rhode Island, suspended one of the student clubs which called itself the UNESCO Thinkers. His reason? A charge by a Catholic paper that UNESCO is "under atheistic control." He was congratulated by the local school committee, the Pawtucket D. A. R., and the Visitor, organ of the Roman Catholic diocese of Rhode Island. Another school administrator objected when the dramatics club planned to present Arnold Bennett's "The Great Adventure," in which two young parsons appear as somewhat humorous characters. "It would never do, even in a friendly way, to ridicule members of the clergy," he said. The play was rewritten to make the humorous characters teachers!

The retreat is not yet a rout. Despite the general acceptance of loyalty oaths, a handful of University of California professors made a stand which has heartened other teachers. The Scarsdale citizens still hold their Thermopylae. Dean Ernest O. Melby of New York University's School of Education has warned that free education "may be destroyed by noisy super-patriots." The Citizenship Education Project conducted at Teachers College, Columbia University, is encouraging high-school pupils to study and to practice democratic citizenship. The National Citizens' Commission for the Public Schools, headed by Roy E. Larsen of Time, Inc., has encouraged local groups of business men to give increased study and support to the public schools, with results still not wholly clear.

The present social context, however, makes the prognosis for the current plague of repression less favorable than it would have been in 1870 or 1920. We now live in an economy which extricated itself from its worst depression only by defense and war expenditures and which depends upon these for continued equilibrium. Our world is pervaded by tension between two great powers, each of which strives to insulate its public from the influence of the other. So many atomic bombs are now ready that even the careful, peaceful obliteration of them would imperil human health on a global scale. The financial burdens in prospect may prove too heavy even for a wealthy nation. Neither insecure rulers nor an anxious public is likely to be tolerant of free minds.

Academic Freedom and American Society

BY H. H. WILSON

OF ALL the civil liberties currently under attack, perhaps the one most seriously threatened is academic freedom. It is important, first of all, to recognize that this latest challenge to the universities cannot be dismissed as merely the most recent manifestation of the anti-intellectual tradition. Nor is it primarily aimed at campus Communists and radicals. It is directed, rather, at academic freedom itself: the right to free inquiry and discussion in the classroom. It demands from the schools not inquiry, but suppression, not discussion but distortion, not, in short, teaching but indoctrination. And it will be satisfied, not when the last Communist is exiled from the schools, but when the last honest seeker after truth is driven out of education.

Unfortunately, however, the cries of the professional school-baiters have spread doubt and confusion among citizens. Many today question the basic tenets of education and the essential functions of teachers. Some seriously wonder whether their offspring should be permitted to spend four impressionable years in the clutches of a university. It may be useful, therefore, to set forth the root principles and assumptions of academic freedom and to examine the threat to our schools.

Few teachers, of course, would argue that freedom to teach, to paraphrase Justice Holmes, is the freedom to shout "Fire!" in a crowded classroom, but beyond that extreme and necessary limit of all freedom, freedom to teach is restrained only by the obligation to search for truth. That obligation, in turn, requires full freedom of discussion in the classroom. The teacher is also entitled to full freedom in research and in the publication of results. The student, at the same time, is entitled to freedom to learn, including the opportunity to read any book and listen to any speaker. Moreover, since both teachers and students are citizens, they enjoy the same rights and have the same obligations as other citizens when they speak, write, and participate as citizens. Finally, the rights and obligations of the teacher suggest that the only legitimate basis for judging him is his performance as an individual and as a teacher. If there is any other test, if, in the words of Robert Hutchins, "we once let go of the Constitution and the law as marking out the area in which a professor is free to operate as a citizen, and of the ability to think independently as establishing the standard he must meet as a scholar, we are lost."

We are similarly lost, Hutchins warns, if we abandon the principle of academic tenure, essentially a device to insure the teacher's role in society. There can be no freedom to teach if thinking is subject to the control of alumni, presidents, trustees, regents, or the public. Thus, after a probationary period teachers should have permanent tenure, with service terminated only for adequate cause and after proper hearing by fellow-teachers. No one denies that mistakes may be made, that some individuals may be falsely accused of the ability or the desire to think. Faculties, however, are better judges of teaching competence than administrators, politicians, or pressure groups.

But teachers are not the only people who have a vested interest in academic freedom and tenure. Society as a whole benefits when the university can provide it with the results of research, discussion, and thinking in all the areas—physical, philosophical, social—that impinge upon human behavior. Primarily, the university "is a center of independent thought," and "a university faculty is a group set apart to think independently and to help other people to learn to do so." On this assumption, society is not well served unless it receives from the teacher an honest report of his findings, based on careful analysis. To the extent that his findings reflect pressure from other men or organizations, or are influenced by the prevailing climate of opinion, society is cheated and weakened. And a society so betrayed, a society in which men cannot or will not think for themselves, is a society that will perish.

By hard experience acquired over hundreds of years we have learned that only under conditions of complete freedom, including economic security for the teacher, can the university perform its social function. Thanks to the Neanderthals of our age, it needs to be reemphasized that academic freedom is not a luxury, not a special privilege for an academic élite, and not a selfish interest of the teacher or university. Rather, academic freedom is an indispensable requirement of a healthy society. Without it society will cease to benefit from new discovery, and the university will cease to function as an educational institution. Finally, since education is absolutely vital to good citizenship in a democracy, to attack education is ultimately to attack and undermine democracy itself.

The attackers assert that the colleges harbor a subversive threat to our institutions, but it should be apparent to all honest observers that the universities are not usually staffed by radicals, innovators, and pioneer thinkers. In fact, more typically the universities, especially in the social sciences, have lagged behind events, and have been chiefly concerned to describe and justify, not analyze and suggest. Indeed, the ordinary pressures from within and without faculties are effective enough in discouraging fresh thinking, proposals, and hypotheses about the nature of society. Characteristically, we have no new ideas—or few that can safely be presented—about wars and depressions, but are surfeited with innovations in treating tropical diseases and splitting the atom. These discoveries are not unimportant, but equal attention should be paid to the social sphere. The danger is not that academic freedom may lead to some questioning of the verities but that teachers will fail to utilize academic freedom to the fullest extent in the posing of challenging analyses of vital problems.

WHEN it comes to the point, many of us do not really believe in education, although as a nation we have placed great emphasis on something we call "education." Thus parents, in general, do not want their offspring educated; they want them trained, or housebroken. Students, in general, do not want an education; they want to acquire salable skills and/or degrees. The majority of teachers do not want to arouse anxiety in either students or parents; they want to survive, and, too often, survival limits the horizons of knowledge from graduate school to emeritus retirement.

As a graduate student the would-be teacher is almost totally dependent on the judgments of his professors, judgments which are too frequently entirely subjective. Then follows the long period of economic insecurity, punctuated by decisions of senior colleagues, which, again, may be subjective. By the time the gantlet has been run, the average teacher has lost the drive and incentive to be even remotely interested in challenging the status quo, and has probably been beaten out of the urge to do creative thinking and research. Geniuses there are, but as Robert Hutchins has noted, they "have had a hard time as professors in America." Most teachers, writes Max Lerner, have lacked "not the freedom to say something, but something to say. . . . The safe course is to be either noncommittal or else the over-emphatic champion of the possessing groups." Thus the whole process constitutes a kind of natural selection by which the safe, the timid, the orthodox—or the indifferent—survive.

Perhaps the most effective device for enforcing orthodoxy and discouraging creativity among teachers is the pressure from colleagues. The casual phrase, "He is unsound," or "He is not scholarly," is often the most powerful and insidious challenge the young teacher has

APPEAL TO AMERICANS

Millions of Negro children in the South attend schools grossly inferior to schools for white children.

This situation has had legal sanction, despite the Fourteenth Amendment, ever since 1896. In that year the Supreme Court ruled in Plessy v. Ferguson the doctrine that segregated facilities could be equal. In his great dissent, Mr. Justice Harlan assailed the "separate but equal" idea as a legal fiction, declaring "Our Constitution is color blind."

The N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund has consistently sought to secure equal educational opportunities through scores of actions in the courts. The U. S. Supreme Court has consented to hear in its 1952 Fall term two cases brought by the N.A.A.C.P., which squarely question the right of Kansas and South Carolina to deny Negro pupils the same public education furnished to white children without violating the Constitution.

This is an historic event. These cases challenge the Court to decide whether Negro first-graders may be compelled to walk ten miles to a one-room shanty schoolhouse while white youngsters are taken by bus to modern consolidated schools.

The N.A.A.C.P. is leading victorious attempts to utilize orderly court processes to achieve the promise inherent in democracy. But legal actions require large expenditures. Before these two cases can be argued before the Supreme Court, the N.A.A.C.P. must secure $25,000 to pay expenses for printing the necessary trial records and appeal briefs.

The "Committee of 100" has undertaken to raise this sum within the next two months. This is an unparalleled opportunity to affirm that benefits and responsibilities of our society shall be shared equally by all Americans, whatever their race, creed or color. We need your help.

WITCH HUNTING UNCONSTITUTIONAL? THEN WE'LL FIX THE CONSTITUTION!

This cynical expedient is sought by the leaders of the witch hunt in California.

► On November 4 California citizens will vote on two proposed amendments to the California Constitution. These propositions (now known as ACA 1 and ACA 9) seek, two years after its enactment, to establish the constitutionality of the Levering Act (California's "loyalty oath" law). They blueprint a witch hunt affecting every resident of the state.

► In California, for the first time in any state, the people will vote on McCarthyism. Political leaders everywhere are watching this fateful choice. The future of freedom throughout the nation may be decided in the polling booths of California.

to face. As put most delicately by one university president, "the coercion of sound judgment within the university faculty will always be a corrective influence upon the immature scholar who is inclined to accept untested findings and half-truths." "Coercion" is, indeed, the precise term to use.

Finally, our whole educational system, especially the secondary-school aspect, is only secondarily an institution for encouraging independent thought and for helping students learn to think. Partly because it has been regarded as "America's magic" and open to all, American education has been primarily a social device, a way of stamping "Made in America" on a diverse people, and a means for housebreaking the young. Consequently, it is extremely vulnerable to pressure from those who believe in indoctrination.

BERNARD DE VOTO once classified those opposed to academic freedom as the simple-minded nincompoops and the very clear-minded illegitimates. A third element should be added: an indifferent public composed of those who fail to understand the nature of the educational process and its relation to other essential characteristics of a democratic society. This public failure to understand the nature of education and the function of the university has strengthened the hands of the very clear-minded illegitimates who seek to subvert education for their own ends.

Let us not delude ourselves. Those who are conducting the campaigns today against our schools and colleges are not misguided. They know perfectly well what their goal is: to make a mockery of the democratic process. Specifically, I refer to: (1) Senators McCarran and McCarthy; (2) the (Illinois) Broyles committee; (3) the (Washington) Canwell committee; (4) the Educational Reviewer, edited by Lucille Cardin Crain for the Conference of Small Business Organizations; (5) the National Council for American Education, Allen A. Zoll; (6) the Church League of America, George Washington Robnett; (7) William F. Buckley, Jr., "God and Man at Yale"; (8) all others who adopt the techniques of censorship, repression, and thought conformity for the solution of contemporary problems in public education and elsewhere.

Let's face it: these individuals and groups do not believe in education but, as revealed by their literature and public statements, in indoctrination. Convinced that they have the truth, their disagreement with our schools and colleges is simply that these institutions do not indoctrinate and propagandize their truth. Although they think that colleges are centers of indoctrination, they do not really object to that. They intend to make certain that it is their particular credo that is indoctrinated. Using words like "freedom" and "individualism," but fundamentally authoritarian and anti-democratic, they have a contemptuous attitude toward human beings and human intelligence. Believing that students are like the children of Hamelin, ready to follow the first Pied Piper who comes along, they are determined to pick the Pied Pipers. And if they succeed, they will force on all of us their corrupt methods and warped values.

We are much concerned today about corruption in Washington and elsewhere, but the really significant corruption in American society is not evidenced by gifts of deep freezes or vacation trips, nor even symbolized by the sacrificial slaughter of innocent mink. The really significant corruption in America is our willingness to pervert both our institutions and our ideals, and to disbelieve in ourselves, in one another, and in the democratic process. In this time of crisis, as the normal pressures in a conservative society are intensified by the cold war, the primitive elements among us seek to capitalize on our individual corruption by manipulating terror, apathy, and distrust. Today they demand control of the schools; tomorrow they will accept nothing less than total power.

THE present international tension makes us dramatically aware of the struggle between nations, but within all societies power is moving from ruling groups to new contenders, and those who wield dominant power are mobilizing for a last-ditch stand against any challenger. It is against this background that the whole issue of academic freedom must be considered. The pressure on the schools from those who would turn us into a nation of mutes and neuters has already produced student apathy toward any kind of political action and a reluctance to write papers on controversial subjects.

No wonder Time can report that "the most startling fact about the younger generation is its silence"; that intellectually our young people are "a bit stodgy . . . mild, and safe," that they "seem to have no militant beliefs. They do not speak out for anything." The report concludes: "Many students and teachers blame this lack of conviction on fear—the fear of being tagged 'subversive.' Today's generation, either through fear, passivity, or conviction, is ready to conform."

An even more serious state of affairs is revealed by the recent Purdue Opinion Panel Poll of 3,000 students carefully selected from 15,000 high-school respondents in all parts of the United States. The poll showed that 49 per cent believe that large masses of the people are incapable of determining what is and what is not good for them—a massive rejection of the theory of democratic government; 75 per cent state that obedience and respect for authority are the most important virtues that children should learn; 42 per cent believe that we should firmly resist any attempts to change the American way of life; and 58 per cent agree that police may be justified in giving a man the "third degree" to make him talk.

Clearly, 100 per cent American, native-born authoritarianism is already far advanced. It is no figment of Orwell's imagination that we are becoming, as a nation, a "captive audience," slaves of the demigods and demagogues of the status quo. As John Jay Chapman said, "An age of corruption destroys faith. This is the essential injury. This is the disease."

Style Note: The Campus Strait-Jacket

BY KALMAN SEIGEL

AMERICAN education, often a target of attack, is now facing perhaps its most serious onslaught of intellectual vigilantism. The campaign is being waged on every educational level, and its deleterious effects have made themselves felt not only among teachers and students but in the wider arena of the community. Its net cumulative effect is a mood of fear and distrust in college faculties that has inevitably filtered down to the undergraduates, narrowing their traditionally unlimited area of thought and inquiry. Yet nowhere is it more important, as Dr. Alvin Eurich, former president of the University of the State of New York, has said, "to cherish and protect freedom of inquiry, thought, and speech than on college campuses—the training grounds for some 2,500,000 future citizens who must understand the values and responsibilities of democracy."

The present attack is not a new phenomenon, nor is it much different from the general pattern of conformity that is being forced upon the motion-picture industry, the stage, radio, and television. It has been gaining impetus in the last five years, fed by an unwholesome fear of subversion that assumes that ignorance of an idea is the best protection against it.

The current press makes gloomy reading as it details case after case of interference and pressure from political or super-patriotic groups organized as "citizens' committees." This meddling by special-interest groups—their sudden concern for education cannot be called anything but meddling by design—has made teachers and students unwilling to discuss in the classroom such controversial topics as separation of church and state, communism, and race relations.

KALMAN SEIGEL, a New York reporter, won the George Polk Memorial Prize (for education reporting) for a series of articles in 1951 based on a survey of freedom of thought and speech on seventy-two major college campuses.

In some instances this intellectual timidity is nothing tangible; in others it is more definite. Discussions with students leaders, teachers, and administrators—part of a survey of seventy-two major colleges made in 1951—disclosed that among students this trend toward self-censorship and caution largely took these forms:

1. A reluctance to speak out on controversial issues in and out of class.
2. A reluctance to handle currently unpopular concepts even in classroom work.
3. An unwillingness to join student political clubs.
4. Neglect of humanitarian causes because they may be suspect in the minds of politically unsophisticated officials.
5. An emphasis on lack of affiliation.
6. An unusual amount of serio-comic joking about this or that official investigating committee "getting you."
7. A shying away, both physically and intellectually, from association with the words "liberal," "peace," "freedom," and from classmates with progressive ideas.
8. A concentration on college problems to the exclusion of broader current questions.

While some students say they feel no constraint about speaking out on controversial subjects, many of them privately admit hesitation to "sound off" and are cautious about what they say and where they say it. Among students who plan careers in government or engineering there has been a general avoidance of controversy because of investigations and loyalty checks. One student editor reported that agents of the FBI were constantly inquiring about students who apply for government jobs, and that some graduate schools with government-classified projects were extremely leery of accepting students who had advocated "unpopular" ideas. The result has been sufficiently marked to bring from Justice William O. Douglas the accusation that youth is "holding its tongue" and sitting out the revolt against orthodoxy.

SINCE independence of mind is essential to students in a free society, the growing conformity and the limitation of the areas in which ideas can find free expression are negating the business of a university, which educators maintain is education by differences of opinion. Students are playing it safe because instructors are doing likewise. "The willingness of instructors to express their own honest viewpoint," to quote from one undergraduate paper, "has been slowly ebbing. Evidence in support of this statement cannot be given in black and white. It can only be felt in the classroom." "Girls are becoming afraid to advocate the humanitarian point of view," writes Dean Millicent C. McIntosh of Barnard College, "because it has been associated with communism. The most fearless will not be influenced, but the middle group is made to feel the confusion and fear involved in the 'obscurantism' that is McCarthyism." The Barnard placement director reports that "liberal" is a "poisonous word" to many would-be employers, who regard the "liberal girl" as an "obstructionist" and "organizer against employer interests."

The narrowed areas of free discussion and inquiry, with their characteristic moral equivocation, are an outgrowth of the developing cold war during the past five years—a half-decade in which demands that teachers sign loyalty oaths, the screening of speakers, visiting scholars, and graduate students, and the banning of critical texts grew at an alarming rate. The wariness and apathy are not solely the product of the current "hysteria," or as a majority of students and faculty put it, "the pressures generated by Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin." This is an important factor, but much of the wariness and apathy stems from the "times"—the imminence of the draft, the fear and uncertainty in national life, and a fatalistic conviction that little can be done on the campus to affect international developments.

The pattern of the attack on American education today is quite different from that directed against American schools, teachers, and students twenty-five or fifty years ago. The present assault is national in scope, uniform in procedure, and apparently initiated by a few powerful groups. Earlier in the century the attacks

what it means

ONCE there was no such word as sandwich. Until the Earl of Sandwich had the wonderful idea of putting some fine morsel between two pieces of bread. Once there was no such word as thurber, until Mr. James Thurber thought of a wonderful way of writing that is humorous and wise and beautiful and—well, in a word, thurber. His new book, THE THURBER ALBUM, is the first big thurber book in three years. The definitions we have underlined in the reviews that follow will give you some idea of what the new word means:

THE NEW YORK TIMES: "The gravely quiet prose becomes as unexpectedly conquering as a second vodka martini or maybe a third. Somewhere, some time, some person is sure to say of this book 'Thurber has done it again.' So, let's say it now and get it over with."

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE: "A picture gallery of American characters that will fill those of us who are as old as the century with nostalgic happiness and will charm the very young as tales of some far off, fantastic, utterly delightful world. Everything he mentions I recognize instantly, not by its contours or its setting, but by the touch of the uncanny, the blatant impossibility, and the wild humor that informs it all."

CHICAGO SUN TIMES: "What a joy it is to greet this new collection by wonderful James Thurber, to savor mellow memories of his boyhood and young manhood. All is told in Thurber's individual way, with tender wit. Thurber at his nostalgic best is one of the delights of our time, and this is Thurber at his nostalgic best."

ST. LOUIS POST DISPATCH: "What gives his subjects the appearance of uniqueness is not the result of imaginative retouching but of his ability to detect the freshness and uniqueness of personality in everybody he meets."

THE SATURDAY REVIEW: "Mr. Thurber, more than any writer I know of, living or dead, is able to pass within a single sentence from reality to unreality, from nonsense to the sublime. He does it by a combination of osmosis and lateral passes. A straight line through this Album is about the pleasantest journey I have made in a long, long time."

were isolated, unorganized, and directed against individuals rather than the educational system.

In another area of the war against education community pressures have affected the teaching of current affairs in a large number of American communities. A survey of the nation's schools during the 1948-49 school year by three New York City school teachers under fellowships established by the New York Times and the Board of Education showed that community pressures made teachers of current events tend to deal only with "safe" subjects, prevented students from getting varied sources of information, and discouraged pupils from participating in community affairs.

The abridgment of student editorial freedom by colleges and non-academic authorities has grown in recent years, with a corresponding increase in instances of political censorship. The Harvard Crimson survey of 1951 gave eleven examples of censure of college editors in the 1950-51 school year alone. In the school year ending this month the Crimson found fifty-three cases of violation of academic freedom in twenty-five of the nation's colleges. Another recent development has been the extension of control over what can be heard and read outside the classroom; almost every college campus has had its case of a banned visiting speaker. As Matthew Josephson points out in his article on page 619, the self-appointed pressure groups have also stepped up their drive against alleged subversive material in textbooks.

The end is not yet in sight. But a growing awareness of the danger is now manifest, and protests coupled with pleas for rededication to the ideals of free discussion are gaining in volume and intensity. The admirable statement of the Board of Trustees of Sarah Lawrence College in rejecting the demands of certain pressure groups is a case in point. Another is the action of students on the campus of the University of Buffalo who organized, managed, and financed an all-day conference on civil liberties. Many similar instances might be cited. Prominent members of the educational community have spoken out boldly against attempts at repression, even if not all have been able to match their words with deeds.

American education will lose the vigor and independence that have distinguished it from most foreign educational systems if the present trend to conformity is not halted. Judge Learned Hand's warning makes sense today: "Our dangers, as it seems to me, are not from the outrageous but from the conforming; not from those who rarely and under the lurid glare of obloquy upset our moral complaisance or shock us with their unaccustomed conduct, but from those, the mass of us, who take their virtues and their tastes, like their shirts and their furniture, from the limited patterns which the market offers."

Formula for Success

MOST observers in Washington believe that confirmation [for appointive public office] can be achieved by paying attention to a few simple rules. Among these are the following:

1. Be sure you are for the things that are going to be popular six or seven years from now.
2. Don't join anything, ever.
3. Don't let your wife join anything, either.
4. Don't get involved in foreign-affairs questions at all if you can help it. If you can't help it, back the Monroe Doctrine and the Open Door Policy and be against communism.

5. If you must have political convictions about foreign-policy questions—which is not recommended—make very sure that the President sends your nomination to Capitol Hill at a time when your convictions are popular.

6. Be suspicious of the British. And if you know what they're up to today in northern Rhodesia, all the better.

7. Don't write books.

8. Master various clichés that are popular on Capitol Hill, including the following:

- a. I am for adequate defense, but we must not spend ourselves into bankruptcy.
- b. I am for helping other countries, but they must first prove that they are helping themselves.
- c. America cannot defend the whole world.
- d. Communism is merely socialism in a hurry, and I hate both from the depths of my soul.
- e. I am not and have never been a Communist or a member of any Communist front organization.

9. If possible, be Irish. This pleases Senator Pat McCarran, Democrat, of Nevada.

10. Keep up with the Senate's favorites. A word of praise on your behalf by Bernard M. Baruch, for example, is worth maybe forty votes. Similarly, if you have any friends who are unpopular on Capitol Hill, abandon them, or, better, denounce them publicly.

11. Glorify the days when we had no entangling alliances. This proves you are a "sound fellow," longing for the happy sunlit past.

12. Stay out of the Far East. If you go there, you will be expected to have views on it, and somebody is bound to disagree with any views you have. Ignorance about it, however, is no disqualification.

13. If possible have at least one reformed Communist testify on your behalf, preferably Louis Budenz, former editor of the Daily Worker.

14. Never accept any invitation to any off-the-record meeting at the State Department without finding out first whether Harold Stassen is to be there.—From a story by James Reston, New York Times, October 19, 1951.

SET CONGRESS FREE!

"CONGRESS HAS BECOME A HOSTAGE OF ITS OWN CREATURE—THE HOUSE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE. It is afraid to arrest the Committee's mad course."

—Ex-Attorney General Francis Biddle in "The Fear of Freedom."

WE DID NOT ELECT CONGRESSMEN TO BE JUDGES!

Yet the House Committee has usurped powers of the judiciary, fastening on citizens the stigma of guilt without due process of law.

It created and sustains a nationwide hysteria through the un-American doctrines of GUILT BY ACCUSATION AND GUILT BY ASSOCIATION.

It fosters McCarthyism.

It outrages the American sense of fair play and morality.

It nullifies Amendments 1, 5 and 6 of our Constitution.

It has cost taxpayers $1,627,500 without constructive legislative results.

F. D. R. called the Committee "sordid, flagrantly unfair and un-American."

The AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, long ago, said — "Nothing is so un-American as the Committee's own activities. ... There can be no compromise with the conclusion that it should be wholly abolished."

THE PEOPLE CAN DO IT

RETIRE YOUR CONGRESSMAN if he is a member of the House Un-American Activities Committee.

Martin Dies, knowing his district, did not choose to run again.

J. Parnell Thomas was retired by way of a felony conviction.

Voters have ended the careers of other committee members.

Make membership on the Committee a political "hot seat."

CALIFORNIANS POINT A WAY!

A representative Citizens' Committee has held three enthusiastic rallies, circulated briefs calling for the quashing of subpoenas served upon doctors and lawyers, and is arranging for a public meeting to honor all called.

A series of three ads exposing the record of the House Committee is ready for publication before the next "hearing" in Los Angeles.

Through ads in community papers and by special campaign leaflets assistance is given voters in retiring House Committee Congressmen.

[With the cooperation of the national office of the American Civil Liberties Union, The Nation asked the various state and local correspondents of that organization to send in short reports on the state of civil liberties in their communities. We have selected the following replies for publication here, and shall hope to print others later.—THE EDITORS.]

Pittsburgh

THE present-day search for security against subversion has resulted in the loss of "bread and butter" security for many American citizens in the Pittsburgh area. Alleged Communists have been dismissed from their positions without regard for actual security interests. From day laborers in government service to violinists in the Pittsburgh Symphony, suspected Communists have felt the economic repercussions of the spirit of the times.

This attitude extends to non-Communist individuals with liberal or non-conformist political beliefs. Personnel managers of large industrial concerns, for the most part politically unsophisticated and unable or unwilling to distinguish between Communists and liberals, tend to avoid trouble by denying employment to all whose ideas do not fall into the prevailing political pattern—particularly in the field of scientific research. Especially suspect are members of minority groups, including Negroes, Jews, and persons of Russian or Southern European background.

Only occasionally is it possible to protect the jobs of those who are attacked for their liberal beliefs. Last year a successful fight was made to reinstate in her position as an Assistant District Attorney Mrs. Marjorie Matson, the local representative of the non-Communist American Civil Liberties Union, who had been forced to take a leave of absence as a result of a charge of "Communist tendencies" brought against her by the then Attorney General of Pennsylvania, Charles J. Margiotti.

The economic pressure for political orthodoxy has further expressed itself in the almost universal acceptance, by school teachers and government employees, of the loyalty oath required under a 1951 statute. Not one case of refusal to take the oath has occurred in the Pittsburgh District.

As the spirit of conformity has spread, liberal organizations have, for the most part, lost their backbone. Nowadays, even when a clear-cut issue arises, it is almost impossible to get united community action. Organizations are afraid to work with others for a common objective lest at some later date a cooperating group might be "labeled." A minimum of collective action in the field of civil rights has been preserved through the Allegheny County Council on Civil Rights, which includes more than forty non-Communist civic groups.

Surprisingly enough, the pervasive fear which casts a shadow over liberal activity has not prevented progress from being made in the field of race relations. Under the leadership of the Mayor's Civic Unity Council, increased employment and recreational opportunities have been made available to Negroes. The summer of 1948 saw riots at a city swimming pool when interracial swimming was attempted. A firm stand on the part of the city administration, plus intensive but quiet activity on the part of church groups and others, is opening public facilities to all comers on an equal basis, and we no longer anticipate serious trouble. A local F. E. P. C. ordinance may be passed this year.

In the field of political activity, suspicion and caution are the watchwords. Only in the most intimate groups are politically divergent ideas freely advanced. Public discussion is circumscribed by the fear that an inadvertent statement may result in a listing as a "subversive" by such local guardians of conformity as Americans Battling Communism or the Minute Women.

At the University of Pittsburgh recently, all campus political organizations were banned. Protests brought sufficient relaxation of the rule to permit establishment of Republican and Democratic clubs.

On the other hand, when the Minute Women attempted by a smear campaign to prevent Dr. George S. Counts from speaking at Carnegie Tech, Chancellor Warner spoke up in defense of academic freedom and Dr. Counts delivered an address in defense of democratic freedom of inquiry as opposed to totalitarian (including Communist) conformity.

Despite discouraging aspects, it seems possible that things are looking up a little for civil liberties in the Pittsburgh area. Liberal Democrats in local political offices have minimized rather than contributed to the hysteria of the times. Mayor David L. Lawrence has spoken out courageously in the Matson case and on other civil-rights issues. A number of office holders in the area are members of Americans for Democratic Action.

The most serious damage to civil liberties has come from the Congressional investigations, the federal loyalty program, and the state loyalty act. The last, not content with exacting an oath, provides in addition a procedure for dismissal of government employees on loyalty charges. These influences still predominate and will continue so long as international tension remains unabated.

Chicago

WHAT has the current witch hunt done to civil liberties in Chicago? In the first place, it has made it much more difficult to answer that question. The Communist Party is underground. The other parties of the left are but a whisper.

We find ourselves in a political nightmare. The times call for thoughtful and creative citizenship. The two major parties deal in invective instead of issues. The only other party visible is the Progressive Party, which seems to be a figment in the imaginations of a few die-hard members.

The citizenry knows nothing of the federal loyalty program beyond the fact of its existence. How many it has affected in Illinois is unknown. In the early phases only government workers were under its jurisdiction. Now the program has moved out into private industry. Of the many cases that have come to our attention, all have been "cleared." "Cleared" after months of misery. "Cleared" after the neighbors have been interrogated by "agents."

"Cleared" to about the same degree as the person who returns home from the mental hospital with a statement attesting his sanity. Nothing has appeared in the press to substantiate the claim that we are gaining "security."

The result is the frightening abandonment by the accused of participation in anything that might be considered to be, or likely to be, controversial. Those who know of the fate of their fellow-employees follow suit. In the end there is the silence of fear and compliance. What can we know of the ultimate results?

In the Chicago area particularly organizations are springing up which aim at providing the "Pasadena treatment" for the schools. The diatribes of Allen Zoll and Lucille Crain are circulating in quantity, along with local productions similar to How Red Is the Little Red School House? To date, there have been no overt restrictions of primary- and secondary-school teachers, but the cloud of accusation lowers. Colleges and universities are noticeably sensitive to charges of unorthodoxy.

The 1951 record of the numerous "anti-subversive" bills in the legislature is perhaps the most revealing index of the state of civil liberties in Illinois, and has implications of national significance. In January of 1951 we were told by those presumably in the know that there wasn't a chance of stopping passage of at least several of these bills. It was said that no politician would dare vote against them.

The American Civil Liberties Union developed the first state-wide, all-out campaign against this kind of legislation. Members of the legislature were sensitive to our problem but feared the political consequences of opposition. They were willing to vote against the bills if "a few substantial constituents" asked them to do so; we were able to obtain the requests.

Only one bill, a revised version of Maryland's Ober law, passed the legislature. The measure had a comfortable margin, but when Governor Stevenson vetoed it he was supported by about forty reputable organizations and seventeen of the nineteen newspapers in Illinois that had taken an editorial position on the legislation. Those who hoped the veto would injure the Governor were disgusted to learn that the Executive Mansion had more mail on this veto than on any other matter during the session; twenty-five letters favored the veto for every one that opposed it.

In spite of the serious interracial problems in Chicago, where the Negro population is growing at the rate of 20,000 a year, the record of late indicates progress. Certainly there is better organization of effort in the minority-rights field than ever before.

We have in varying degrees all the symptoms of the anti-Communist hysteria that the rest of the country knows. We have the rash of organizations and publications that spring up to flay public opinion with violent predictions of socialist doom—characterized by an appallingly short memory of the state of the nation in the thirties. We have our share of bellowing patriots who pronounce such people as Gypsy Rose Lee unfit for radio and television because they have been "cited" by the Un-American Activities Committee. We have not had much of the organized industry censorship typified by the Jean Muir case in New York.

Baltimore

MARYLAND'S contribution to the national witch hunt is the notorious Ober law, which was finally accepted by the state in a referendum held on November 7, 1950. The law has three prongs: it requires a loyalty oath of public employees; it requires a loyalty affidavit of candidates for public office; it provides fines and imprisonment for individuals convicted of acting with intent to alter the constitutional government by unlawful means, and for membership in or contributions to a domestic or foreign subversive organization.

To date no one has been accused or prosecuted under the third provision. The loyalty-oath requirement has resulted in the dismissal of five persons, four of whom are members of the Society of Friends and are as conscientiously opposed to force and violence as they are to loyalty oaths. The individuals are Dr. Miriam Brailey, former director of the bureau of tuberculosis of the city Health Department; Miss Doris Shamleffer, formerly a personnel examiner in the State Department of Employment and Registration; Miss Elizabeth Haas, formerly with the Enoch Pratt Library in Baltimore; Miss Vera Shank and Mrs. Helen Baker, who were teachers in the Baltimore public-school system. The loyalty and integrity of these women have not been questioned. They were released from their jobs only because they could not in conscience sign an oath which in itself impugns their integrity.

The second requirement, the affidavit of loyalty for candidates for public office, kept the names of two Progressive Party candidates off the ballot in 1950. Louis Shub and Miss Thelma Gerende, running for governor and member of the City Council, respectively, refused to submit the affidavit.

Marylanders are not convinced that the Ober law offers them sufficient protection from subversives. To make doubly sure, the legislature enacted this year a measure requiring the disbarment of any lawyer found to be a member of an organization which is branded subversive under the Ober law. The bill carried the indorsement of the Baltimore bar, which passed a resolution asking for its passage without a dissenting vote. After the meeting some of the lawyers confessed shamefacedly that the overwhelming shouts of "Aye" made it impossible for them to vote their own convictions.

The University of Maryland felt the force of anti-Communist feeling in August, 1950, when, at the request of Governor Lane, the administration canceled a scheduled debate between Philip Frankfeld, then chairman of the Communist Party in Maryland, and an Australian, Mr. S. C. Schwartz. The debate was on the subject Is Communism a Friend of America?

Maryland's best-known controversial personality is Professor Owen Lattimore of the Johns Hopkins University. In March, 1951, following his clearing by the Tydings subcommittee in the Senate, he was asked to speak to the United Nations Youth Club at City College, one of the Baltimore high schools. At the request of the American Legion, the City Council passed a resolution by a vote of thirteen to six requesting the Board of School Commissioners to cancel the speech. Because Professor Lattimore had never been "found guilty of disloyalty by any responsible agency" the School Commissioners refused to comply. Attendance at the lecture was voluntary, but about 2,000 students were present.

More recent hearings by Congressional committees, with Professor Lattimore as target, have increased the feeling against him. Some pressure has been brought on the Johns Hopkins Board of Trustees to dismiss him. The board has declared that it will not condemn him before his disloyalty has been established by a responsible group.

Six confessed Communists, including Philip Frankfeld, were recently convicted in Baltimore under the Smith act. The Maryland Civil Liberties Committee filed an amicus curiae brief with the trial court, and will file another on the appeal, questioning the law's power to inflict punishment for advocating or conspiring to advocate overthrow of the government.

Picketing to enforce blacklisting has just appeared on the Baltimore scene. The following item was printed in the Baltimore Sun of May 20, 1952:

The American Legion last night began picketing the Stanley Theater because José Ferrer, star of the current film "Anything Can Happen," is on the American Legion's blacklist.

Daniel Burkhardt, State Adjutant of the Maryland Department of the Legion, said Mr. Ferrer is one of twenty-five actors or entertainers blacklisted by the Legion on grounds of "questioned loyalty. . . ."

During a conference with Rodney Collier, manager of the theater, Mr. Burkhardt suggested that Mr. Collier buy the book "Red Channels."

Los Angeles

THE dangerous drift toward repression is nowhere more evident than in Southern California. It takes its line from the procedures of the House Un-American Activities Committee. Prostituting the purposes of legislative investigation, the committee has created and sustained a nation-wide hysteria, intensified in California by the Tenney committee's imitation of its worst practices. In the movie industry, particularly, the committee has been an efficient wrecker of morale and production as well as of constitutional principles. Its first major victims were the "Hollywood Ten," whom future generations may recognize as protectors of our Bill of Rights. More recently it has heightened tension by inducing "friendly witnesses" to brand as Communists friends and associates of long standing. A spokesman for the committee is reported to have boasted that when the twice postponed second meeting of the committee is held in Los Angeles there will be "the greatest parade of witnesses in the committee's history." To a long list of movie people on whom subpoenas were served have been added nearly fifty lawyers and doctors identified with liberal causes.

Forced to resign from the California Senate committee, through which he discredited the state, Jack B. Tenney is reported to have acted as consultant in drafting loyalty-oath legislation for the Los Angeles Board of Education, the County Board of Supervisors, and the City Council. The loyalty oath imposed by its regents on the University of California, and found unconstitutional by the Appellate Court, was the direct result of years of sniping at university teachers by the Tenney committee.

An attempt was also made to enact legislation requiring an "oath of renunciation" from the thousands of men and women, including doctors and lawyers, whose livelihood depends on a state license. The sudden awakening of professional groups blocked the scheme. However, the Levering act, requiring a test oath before a check can be issued in payment for services in any branch of government, was passed. Recently a mother was compelled to sign an oath on behalf of a three-year-old child who had posed for a junior-college art class for a total of four hours.

To the considerable army of government workers subjected to this cloud of suspicion must be added the much larger number of workers in industry. Being in defense production, employees of airplane plants and the many smaller factories which furnish parts have to undergo federal "loyalty" procedure. Private racketeers make a good living not only by keeping gullible business men "informed" on the Communist menace but by negotiating private contracts to "screen" employees. An American Legion post is supplying movie employers with its own private list of more than 300 employees whom the Legion thinks should be fired, although not one of them has been proved guilty of any offense against the government.

Civil liberties are being stifled in this atmosphere of repression. "Patriots" in government and industry are, in the words of President Truman, "chipping away at our basic freedoms just as insidiously and far more effectively than Communists have ever been able to do." Minority rights—political, racial, and economic—suffer increasingly; anti-Semitism finds fertile soil; Negro homes are bombed; expressions of concern for democratic brotherhood are denounced as communistic; social-welfare projects are labeled "creeping socialism." Even in the churches attempts are made to bar fully accredited ministers and life-long lay Bible teachers because their names "appear in the Tenney reports."

Caution, silence, and subservience are getting to be a habit with the citizens of Southern California.

June 2

Detroit

LAST year the principal attacks on civil liberties in this area were as follows:

1. The one-man grand jury recreated by the legislature denied counsel to witnesses inside the jury chamber, thus confirming the fears of the American Civil Liberties Union, which had urged Governor Williams to veto the measure on the ground that the Circuit Court judges could not be trusted to enforce civil-liberties safeguards.

2. An act was passed authorizing the Secret State Police to open the supposedly secret records of the State Bar Association for the purpose of disciplining allegedly subversive lawyers.

3. The so-called Trucks bill outlawing the Communist Party was applied by the Secretary of State to all "socialistic political parties." The ballot was thereby cleared of all minority parties.

4. An attack by the House Un-American Activities Committee on Local 600 of the United Automobile Workers succeeded in replacing its militant officials with persons more in harmony with the international administration.

5. A teacher in the public schools was suspended for refusal to answer questions of the committee as to her alleged Communist affiliations.

You! are next!

Justice William O. Douglas has said, "Tyranny is the same, whatever mask it wears." We agree, and we hold that all tyranny, all authoritarianism, endangers the principal achievement of American civilization: the rights of the individual established in our Bill of Rights.

In this issue of The Nation there is evidence of the loss of the liberties which Americans in the past have been willing to fight and die to maintain.

If you belong to a group which is insisting on the American principle of individual freedom, the right to dissent, the right to assemble freely and to petition freely, the right to travel abroad and the right to engage in political activities—then you are loyal—loyal to the best interests of the American people.

If you shake your head and say, "What can I do about it?" you have already surrendered to America's worst enemy—authoritarianism! We still have the right to act and we must do so if we are to preserve democracy and liberty. Do something!

The Emergency Civil Liberties Committee was organized in 1951 by a group who felt that not enough was being done to expose the forces which are trying to take away your freedoms and ours. We feel that this is the essential fight for American democracy and American security. Write us for details of past and planned activities. If you share our views we invite your support.

YOU HAVE AN INTEREST IN CIVIL LIBERTIES!

WHY NOT JOIN THE AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION?

The ACLU is the only permanent national non-partisan organization defending the Bill of Rights for everybody. On the job 52 weeks a year, the Union fights for the civil liberties even of those whose anti-democratic opinions it abhors and opposes. And, in order to do so, it bars from its governing councils all totalitarians of right and left.

YOU have a stake in the ACLU's fight:

AGAINST the Smith Act, the McCarran Act and similar laws which, though brought on by fears of Communist infiltration and aimed at Communists, threaten everybody's civil liberties—yours included.

TO IMPLEMENT—through legal action and educational campaigns—the Supreme Court's recent historic decisions (in "The Miracle" and "Pinky" cases) invalidating pre-censorship of movies.

TO MAKE a realistic, comprehensive civil rights program the law of the land.

You probably feel you belong to the ACLU—IN SPIRIT. Now is the time to become a member—IN FACT!

Membership, which brings you Civil Liberties, the Union's monthly paper, and the ACLU's authoritative annual report on U. S. Liberties (to be published later this summer) is open to all—in the following classifications:

SUSTAINING MEMBER $25.00
SUPPORTING MEMBER 10.00
CONTRIBUTING MEMBER 5.00
ASSOCIATE MEMBER 2.00

Members contributing $5.00 or more are entitled to single copies of the pamphlets listed at the right and of some 20 others currently available—on request, without charge. $10.00 members may receive the Union's weekly bulletin—on request.

In most instances, by joining the national ACLU you automatically become a member of any existing local ACLU organization in your area—without payment of extra dues. Be as generous as you can!
